[4, 5] Plainly, then, it was error to award the plaintiffs a judgment for any amount. This conclusion brings us to the problem of the details of the judgment we should render. If the defendant's appeal were all that we had before us, we might be inclined to reverse the judgment with directions to limit the new trial to the single issue of the existence of the license, as was done in Siemens v. Meconi, 1941, 44 Cal.App.2d 641, 112 P.2d 904. But we also have plaintiffs' appeal before us, and it raises a strong doubt as to the correctness of the amount awarded. No price was agreed upon between the plaintiffs and the defendant for the work that she wanted done; indeed the extent and details of the work, which consisted of repairs and remodeling, were not known initially, but developed as the work progressed. The compensation to which plaintiffs became entitled, therefore, was the reasonable value of the labor and material they furnished to the defendant together with a reasonable sum, for overhead, supervision, profit, or by whatever other name it may be called. Plaintiffs produced evidence that the total of these items was $3,679.61 and earnestly contend that the defendant produced no evidence to the contrary. Were this clearly so, we might take steps to modify the judgment to conform to plaintiffs' prayer, if the possession of a license could be established. It clearly appears, however, that the trial judge had good reason to conclude that plaintiffs' total was too high. For example, they included in their account the services of helpers to the extent of just over four hundred hours. They paid these helpers at the rate of sixty cents per hour, but charged the defendant $1.50. The trial court was quite justified in concluding that there had been an overcharge here, one not reasonable.

The defendant lists a number of items such as this, but their total does not appear to justify a reduction of $1,679.61 from plaintiffs' total, the amount which would be necessary to enable us to affirm the round sum of $2,000 which constituted the judgment. The fact that the trial judge visited the scene where the work was done does not make this a case where we should presume that there is ample evidence beyond that disclosed in the record, to sustain the findings as to the reasonable value of labor and materials, for the reasonable value of work upon materials now hidden away in walls and underground cannot be obtained from a view of the walls and ground. To sum up, we are of the opinion that neither $2,000 nor $3,679.61 clearly appears to be the proper amount to be awarded, so that we find it inadvisable to limit further proceedings in this case to a discovery of the fact respecting the issuance of a contractor's license to plaintiffs.

[6] The judgment in plaintiffs' favor having been rendered contrary to the express provisions of a penal statute, is reversed, with directions to the trial court to permit the plaintiffs to amend their complaint, if they be so advised, to allege that they were licensed as contractors when they undertook to perform and performed the work for which they are seeking compensation. The judgment having been reversed on defendant's appeal, plaintiffs' appeal is moot, and is dismissed.

ROHR v. JOHNSON.
CIV. No. 3343.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.
July 12, 1944.

I. Judges ⇨49(1)

Under statute relating to disqualification of judge to act, not only must there be a showing of bias or prejudice, but it must then be determined, as matter of law, whether by reason thereof a fair and impartial trial cannot be had. Code Civ.Proc. § 170, subd. 5.

2. Judges ⇨49(2)

In action to recover property given to defendant at time when donor was allegedly incompetent, judge was not disqualified to try case involving questions whether donor was incompetent when gift was made and whether gift was induced by undue influence because he stated before argument he knew defendant and thought he was honest. Code Civ.Proc. § 170, subd. 5.

3. Judges ⇨51(2)

Matter of disqualification of a trial judge should be raised when facts relied on are first discovered, and, in any event, before matter involved is submitted for decision, and plaintiff could not raise question after cause was submitted and decided. Code Civ.Proc. § 170, subd. 5.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Jacob Weinberger, Judge.

Action by Gelia A. Rohr, an incompetent person, by her guardian, Katherine A. Sweet, against Edwin Johnson to recover personal property claimed to have been given to defendant by plaintiff at a time when she was incompetent. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Hubbell & Matherly, of Escondido, for appellant.

John A. Hewicker, of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Judge.

This is an action to recover for approximately $1500 worth of personal property claimed to have been given to the defendant by Gelia A. Rohr at a time when she was incompetent. This appeal is presented on an agreed statement. However, after all briefs were filed the appellant filed a clerk's transcript.

The complaint alleged that the defendant came into possession of this property while occupying a confidential and fiduciary relationship with Gelia A. Rohr, and that she was then incompetent. It is not directly alleged that the defendant exercised any undue influence in regard to the matter, but there is a suggestion to this effect in an allegation that by reason of her being incompetent she reposed great trust and confidence in him. The answer denied all allegations of the complaint except those relating to the appointment of a guardian.

It appears that after all evidence was presented, and before argument, the trial judge made a statement in which he said:

"May I say this: the question in my mind is this—I have not any idea whatsoever that Mr. Johnson conspired to get anything away from the old lady; I do not entertain that notion for a second. I know Mr. Johnson. I know what kind of a man he is: I think he is a high minded, intelligent, honorable citizen."

He then pointed out that there still remained for him to determine whether Gelia A. Rohr was mentally competent at the time she made this gift and whether the defendant was acting in a fiduciary capacity at the time he accepted the gift. He then said: "I am not doubting his honesty of purpose whatsoever. I think he accepted this in good faith. He may or may not be in a position to retain it—I don't know—I have not decided the case yet." He then asked for the citation of any authorities the parties might have to sustain their contentions.

Thereafter, the court found that on April 24, 1942, Gelia A. Rohr, in the presence of two witnesses, gave a portion of the property involved to the defendant as a gift; that in August, 1942, being about to discontinue housekeeping, Gelia A. Rohr asked the defendant to sell certain of her furniture (a part of the property involved here); that the defendant sold this furniture and paid the proceeds to her; that she was not mentally incompetent at the times in question but on the contrary was competent and in full control of her mental faculties; that when the property was turned over to the defendant she fully understood her act and the effect thereof, and did so with the full knowledge that it was being delivered as a gift; that no undue influence was at any time exerted over her by the defendant or by anyone on his behalf; and that on October 5, 1942, Gelia A. Rohr was by an order of court declared to be an incompetent person and a guardian was appointed. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant.

The plaintiff filed an affidavit and a notice of intention to move for a new trial on the grounds that the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding that the plaintiff was not under the undue influence of the defendant, and that the remarks of the trial judge disclosed that he was biased in favor of the defendant. The trial judge filed an affidavit stating that he had made the remarks in question for the purpose of pointing out what he regarded as the material issues to the end that counsel, knowing his views, could direct their argument to the problems considered important for a fair and impartial decision in the matter; denying that he was at any time biased for or against any party; and alleging that he was not prejudiced or biased in any manner and that he believed he could render a fair and impartial decision on the motion.

By stipulation, the matter of the disqualification of the trial judge to hear the motion for a new trial was heard before another judge and the motion for disqualification was denied. Thereafter, an order was entered denying the motion for a new trial, and the plaintiff has appealed from the judgment.

The appellant contends that the judge was disqualified because he had an undisclosed knowledge of the other party and that a new trial should have been granted on the ground of bias.

[1] Subd. 5 of section 170, C.C.P., provides that a judge is disqualified to act in a matter when it is made to appear probable that by reason of his bias or prejudice a fair and impartial trial cannot be had before him. Under this statute not only must there be a showing of bias or prejudice but it must then be determined, as a matter of law, whether by reason thereof a fair and impartial trial cannot be had. Briggs v. Superior Court, 215 Cal. 336, 10 P.2d 1003.

The claim of bias here is based on the fact that the judge knew the defendant and thought that he was honest. If this, standing alone, were held to be sufficient to establish prejudicial bias many judges would be of small use in their home counties. The mere fact that a judge entertains a general belief in the honesty of someone he knows is neither unusual nor indicates that he has such a fixed opinion as to impair his ability to weigh any evidence involving the acts of that person. None of the evidence produced at this trial is before us. It may have been such as to merely confirm any good opinion of the respondent's honesty previously held by the judge. It does not here appear that there was any conflict between the testimony produced by the respective parties or that the judge was in any way called upon to decide which of two sets of witnesses was telling the truth. At best, any showing of bias is not strong and it is very questionable whether the showing thus made could be held sufficient to show the existence of bias.

If we assume the showing to be sufficient in that regard the question remains whether a probability appears that a fair and impartial trial could not be had. The "gift" here in question was made five and a half months before the lady was adjudged incompetent. The only issues presented by the pleadings were whether she was incompetent at the time the gift was made and whether that gift was induced by undue influence on the part of the respondent. The honesty of the respondent had nothing to do with the first of these issues, which appears to have been the main one. The question of his honesty was possibly but not necessarily involved in the second issue. Undue influence in the legal sense may be exercised by an honest person through persistent importunities. Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467, 117 P. 539.

[2] Apparently, there was little dispute here as to the facts and no conflicting facts are pointed out as sufficient to support findings contrary to those made. The record indicates that the real questions submitted to the court were as to the legal effect of the facts established, that is, whether those facts showed that this lady was incompetent at the time and whether they were sufficient to establish that the gift was the result of undue influence. So far as here appears the honesty of the respondent was not very much involved. The statement of the judge indicates that he was considering these questions as matters of law and that before making up his mind he desired the assistance of counsel. On the record before us, it cannot be held as a matter of law that it appears probable by reason of anything here shown that a fair and impartial trial could not be had, or that it was not had.

[3] A further consideration is that the matter of the disqualification of a trial judge should be raised when the facts relied on are first discovered and, in any event, before the matter involved is submitted for a decision. Nothing was done when the remarks in question were made, nor until after the cause was submitted and decided. A party should not be allowed to gamble on a favorable decision and then raise such an objection in the event he is disappointed in the result.

A question similar to that here presented was raised in connection with the motion for a new trial and a different judge held that the trial judge was not disqualified. The affidavits there used are in the record before us and they sustain that finding. Nothing here appears to require or justify a contrary conclusion on this appeal with respect to that question of fact.

1. Divorce ⇨249(3), 254

Court, in divorce action, can only dispose of community property and cannot dispose of separate property of one of the parties or carve out life estate therein.

2. Divorce ⇨249(3)

Where no issue was made in divorce action concerning ownership of real estate in that wife specifically alleged that the realty was separate property of husband, court had no jurisdiction to award wife a life estate therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward R. Brand, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Lewis Robinson against Theresa Robinson, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment reversed and purported appeal from order denying new trial dismissed.

Willis O. Tyler, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas L. Griffith, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

In this action to quiet title plaintiff has appealed from a judgment awarding to defendant a life interest in the real property which is the subject of the litigation.

An interlocutory decree was awarded to Theresa Robinson, defendant herein, on June 10, 1942, she having theretofore commenced an action against plaintiff for separate maintenance in which she later changed her prayer to ask for a divorce. In the divorce action she listed various properties of the parties, some of which she alleged to be community property. She specifically alleged that the real estate which is the subject of the present litigation was the separate property of the plaintiff herein, Lewis Robinson. A cross-complaint was filed in the divorce action and the court in its interlocutory decree of divorce ordered the plaintiff herein to pay to defendant herein the sum of $12.50 per month until the further order of the court and also gave her "the right to remain in and to continue to reside and enjoy possession of the premises she now occupies at 1609 East 110th Street, Los Angeles." A part of the community property was awarded to each of the parties. In the final decree of divorce, which was entered on June 17, 1943, no reference was made to the real property involved in this action.

The present action was commenced on January 12, 1943. By its judgment entered on October 5, 1943, the court decreed that plaintiff is the owner in fee of the land described in the complaint, "subject however, to a life estate therein of defendant Theresa Robinson during her natural life to use the improvement thereon consisting of a dwelling known as 1609 East 110th Street, Los Angeles, California."

[1,2] The power of the court in disposing of the property of the parties in a divorce action is limited to their community property. In such a proceeding the court has no power to dispose of the separate property of one of the parties, nor to carve out a life estate therein. Roy v. Roy, 29 Cal.App.2d 596, 85 P.2d 223. In the divorce action of the parties to the present litigation no issue was made concerning the ownership of the real estate in question, for it was specifically alleged by the wife that the realty was the separate property of the husband. The court therefore was without jurisdiction to award to the wife a life estate therein.

The judgment is reversed. The purported appeal from the order denying a motion for a new trial is dismissed.

1. Negligence ⇨32(2)

One engaged in performing work on premises of another is an "invitee", to whom the owner of premises, or one in control thereof, is not liable for injuries which result from a danger which is as obvious to invitee as it is to owner.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Invitee".

2. Negligence ⇨32(1)

Property owner has the duty to exercise ordinary care, but if the dangerous condition of premises is obvious the owner is entitled to assume that invitee will perceive that which would be obvious to him upon the ordinary use of his own senses.

3. Negligence ⇨42

Where workman employed by subcontractor was injured in attempting to step over a sewer ditch which had been dug by another subcontractor on premises where workman was employed, and the danger of attempting to cross the ditch was obvious neither the contractor who constructed the ditch nor person in charge of premises was liable for injuries sustained.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1041(2)

In action for injuries sustained by subcontractor's employee in attempting to step across a sewer ditch which had been dug by another subcontractor on premises where plaintiff was employed, refusal to permit plaintiff to amend his complaint and to offer proof as to defendant's negligence in failing to brace the sides of the ditch was not error, since, even if negligent in that regard, plaintiff in attempting to cross ditch with knowledge that the bracing had been omitted was guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery.

Appeal From Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Action by Myron T. King against Griffith Company and others for injuries received in falling into a ditch constructed by defendant on premises where plaintiff was employed. Defendant's motion for a nonsuit was granted and, from the judgment entered, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Kenneth J. Murphy, of Los Angeles (Henry E. Kappler, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

James V. Brewer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Plaintiff commenced this action to recover damages for injuries which he received when he fell into a ditch at the reception center for evacuated Japanese at Manzanar, California. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence the court granted defendants' motion for a nonsuit and plaintiff has appealed from the judgment entered thereafter.

The reception center at Manzanar in April, 1942, was being prepared as rapidly as possible by the United States government for the reception of the Japanese who were being evacuated from the coastal areas. The general contractor for the work was Griffith Company, a corporation, and defendants Vincent and Pringle held a sub-contract under which they were to excavate trenches for the laying of sewer pipe. Plaintiff was an employee of Asbestos Roofing and Insulation Company, holder of a sub-contract for the roofing and papering on the buildings.

The camp for the Japanese was built in blocks of buildings on a gentle slope from the mountains toward the main highway. The streets were being located on this slope approximately 400 feet apart and at intersections of about 600 feet intersecting streets were being prepared to run parallel to the highway.

Under their contract defendants were engaged in digging trenches with a machine known as a ditch digger. Plaintiff, an experienced roofer, had been working on this job for about two weeks before the accident in question and during that time he had crossed over a number of ditches dug by defendants without difficulty. At ten o'clock in the morning of April 27, in attempting to step across a ditch which was approximately 2 feet in width and from 4 to 6 feet in depth he fell to the bottom of the ditch and was injured by striking a pipe which had been placed therein. He carried in his hand a bucket half filled with cement. His fall was caused by the cave-in of the edge of the trench for about eighteen inches at an angle of approximately 45 degrees. Several of plaintiff's fellow workmen had crossed the ditch ahead of him. One of them, Mr. Dressel, had crossed about six feet in advance of plaintiff. When plaintiff approached the ditch he stopped at approximately one and one-half feet from its edge and as he started to cross the edge of the ditch gave way.

In his complaint plaintiff alleged that defendants were negligent in that they maintained the ditch in a dangerous and defective condition "in this that no cross-overs or platforms were provided as a covering for said ditch or trench to enable workmen including this plaintiff to cross over said ditch in safety." It was shown in evidence that the ditch in question was from three-fourths of a mile to a mile in length and that the accident occurred at a point approximately one-third the distance from its easterly end. One of the defendants testified that it was a general requirement on Federal work "to keep open intersections where proposed streets were * * * for the crossings of the other contractors".

[1-3] Plaintiff was in the position of an invitee at the location of the accident. The owner of the premises, or the one in control of the premises, is not liable for injuries to an invitee which result from a danger which is as obvious to the injured party as it is to the owner. The owner has the duty to exercise ordinary care but if the dangerous condition of the premises is obvious the owner is "entitled to assume that such invitee will perceive that which would be obvious to him upon the ordinary use of his own senses." Funari v. Gravem-Inglis Baking Co., 40 Cal.App. 2d 25, 29, 104 P.2d 44, 46, and cases there cited; Kolburn v. P. J. Walker Co., 38 Cal.App.2d 545, 101 P.2d 747; Shanley v. American Olive Co., 185 Cal. 552, 197 P. 793. The application of this rule compels the conclusion that the trial court did not err in granting the nonsuit. Plaintiff had crossed the ditch which had been dug by defendants on a number of occasions. The accident occurred at about 10 o'clock in the morning and the ditch was plainly visible. Plaintiff knew that others had crossed just ahead of him and for this reason could take particular notice of the soil to see if it had become loose or in danger of falling upon repeated crossings. Indeed, it can be well argued that plaintiff was in even a better position than defendants to know whether the ditch was then in an unsafe condition. Rather than walk to the end of the ditch or to take the time to throw in dirt to make a better crossing, plaintiff chose to step across the ditch, following Dressel, who had crossed immediately ahead of him. In doing so he assumed the risk of making the crossing.

[4] Plaintiff complains of the refusal of the trial court to permit him to present proof that the sides of the trench had not been shored or braced and to permit him to amend his complaint after the commencement of the trial specifically alleging negligence of defendants in this regard. Defendants objected to evidence on the subject of failure to brace the trenches, claiming that a new cause of action would thereby be set up after the expiration of the Statute of Limitations. However, regardless of this objection, it is clear that the court was justified in the action taken, for, if it could be shown that defendants were negligent in the matter of omitting the bracing, it is apparent that plaintiff in crossing the trench with knowledge that the bracing had been omitted was guilty of contributory negligence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Peter J. Mullins, Judge.

Alfred J. Hennessy, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and T. G. Negrich, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice.

The appellants, Secundino Dorrance and Alonzo Dorrance, were found guilty by a jury of the crime of first degree robbery.

The victim of the robbery was Ernest Neil, a sailor of the United States Navy, stationed at Treasure Island; and the robbery was committed shortly before midnight on July 29, 1943, in the rear of a parking lot, a short distance from a saloon known as George's Cave, on Eddy Street between Leavenworth and Jones Streets, in San Francisco. Neil was knocked down by blows on the head inflicted with Coca Cola bottles, and then beaten with the bottles about the head so severely that he was confined in bed in a hospital for five days and required two blood transfusions. He suffered a severe gash on the head, a broken nose, and blackened eyes, and his fingers were smashed when he tried to protect himself by putting his hands on his head. While he was thus being beaten his wallet containing $40 was stolen from his back pocket.

Earlier that evening Neil visited the saloon with another sailor, and they picked up an acquaintanceship with two women, Ila Hain, aged 19 years, and a Mrs. Villela. The women were acquainted with appellants, and had met them earlier that day in a saloon near the waterfront, and tried to borrow some money from appellants. Appellants promised to meet them that evening at George's Cave and let them have the money. After the sailors met the women in George's Cave they drank with and talked to them for some time, and during that time the appellants were standing at the other end of the bar. The sailors asked the women to go to a room with them. One of the women said it would be all right, that she was going to get a quart of whiskey and take the sailors to a room. Both women went out, but Ila Hain returned alone in about fifteen minutes. The other woman had given Ila Hain a note saying for them to go to a hotel room and she would meet them there. Ila Hain told the sailors she had promised to buy appellants a drink, so they gave her a dollar and she went down to the other end of the bar and talked with appellants and gave them the dollar. Appellants asked her if Neil had any money, and she replied: "I guess so, he is buying my drinks." Thereupon appellants told her to get Neil outside and "we will take care of that." She and Neil left George's Cave about ten minutes to twelve, and were followed out by appellants. She led Neil through a parking lot to the back fence. There was a board off the fence, and as she started to go through the fence she pretended that she had caught her hair; whereupon appellants caught up with Neil and struck him on the head with the bottles. He fell to the ground and put his hands over his head and started moaning, but appellants continued to strike him. As soon as he was knocked to the ground Ila Hain ran to the corner, got in a cab and went home. She testified that she lured Neil away from George's Cave and through the parking lot so that appellants could take his money.

Ila Hain was arrested and charged jointly with appellants as a principal in the commission of the robbery. She was arrested on August 8th, and on August 11th gave a statement by way of question and answer to Police Inspector Reznik, which statement was taken down by a police stenographer. In that statement Ila Hain related the circumstances leading up to the commission of the robbery as above narrated and naming appellants as the persons who assaulted and robbed Neil. At the time of the arraignment in September, 1943, appellants were represented by Attorney Hennessey, and the public defender appeared as counsel for Ila Hain. All three entered pleas of not guilty and the cause was set for trial on October 22, 1943. On the morning of the trial Ila Hain withdrew her former plea and entered a plea of guilty and asked for probation. The matter of probation was continued until November 15, and the trial proceeded as against appellants. Both appellants testified in their own behalf denying having committed the robbery, and they sought to establish an alibi, but this defense was rejected by the jury. Neil was not available as a witness at the time of trial because he was at sea, and the testimony given by him at the preliminary examination was read to the jury. Thereupon Ila Hain was called as a witness for the prosecution, and the testimony given by her followed closely the statement she had previously given the police.

[1] The statement so made was afterwards received in evidence over appellants' objection, and the trial court's ruling is assigned as error. We find no reason to set aside the verdict on that ground. The transcribed statement was signed by Ila Hain on August 12th, before Police Inspector Butz, and shortly thereafter it was read to appellants by Inspector Butz in the presence of Ila Hain, and neither of appellants made any denial of the accusations made therein against them. Inspector Butz testified positively that both stood mute. Furthermore, prior to the time the statement was received in evidence appellants' counsel cross-examined Ila Hain as to the circumstances under which the statement was made; also as to some of the contents thereof; and during the cross-examination as to its contents the court reminded counsel that such examination was opening the way for the introduction of the statement in evidence. In any event, appellants could have suffered no prejudice by reason of the statement having been received in evidence because all of the facts and circumstances set forth therein were covered by the oral testimony given by the party making the statement, with full opportunity afforded the appellants to cross-examine.

[2] On cross-examination of Ila Hain, counsel for appellants asked her if while she was in jail awaiting trial and before she changed her plea she did not tell him that she was going to "stand on" the statement she had given to Inspector Reznik because he had promised her probation. She denied having so told counsel, and thereafter counsel offered himself as a witness for the defense for the purpose of relating the conversation he claims took place with her at that interview; and the court ruled that whatever she may have said to him at that time was privileged. Under the facts as disclosed by the record the court's conclusion is doubtless supported by Wigmore on Evidence (3rd Ed., vol. 8, sec. 2304, p. 587) wherein the author states the rule to be that when the communication is made pending negotiations for retaining the attorney it is privileged, notwithstanding that the attorney's acceptance of the employment is eventually refused. Here, according to counsel's testimony, he went out to see Ila Hain because she had sent for him by phoning to his office, and that he went out to consult with her as an attorney—that it was not a social visit; that she told him that she did not want to be represented by the public defender "but wanted separate counsel"; that after going over the case with her he told her he could not represent her because the statement she had given to Inspector Reznik "conflicts" with his clients and "crossfires on them." He was then asked the direct question: "* * * If she had told you she would abandon this particular statement would you have represented her," and he replied, "I would." It is quite evident from the foregoing that whatever Ila Hain may have said to counsel leading up to his refusal to act as her attorney was privileged in that it was said pending negotiations for his employment as her attorney. None of the cases cited by appellants are in point. In the case of People v. Heart, 1 Cal.App. 166, 81 P. 1018, the interview in question was had by the attorney with the defendant's wife and not with the defendant, which took it out of the privileged communication rule.

[3,4] Nor is there any merit in appellants' contention that the testimony given by Ila Hain was not sufficiently corroborated to meet the requirements of section 1111 of the Penal Code. As held in People v. Negra, 208 Cal. 64, 280 P. 354, 356, while the corroborating evidence must do more than create a suspicion of guilt, it is nevertheless sufficient even though it "be slight and, when standing by itself, entitled to but little consideration." People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 480, 24 P. 32. And continuing, the court said: "The law does not require that the evidence necessary to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice shall tend to establish the precise facts testified to by the accomplice; and strong corroborative testimony is not necessary to support a judgment of conviction founded on the testimony of an accomplice. Even though circumstantial and slight, the evidence is, nevertheless, sufficient if it tends to connect the accused with the commission of the offense. People v. Martin, 19 Cal.App. 295, 125 P. 919. * * * It is not necessary that the corroborating evidence should go so far as to establish by itself, and without the aid of the testimony of an accomplice, that the defendant committed the offense charged. People v. Solomon, 6 Cal. Unrep.Cas. 305, 58 P. 55." The more recent case of People v. Davis, 210 Cal. 540, 293 P. 32, holds substantially to the same effect. Furthermore, it has been held that such independent evidence may consist of contradictory statements made by the accused, or his silence in the face of accusatory statements, or of false statements made with respect to matters connected with the commission of the crime. People v. Taylor, 70 Cal.App. 239, 232 P. 998. Here the evidence shows among other things that Neil got a "good look" at appellants as they were standing at the end of the bar in George's Cave, and his identification of them afterwards at police headquarters in the presence of Ensign Hunt as the persons who assaulted and robbed him, together with the testimony of the manager of George's Cave that when Ila Hain and Neil left the place the appellants followed immediately behind them, was legally sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the law. Moreover, the evidence shows that when appellants promised to meet the women at George's Cave that night, one of them stated that he "wished he had a blackjack, there was a lot of money floating around there."

[5] The remaining points made by appellants are not supported by either argument or authority, and therefore under well settled rules they may be disregarded. See 4 Cal.Jur. 10-Yr. Supp. p. 941.

After an examination of the entire record including the evidence, we are satisfied that no reversible error has been shown, and that the verdict has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice. The judgments of conviction and the order denying the motion for new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NEAL

Cr. 2287.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

July 12, 1944.

1. Criminal law ⇨1038(3)

Defendant could not complain of trial court's failure to instruct that crime of abduction for defilement could not be committed if complaining party consented and that previous unchastity of complaining party might be material to issues raised, in absence of a request therefor. Pen.Code, § 265.

2. Criminal law ⇨1044

Defendant could not complain of failure to strike out testimony of witness, where no motion was made to that effect.

3. Criminal law ⇨1171(1)

Remark of district attorney, while endeavoring to elicit testimony from witness, to effect that someone wanted to compound a felony or thwart justice, did not constitute reversible error on ground that remark implied that witness was in league with someone to defeat identification of the accused.

4. Criminal law ⇨1045

Remark of district attorney while endeavoring to elicit testimony from witness, even if improper, did not constitute reversible error, where no ruling was asked for by defendant and no ruling was made thereon.

5. Criminal law ⇨1038(3)

Defendant could not complain of trial court's failure to give instruction that testimony of an accomplice should be viewed with distrust, where no such instruction was requested.

6. Criminal law ⇨1173(2)

Failure to comply with statute by giving instruction to effect that testimony of an accomplice should be viewed with distrust would not be reversible error. Code Civ.Proc. § 2061, subd. 4.

7. Criminal law ⇨1038(2), 1044

Defendant could not complain of trial court's failure to inform jury that written statements shown to witness while he was on stand and later read in evidence by prosecution were introduced solely for purpose of impeachment, where no objection or motion was made in trial court purporting to present the point.

8. Criminal law ⇨824(10)

Trial court should give a cautionary instruction in rape prosecutions, regardless whether it is asked.

9. Criminal law ⇨1173(2)

In prosecution under an information charging rape, contributing to delinquency of a minor, and abduction for defilement, where there were four witnesses who testified as to the transactions allegedly constituting the offenses, error, if any, in failing to give proper cautionary instruction was not prejudicial. Pen.Code, §§ 261, 265; St.1937, p. 1033, § 702; Civ.Code, § 3510.

10. Abduction ⇨16

Where prosecution involved charge of abduction for defilement, an instruction relating to previous chastity of prosecutrix was not required. Pen.Code, § 265.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Robert McWilliams, Judge.

Ray Neal was convicted of rape, of contributing to delinquency of a minor, and of abduction for defilement, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Ralph W. Scott, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

The district attorney filed informations against three defendants, Ray Neal, Robert Sams, and Louis May. In each of the informations each defendant was accused of five different offenses. Three counts were accusations of rape, sec. 261 of the Penal Code, one was an accusation of contributing to the delinquency of a minor, sec. 702 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, St.1937, p. 1033, and one was an accusation of abduction for defilement, sec. 265 of the Penal Code. The charges against Neal and the charges against Sams were consolidated for the purposes of a trial. The jury returned five verdicts against the defendant Neal and he has appealed from the judgment.

The evidence demonstrated that one Janet McAngus, a previously married woman, seventeen years old, voluntarily, and apparently at her own solicitation, accompanied defendant and two friends to a bar on May 12, 1943. There is some dispute as to the amount of liquor consumed. Janet contended that they were not drunk. Some disturbance was created in the bar and Janet testified that Neal dragged her out by her hair. The boys testified that she did not wish to leave the bar because she wanted to continue drinking, but she was becoming noisy and they wanted to leave. They denied using force upon her.

Janet testified that she left the bar screaming and continued screaming as the car drove down Mission Street and into the Bayview hills. On cross-examination she admitted however that although the car traversed a populated area, apparently no attention was attracted by her screams. The boys deny she made any outcry whatever.

When they arrived at their destination in the hills, Sams and May, the other boys, left the car and Neal had intercourse with the complaining witness. Janet testified she was lying on the seat of the car; that the car doors were open; that she was dressed in slacks and one leg of the slacks was removed, and that her underpants were also removed but were not torn.

Neal then left the car and Sams returned and had intercourse with the witness. She testified she was disrobed and lying down when he entered the car.

Sams then left the car and May entered. He attempted to have intercourse but when Janet asked him to stop he did so.

The boys then drove Janet to the home of a boy friend of hers and waited until she was admitted. They then drove off. A week or so after the alleged offense she voluntarily went out with May.

Janet told no one what had occurred until about two weeks later and after Sams' wife and Neal's girl friend had quarreled with her. She then made a complaint.

In his first point the appellant contends that as to the fourth count in the information the court instructed the jury as follows.

"The defendants are each charged in the fourth count of the information against them with having violated Section 265 of the Penal Code. That section provides, so far as it is here involved, that every person who takes any woman unlawfully, against her will and by force, menace or duress, compels her to be defiled is punishable as provided by that section. I think that the section is self-explanatory by its terms and that further instruction with reference to its meaning is not necessary."

[1] The appellant claims: "The jury were nowhere told that whereas in a rape case it is legally impossible for a female under the age of eighteen years to consent to the commission of the act charged, the crime described by Section 265 of the Penal Code could not be committed if the complaining witness were willing and consented to be conveyed by the defendants to the place where it is claimed she was raped. Nor were they informed, as we submit they ought to have been, that her previous unchastity might be material to the issues raised in such case." If appellant desired an instruction to that effect he should have asked for one. Omitting to do so he waived the point. People v. Selk, 46 Cal.App.2d 140, 115 P.2d 607.

[2] The prosecution called Joseph Glebmann, the proprietor of the saloon where the parties obtained their drinks. It is patent that he was called for the purpose of identifying some or all of said persons. It transpired he was a most voluble person. His testimony was not helpful to either the plaintiff or to the defendants. He volunteered that before the trial he was approached by a man and woman whom he designated as father and mother and who had asked him not to identify the persons who had been in his barroom. In his testimony he used the name N-e-a-l or N-e-i-l. The record does not show whether by that name he referred to the persons who approached him or to one of the defendants. The defendants now complain because said testimony was not stricken out. It is a sufficient answer to state that no motion was made to that effect.

[3, 4] While the witness Glebmann was on the stand and the district attorney was endeavoring to elicit his testimony, the district attorney made a remark to the effect that someone wanted to compound a felony or thwart justice. The appellant argues that said remark implied that the witness was in league with someone to defeat the identification of the accused. There are several answers. In the first place a reading of the transcript does not disclose that the remarks of the district attorney had any such meaning. Furthermore, if the remarks did have such meaning no objection was made, no ruling was asked for, and no ruling was made thereon. The incident mentioned did not under these circumstances constitute reversible error. People v. Giminiani, 45 Cal.App.2d 535, 540, 114 P.2d 392.

[5, 6] Louis May was called as a witness by the prosecution. He delineated the facts that transpired during the evening of May 12, 1943. The appellant complains because the trial court did not give an instruction to the effect that the testimony of an accomplice should be viewed with distrust. C.C.P. § 2061, sub. 4. However no such instruction was requested. Furthermore failure to comply with the provisions of section 2061, sub. 4, C.C.P. is not reversible error. People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, 74 P. 744.

[7] While the witness May was on the stand he was shown certain written statements which he had signed. Later those written statements were, on stipulation of the parties, read in evidence by the prosecution. The appellant claims said written statements were hearsay and that it was the duty of the trial court to inform the jury that such evidence was introduced solely for the purpose of impeachment. It is a sufficient reply to state no objection or motion was made in the trial court purporting to present the point.

[8] It will be conceded that it is settled law in prosecutions for rape, whether it is asked or it is not asked, the trial court should give a cautionary instruction. People v. Adams, 14 Cal.2d 154, 93 P.2d 146; People v. Putnam, 20 Cal.2d 885, 129 P.2d 367. The appellant complains because one was not given in the instant case. To that complaint there are several answers. The court did, of its own motion, give a cautionary instruction which was as follows:

"It is further immaterial whether force was used or was not used by the defendants upon the complaining witness in order to have such act of sexual intercourse with the complaining witness.

"While it is the law that the testimony of the prosecutrix Janet McAngus should be carefully scanned by you, still this does not mean that her evidence alone is never sufficient to convict.

"If you believe the prosecutrix and are satisfied from all the evidence in the case beyond a reasonable doubt of the defendants' guilt, then you should so find.

"It is not essential to a conviction in this case as against either defendant that the prosecutrix should be corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses as to the particular acts constituting the offense or offenses charged in the first count. It is sufficient if you believe from her evidence and all of the other testimony and circumstances or proof in the case beyond a reasonable doubt that the crimes therein charged have been committed."

No other instruction was asked. An approved form of a cautionary instruction is set forth in People v. Adams, 14 Cal.2d 154, at page 164, 93 P.2d 146, at page 151, as follows:

[9] "That a charge of this nature is particularly difficult for a defendant to clear himself of. No charge can be more easily made, and none more difficult to disprove. From the nature of the case, the complaining witness and the defendant are generally the only witnesses. The law does not require in this character of case that the prosecuting witness be supported by another witness or other corroborating circumstances, but does require that you examine her testimony with caution." (Italics ours.)

However in the case at bar the facts were testified to by Janet, May, Sams and Neal. There were four witnesses. The facts therefore lent no foundation for the application of the rule. When the reason for a rule ceases, so should the rule. Civ. Code, § 3510. It follows that the error, if any, was not prejudicial. People v. Lucas, 16 Cal.2d 178, 105 P.2d 102, 130 A.L.R. 1485.

[10] Not stated as a point, but merely in passing, the appellant complains that an instruction relating to the previous chastity of the prosecutrix was not given. No such request was made; and when, as here, we are considering the provisions of section 265 of the Penal Code, such an instruction is not required. State v. Fernald, 88 Iowa 553, 55 N.W. 534, 535.

Mr. Coghlan, as attorney for the appellant, presented the case in this court but did not try the case in the trial court. He has presented a most painstaking brief. Among other cases he cites and relies on People v. Ephraim, 77 Cal.App. 29, 245 P. 769, and People v. Gilliland, 39 Cal.App.2d 250, 103 P.2d 179. They are not helpful. In both cases a foundation was laid in the trial court by appropriate objections and motions. In the record before us there was neither objection nor motion and no ruling was made by the trial court on which the alleged errors are based.

NEEL et al. v. BARNARD et al.
L. A. No. 18453.

Supreme Court of California.

1. Trusts Ⓒ25(1)

Plaintiffs' transfer of realty encumbered by trust deeds to defendant under agreement giving defendant irrevocable power to sell, lease, or otherwise dispose thereof in such parcels, for such prices, and on such terms as defendant might deem proper, and to use proceeds to pay the encumbrances, created a "voluntary trust" and made defendant a "trustee" and not a mere "mortgagee in possession" notwithstanding defendant's letter constituting part of agreement stated that defendant declined to enter into any trust agreement. Civ.Code, §§ 852, 2216, 2219, 2221, 2222.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mortgagee in Possession", "Trustee" and "Voluntary Trust".

No particular language is necessary to create a trust, nor need the word "trust" or "trustee" be used. Civ.Code, §§ 852, 2216, 2219, 2221, 2222.

3. Executors and administrators Ⓒ449
Pleading Ⓒ430(2)

The rule prevailing where an issue not made by pleading is tried by consent did not apply to defendants' contention that claim of plaintiffs was not within scope of complaint nor of claim presented by plaintiffs to estate of deceased defendant, where defendants made timely objection to evidence on which plaintiffs based their claim. Probate Code, § 709.

4. Executors and administrators Ⓒ224

An action for accounting under deceased trustee's written agreement to sell plaintiffs' realty and other property conveyed to trustee and to account for proceeds, and for damages for breach of the agreement, in going beyond an attempt to follow and reclaim specific property and in asserting general liability against deceased trustee, was subject to Code provision requiring filing of claim where action is pending at decedent's death. Probate Code, § 709.

5. Pleading Ⓒ34(5)

A complaint which in first cause of action sought only accounting by trustee for property conveyed to him under trust agreement authorizing him to sell property to pay plaintiffs' debts, and in second cause of action sought damages for failure to sell for amounts sufficient to liquidate plaintiffs' indebtedness and leave them a specified balance and for making certain sales for less than value of properties, without specifically alleging repudiation of trust, could not by implication be construed as including repudiation of trust by trustee.

6. Executors and administrators Ⓒ431(2)

The rule that holder of claim against an estate cannot maintain action thereon unless claim is first presented means that he cannot maintain action on any claim not first presented for allowance, and that in any action brought he can recover only on a claim presented and rejected. Probate Code, § 709.

7. Executors and administrators Ⓒ448, 449

A claimant's cause of action against estate of deceased trustee arises on claim in form in which it has been presented, and he is not permitted to prove a cause of action different from that stated in the claim nor to amend his complaint so as to set up any other cause of action. Probate Code, § 709.

8. Executors and administrators Ⓒ227(1)

A claim against decedent's estate must sufficiently indicate the nature and amount of demand to enable executor and probate judge to act advisedly on it. Probate Code, § 709.

9. Appeal and error Ⓒ179(1)

Where plaintiffs' claim as filed against deceased trustee's estate for accounting and complaint in action on the claim contained no allegation of trustee's repudiation of trust and consequent liability of trustee's estate for the then value of trust property, plaintiffs' contention as to repudiation would not be considered by reviewing court. Probate Code, § 709; Civ.Code, §§ 852, 2216, 2219, 2221, 2222.

10. Trusts Ⓒ191(3)

Under contract requiring trustee within reasonable time to sell realty conveyed to him by beneficiaries, but giving trustee large amount of discretion regarding prices, terms and conditions of sale, trustee's mere failure to make a sale of particular tract at adequate price, viewed from present standpoint, did not necessarily establish trustee's breach of duty.

Where written contract created trust under which trustee was empowered to sell land conveyed to him by beneficiaries for purpose of paying beneficiaries' indebtedness, in such pieces, for such prices, and on such terms and conditions as trustee might deem proper, trustee was given absolute discretion as to matters referred to, and exercise thereof could not be reviewed by any other person or tribunal on considerations going to soundness of judgment exercised by trustee, in absence of fraud or bad faith. Civ.Code, § 2269.

In action against trustee for accounting under contract authorizing trustee to manage and sell parcels of realty on such terms and at such times as trustee, within his discretion, should determine, evidence did not show that trustee, in refusing offer to purchase property at price subsequently shown to be adequate, did not exercise an honest judgment, and his estate was, therefore, not liable for damages for such refusal.

13. Trusts ⇨305

In action against trustee by beneficiaries of trust for accounting and for damages, finding that trustee had no opportunity to sell property involved at such prices as would have liquidated plaintiffs' indebtedness as provided by contract creating trust, or on such terms as trustee properly fixed, determined in effect, that a reasonable time for sale of property had not elapsed.

14. Evidence ⇨265(2)

In action against trustee for accounting and for breach of trust agreement in failing to sell realty for benefit of beneficiaries, trial court was not bound to accept trustee's admission in letter that he was holding land for higher price as conclusive of fact stated, even though not directly contradicted.

15. Trusts ⇨305

Even if offer was made to trustee for purchase of realty which trustee held for sale for benefit of beneficiaries of trust, it would be presumed that trustee exercised his judgment upon it and deemed price offered too low, and court could not say that he acted fraudulently or in bad faith in declining to sell.

16. Trusts ⇨191(3)

Even if lands held by trustee under agreement to sell at prices sufficient to pay debts of beneficiaries of trust and leave a substantial surplus could have been so sold by trustee, trustee's failure to sell would not necessarily establish his bad faith or breach of duty if refusal to sell was because of belief that market would improve, in absence of evidence that beneficiaries ever urged trustee to sell at best prices obtainable or that they were not satisfied to rely on his judgment.

Where, under agreement under which beneficiaries had conveyed lands to trustee for management and sale thereof and to pay beneficiaries' indebtedness, beneficiaries had no right to control trustee's discretion as to time or conditions of sale, fact that beneficiaries made no protest against his failure to make sale indicated that beneficiaries did not then question either trustee's good faith or his good judgment.

18. Trusts ⇨191(3)

The exercise of mistaken judgment by trustee vested with large discretion in the sale of realty and terms and conditions of sale is not necessarily "unreasonable judgment", nor is it equivalent of "bad faith", as respects right to charge trustee or his estate.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Bad Faith" and "Unreasonable Judgment".

19. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1)

In action against trustee for accounting under agreement empowering trustee to sell lands to pay beneficiaries' indebtedness and to pay any balance and to reconvey any unsold property to them, evidence on issue of trustee's good faith in refusing or failing to sell property, or in selling at an inadequate price, presented questions for trial court.

20. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)

Trial court's fact findings supported by adequate evidence cannot be disturbed.

21. Trusts ⇨231(2)

Where agreement creating trust was executed because of trustee's promise not to humiliate plaintiffs by recording notice of default under trust deed securing money he had advanced and plaintiffs' expectation that proceeds of sales by trustee would be greater than could be obtained at foreclosure sales, and trustee, to avoid recording of notice of default, necessarily acquired notes secured by trust deed, and his purchase of notes secured by other trust deeds was perhaps necessary to avoid foreclosure sales, trustee was not guilty of breach of trust on theory that he "acquired an interest adverse to the trust," within statutory prohibition. Civ.Code, § 2233.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Acquired an Interest Adverse to the Trust".

On an accounting, trustee has burden to establish correctness of his accounts.

23. Trusts ⇨305

It is duty of trustee to support every item of his account by satisfactory evidence or the item must be disallowed.

24. Trusts ⇨305

The rule requiring trustee to support every item of his account or have the item disallowed goes merely to items in the account, and does not require trustee to anticipate and defend against charges of malfeasance not arising from anything on face of accounts, but grounded on other matters, and does not relieve plaintiff suing trustee for fraud and malfeasance from sustaining the burden of proving his charges.

25. Trusts ⇨305

A trustee is entitled to benefit of presumptions of regularity and good faith when his account is attacked.

26. Trusts ⇨305

Where deceased trustee's executor presented his account and produced evidence that items of receipts and disbursements were correct in amount and were for proper purposes, trustee was entitled to benefit of presumption of good faith, and court properly made in its findings a complete account based on such account, as against contention that trustee should have been required to justify affirmatively his failure to make sales of trust property under contract creating trust.

Action by Henry H. Neel and others against Charles Barnard for an accounting as trustee under an agreement between the parties and for damages, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. The named plaintiff and named defendant having died after commencement of the action, Thomas W. Neel, as executor of the last will of Henry H. Neel, deceased, was substituted as plaintiff for the deceased plaintiff, and Morris H. Barnard was substituted as executor of the last will of Charles Barnard, deceased, and Bertha Barnard Alvord, as executrix of the last will of Gertrude Irene Hall Barnard, deceased wife of original deceased defendant, was also made defendant. PER CURIAM.

A petition for hearing in this case was granted to the end that further consideration be given to the contentions of the appellants. On such consideration, we agree with the disposition of the appeal by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division Three, and adopt as the opinion of this court the opinion of that court prepared by the Honorable Hartley Shaw, Justice pro tem. It is as follows:

"This action was commenced by Henry H. Neel, Thomas W. Neel, his son, and Dessie L. Neel, wife of Thomas, against Chas. Barnard. After the action was begun, plaintiff Henry H. Neel and defendant Chas. Barnard died, the executors of their respective estates were substituted for them, and the executrix of the deceased wife of Barnard was also made a defendant. In discussing the case we shall use the terms 'plaintiffs' and 'defendants' to refer to the original parties, except as otherwise specially stated. The present plaintiffs appeal from a judgment in favor of the present defendants.

"This action arose from a contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant by which, as plaintiffs claim and the trial court found, the defendant became a trustee for plaintiffs, and was based upon certain claimed breaches of duty by defendant as such trustee. The contract consisted of a letter written by defendant to H. H. Neel and T. W. Neel, two of the plaintiffs, dated December 23, 1930, and a more formal agreement naming all the plaintiffs as parties of the first part and defendant as party of the second part, dated December 26, 1930, and signed by all of them. The letter transmitted the agreement to plaintiffs and referred to it in such fashion as to make both, as the trial court found, parts of the one contract between the parties. Also a part of the transaction was a deed, dated December 26, 1930, by which the plaintiffs conveyed to defendant, without qualification or restriction of any sort, their real property hereinafter mentioned.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; L. N. Turrentine, Judge assigned.

"At and prior to the time of executing this contract plaintiffs were the owners of approximately 245 acres of valuable farming land in Ventura County, mostly used for the purpose of producing walnuts, with some of it in beans and other crops. Only 10 acres of this land were owned by plaintiffs Thomas W. Neel and Dessie L. Neel, the balance being the property of plaintiff Henry H. Neel, who was a widower. At the time of this transaction this land was subject to trust deeds for money loaned to the plaintiffs, a large part of it by the defendant but some of it by others, amounting, with advances also secured by the trust deeds, to $228,260.92, as of March 31, 1931, according to the recitals of the agreement above mentioned, which projected the balances to include interest to that date. Payment of this sum and interest thereon was in default, in part, the trust deeds were subject to foreclosure, and plaintiffs were looking for some mode of refinancing their debts or otherwise saving themselves from the complete loss of their property which seemed impending.

"The letter and agreement above mentioned recited the facts regarding the loans, the incumbrances and the default in all the detail necessary to a complete statement, provided for the execution of the deed above referred to, and declared that plaintiffs had received no consideration for the deed. By the agreement the plaintiffs gave the defendant 'full authority and power irrevocable to sell, lease or otherwise dispose of any part of or all of said real property, or any interest or estate therein, in such pieces or parcels, and for such prices and upon such terms and conditions as the party of the second part may deem proper, and to enter into contracts, and execute all papers as may be proper or necessary in order to carry out and consummate said sale or sales, and upon receipt of the purchase price, either in cash or part of the purchase price in cash and the payment of the remainder to be secured by a mortgage or deed of trust upon the property so sold, to execute and deliver to the respective purchaser all necessary and proper contracts, bonds and deeds of conveyance for the lands so sold which are or may be necessary or proper to fully carry out and complete the transfer of the property so sold and to be in such form and under such conditions as the party of the second part may deem proper.' Plaintiffs also authorized the sale of personal property used on the realty and of water stock appurtenant to it. In the agreement plaintiffs stated their 'confidence and trust in the integrity and honesty' of defendant and their belief, by reason thereof, that 'the disposition and sale of said real property and the payment of their indebtedness * * * can be more expeditiously accomplished, at less cost, expense and for a greater value than can possibly be made' on a foreclosure sale and that the proceeds of sale will probably be in excess of the debts 'if the management and sale of said real property is intrusted to' defendant. The defendant agreed 'that when the proceeds from the sale of said real property is ample and sufficient to pay the indebtedness herein described, and the advances, costs and expenses in the care and management of said real property, he will then make a full report and accounting' to the plaintiffs 'of all the receipts and disbursements made and upon approval and acceptance of said report' the defendant will reconvey to plaintiffs 'all the real property remaining unsold, if any; * * * and upon acceptance and approval of said final report * * * he shall be released and discharged from all confidence created by the acceptance of said grant to said real property.' Another term of the agreement was that the proceeds of sales and the income from the property 'shall be applied to the payment of the indebtedness herein described, the interest to accrue thereon, and the disbursements made by * * * [defendant] in the care and management of said real property, and for no other purpose.' It was also agreed that defendant was to receive compensation for his services. Pursuant to this contract defendant took possession of the property described in it and has held and operated that property ever since, except two parcels which he sold.

[1,2] "Defendant contends that this agreement did not create a trust, but merely made of defendant a mortgagee in possession. The trial court, however, treated defendant as a trustee and we are satisfied that this view of the matter is correct. It is true the defendant, in his letter, referred to the fact that the deed was without limitation or qualification, saying also 'I decline to enter into any trust agreement, or declaration of trust'; but in this respect he was like Byron's maid who 'whispering "she would ne'er consent," consented.' The defendant was not even named as the lender and beneficiary in some of the trust deeds recited in the agreement, and many of the notes originally made to him as payee had at the date of the agreement been transferred to others. The powers given him by the contract far exceeded those of a mortgagee in possession. The relationship created by the contract has all the earmarks of a voluntary trust and must be so regarded. There is a transfer of property by plaintiffs to defendant, motivated by their personal confidence reposed in him, for the purpose of enabling him to carry out certain purposes for the benefit of plaintiffs as well as the holders of the indebtedness, which is voluntarily accepted by defendant, and he assumes an obligation to carry out these purposes, subject of course to the discretion provided for in the agreement; all in writing. This is sufficient to create a voluntary trust and make defendant a trustee. Civ.Code, §§ 852, 2216, 2219, 2221, 2222. No particular language or terminology is necessary to create a trust; nor need the word 'trust' or 'trustee' be used. Weiner v. Mullaney, 1943, 59 Cal.App.2d 620, 631, 140 P.2d 704.

[3] "Many of the points made by appellants are based upon the claim, which permeates their briefs, that the defendant, a short time after the trust was created, repudiated and abandoned it, claimed the trust property as his own and from that time forward treated the property as if there were no trust and the conveyance to him had been absolute, the plaintiffs further asserting that by such conduct defendant committed a conversion of the trust property and must be charged with the value of the property as of the date of repudiation. In reply the respondents contend that this claim of appellants is not within the scope of the complaint filed by plaintiffs or of the claim presented to the estate of the original defendant. These two points merge into one, for when, by reason of the death of the original defendant before the trial, it became necessary to file a claim against his estate (Prob. Code, § 709) the claim filed was simply a copy of the plaintiffs' complaint herein. There is no room here for the application of the rule that prevails where an issue not made by the pleading is tried by consent, even if that rule could be applied to a variance from the claim filed, for defendant made timely objection to the evidence on which appellants found their contentions in this matter.

"The complaint contained two statements of causes of action. The first alleged the creation of the trust, stating the surrounding circumstances including defendant's superior knowledge and skill in the management and sale of property such as that of plaintiffs and plaintiffs' great trust and confidence in defendant, setting forth copies of defendant's letter and of plaintiffs' deed to him and giving what the plaintiffs understood to be the legal effect of the agreement, a copy of which they alleged they had been unable to find. This stated legal effect, while lacking many of the details of the actual agreement, did not differ from it in any respect material to the present inquiry. This count also alleged that defendant had made two sales of described portions of the land plaintiffs had conveyed to him, and that he had received income, rents and profits from the land conveyed to him which were in excess of the costs of operation, that he had failed and refused to render an account and plaintiffs had demanded one. This count further alleged that defendant became trustee for the plaintiffs, that plaintiffs had done everything required of them by the contract, and that defendant had 'failed, refused and neglected to properly perform and discharge his duties as trustee, in that' he had failed and refused to account.

"The second statement of a cause of action began by incorporating the first. Then it alleged that by the contract between the parties it was agreed that defendant would 'diligently and expeditiously sell so much of said * * * properties as would liquidate and satisfy the said indebtedness then owed by the plaintiffs; that by reason thereof it was the duty and obligation of the said Chas. Barnard to sell, transfer and dispose of so much of said real properties within a reasonable time as would liquidate said indebtedness; that there was at said time an active market for the disposal of said real property, and at such prices as would have liquidated said indebtedness then owed by plaintiffs and which would have left a balance either in money or property for the plaintiffs of approximately two hundred thousand dollars.' Then followed allegations that defendant had at various times not stated received bona fide offers from cash buyers for various parts of the property, which would have enabled defendant to sell the entire property for more than $400,000, but he 'refused to sell, transfer and dispose of certain parcels of said * * * properties' and if he had sold them plaintiffs would have been restored to the occupation and possession of certain parcels of said real properties and would have received the rents, issues, incomes and profits therefrom, and all to plaintiffs' damage in the sum of two hundred thousand dollars.' The second count then alleged facts regarding each sale made by defendant, showing that in each case the sale had been made for much less than the market value, to plaintiffs' damage in the aggregate sum of $37,619.28. Finally, it alleged that 'by reason of the failure, refusal and neglect on the part of said Chas. Barnard to sell and dispose of said real properties within a reasonable time after taking the record title thereto,' interest on plaintiffs' indebtedness had accumulated and increased in the sum of $100,000, but if he had made sales within a reasonable time $85,000 would have been credited thereon, to their further damage in the sum of $85,000. Prayer was for an accounting, that upon the accounting defendant be required 'to pay, convey and deliver to said plaintiffs property cash that may be due them,' and for damages in the sum of $322,619.28.

[4] "The action, as characterized by the complaint, goes far beyond an effort to follow and reclaim a specific fund or specific property. It asserts a general liability against defendant, to be satisfied out of the assets of his estate, whatever they may be, and arising out of the contract pleaded. It is therefore subject to the provisions of Probate Code, section 709, requiring the filing of a claim where an action is pending at the time of a decedent's death. See 11A Cal.Jur. 706, 711, 712. This conclusion is even more obvious as applied to appellants' theory of a repudiation of the trust, leading to a liability for the value of the property, for this theory involves an abandonment of the property by plaintiffs.

[5] "Neither of the causes of action stated in the complaint constituting plaintiffs' claim said anything of a repudiation of the trust. The first was solely and simply an action to obtain an accounting. The second added to the first four items of damage which plaintiffs sought to recover; that is, $200,000 arising from defendant's failure and refusal to sell the property for enough to liquidate plaintiffs' indebtedness and leave them a balance of $200,000; $6,619.28 and $31,000 caused by defendant's sales of two properties for less than their value; and $85,000 for interest, which accrued on plaintiffs' debts by reason of defendant's delay in selling. We cannot see how any of these allegations even hints at, or can be regarded by any sort of implication as including, a repudiation of the trust by defendant, with concomitant claim to hold the property in his own right, free of any trust.

[6-9] "The provision that the holder of a claim against an estate cannot maintain an action thereon unless the claim is first presented is equivalent to a declaration that he cannot maintain an action upon any claim that he has not first presented for allowance, and that in any action brought he can recover only upon the claim which has been presented and rejected. This rule is settled by a long line of decisions. The claim as presented and passed upon is the foundation of the cause of action. The claimant's cause of action arises upon the claim in the form in which it has been presented; that is the only action he may maintain, and plaintiff is not permitted to prove a cause of action other than or different from that stated in the claim, or to amend his complaint so as to set up any other cause of action.' 11A Cal.Jur. 865-867; to same effect see cases cited in notes to Cal.Jur.

A claim must 'sufficiently indicate the nature and amount of the demand to enable the executor and judge in probate to act advisedly upon it.' Thompson v. Koeller, 1920, 183 Cal. 476, 485, 191 P. 927, 930. Applying these rules to the present case, we conclude that the plaintiffs' claim as filed did not cover their present claim of a repudiation of the trust and a consequent liability of defendant's estate for the then value of the trust property. There was nothing in it to suggest that any such liability was to be asserted, and the executor was therefore not put in a position to act advisedly upon the claim as now made. For this reason we dismiss the claim of repudiation from our attention in giving further consideration to the appeal.

"The complaint and the claim do, however, clearly present the point that it was the duty of defendant to sell the trust property, or so much of it as was necessary, in a reasonable time, that he failed to do so, and that by reason of such failure the plaintiffs suffered damage. The trial court put a construction on the contract which contravenes plaintiffs' contention, in this finding: 'That it was not the duty or obligation of Chas. Barnard to sell, transfer and dispose of so much of the real property involved herein within a reasonable time as would liquidate said indebtedness, but that it was his duty to offer said properties for sale at what he deemed a reasonable and fair price in an endeavor and an attempt to liquidate said indebtedness within a reasonable time and have a substantial sum left over to pay to the Neels, or in case of a liquidation by sale of a part of the property, to return the remaining properties to the plaintiffs.' We shall not undertake to decide whether the construction thus put on the contract in regard to defendant's duty to sell within a reasonable time is correct; for assuming plaintiffs' construction to be the true one, that is, that it was the defendant's duty to make sufficient sales within a reasonable time to liquidate plaintiffs' indebtedness, other findings and other terms of the contract are such that an error in the finding just quoted would not lead to a reversal.

[10] "Much of plaintiffs' argument on this point is based on the further finding that the defendant had 'an opportunity to sell the 89 acre tract (part of the land conveyed to defendant by plaintiffs) for a net sum of $133,000 (the offer of $140,000 being subject to a 5 per cent real estate commission) which offer was made in January of 1931, and which was refused * * *.' This is coupled with the further finding that 'at said time and place defendant offered to sell said property to the same person for $150,000 cash, which offer was likewise refused. That said offers and refusals were not made in violation of the terms of the contract, but in the exercise of an honest judgment and discretion made and exercised in good faith.' The contract, while it may have required a sale within a reasonable time, conferred a large amount of discretion on the defendant regarding the prices, terms and conditions of sale. The question, what was a reasonable time, is inextricably bound up with his exercise of discretion in these matters, and the time might vary accordingly. Defendant's mere failure to make a sale, even if, as plaintiffs contend was the case here, the price was adequate, as viewed from the standpoint of the present and the information on market conditions and trends now available, does not necessarily convict him of a breach of duty as trustee, for his discretion would properly take other matters into consideration.

[11, 12] "By the formal agreement defendant is given power to sell the land 'in such pieces or parcels, and for such prices and upon such terms and conditions as the party of the second part [defendant] may deem proper,' and in the letter defendant stated 'I must have the total and absolute control of the entire property as to its care, management, recital [so reads the record; perhaps 'rental' is intended] and sale or as to the disposition of the proceeds from the income or the proceeds or as to the disposition of the proceeds from a sale, and certainly there must be no restriction as to a sale and conveyance under such terms and conditions, as I may deem proper for as to those matters, I am to be the sole judge.' By these provisions the defendant is given an absolute discretion, whose exercise cannot be reviewed or controlled by any other person or tribunal on consideration going to the soundness of the judgment exercised by him. Civ.Code, § 2269. No doubt his exercise of this discretion could be attacked for fraud or bad faith, but we discover no evidence which requires a finding of fraud or bad faith, contrary to the trial court's finding of good faith, in regard to the offer mentioned in the finding above quoted. This offer was made in January, 1931, within a month of the execution of the contract between plaintiffs and defendant. There is evidence that real estate values in the vicinity of this land dropped greatly in the latter part of 1931 and thereafter, but we find nothing to show defendant was not exercising an honest judgment when he refused the price offered him in January of that year.

it is untrue that on or about December 26, 1930, or at any time thereafter, there was an active market for the disposal of said real property, but it is true that there were only occasional sales of like properties, similarly situated, and that there was not an active market for said properties at any time subsequent to December 26, 1930, and it is untrue that the defendants had an opportunity to sell any or all of said properties at such price as would have liquidated the indebtedness owed by plaintiffs to defendants and which would have left a balance either in money or property of plaintiffs of approximately $200,000.00 or any other sums. That the two sales made by plaintiff were made in the due course of business and were the only one which could have been made other than an opportunity to sell the 89 acre tract * * * (here follows the finding already quoted regarding this offer). Upon examining the evidence we see therein sufficient support for this finding, which it seems unnecessary to set forth here, to the mere lengthening of this opinion. Conditions of depression during the time in question are so well known that little proof of them is necessary. This finding while it does not directly pass upon the question of reasonable time, does in effect dispose of it; for if the property could not have been sold, on such terms as defendant properly determined, a reasonable time for sale had not elapsed. Plaintiffs point to a letter of defendant written in January, 1931, stating that he had declined an offer for a 24 acre tract. No details of this offer appear except the price, and as to that the letter stated that defendant was holding the land for a higher price. Evidently the trial court did not accept this admission as proving the fact admitted, for it found that no such sale could have been made. The trial court was not bound to accept such an admission as conclusive of the fact, even though it was not directly contradicted. But even if the offer was made, it is to be presumed that defendant exercised his judgment upon it and deemed the price too low, and we cannot say he was guilty of fraud or bad faith in declining to sell.

[16-18] "Even if, as plaintiffs contend, the properties could have been sold for enough to pay the debts and leave a substantial surplus, defendant's failure to sell would not necessarily convict him of bad faith or breach of duty. It was not necessarily unreasonable for him to believe that the market would improve, and the court may well have concluded that plaintiffs shared that belief. There was no evidence that plaintiffs ever urged defendant to close the properties out at the best prices obtainable or that they were not satisfied to rely upon his judgment. It is true that they had no right to control defendant's action, but the fact that they made no protest against his failure to make sales indicates that they did not then question either his good faith or his good judgment. Furthermore, mistaken judgment is not necessarily unreasonable judgment and of course neither is the equivalent of bad faith.

[19,20] "In regard to this issue of fraud and bad faith, which is raised as to all of defendant's acts in accepting and carrying out the trust, and particularly as against the court's finding 'That it is untrue that the defendant, Chas. Barnard, acting as trustee or otherwise under the contract herein, has failed, refused and neglected, or failed, refused or neglected, to properly perform and discharge his duty as trustee,' there are circumstances pointed out by plaintiffs which tend to cast some doubt on defendant's complete bona fides, and if the trial court had made findings in plaintiffs' favor on this issue, perhaps they could have been sustained. But on a consideration of all these matters and of the evidence as a whole we are of the opinion that the question was one for resolution by the trial court and that its decision in favor of defendant has adequate support in the evidence and cannot be disturbed by us. The record is so voluminous and consists so largely of documentary matter that it would unduly prolong this opinion to set forth even a synopsis of the evidence on this point; we have, however, considered everything to which our attention is directed by the parties, with the result already stated.

[21] "Complaint is made that defendant was guilty of a breach of trust because he acquired the notes secured by the various trust deeds incumbering the property deeded to him, this being called the acquiring of an interest adverse to the trust, which is prohibited by section 2233 of the Civil Code. The trial court found that this was done 'pursuant to the contract' between the parties, and we think this finding is supported. Defendant had been the payee of notes amounting to $160,000 and secured by trust deeds of plaintiffs' land, and had sold them to others with his endorsement, so that upon the default which is recited in the contract he could be compelled by the holders to take them up. The motives inducing plaintiffs to execute the contract, as expressly recited in the formal agreement, were the promise of defendant not to humiliate or embarrass them by recording a notice of default under the trust deed securing the money he had advanced and their expectation that the proceeds of sales by defendant would probably be greater than could be obtained at foreclosure sales and greater than the amount required to pay their indebtedness. The agreement also mentions disbursements to be made by defendant in the care and management of the property. The defendant's letter transmitting the agreement stated that 'all my future investments will be for the care and protection of the property' and that 'it will be necessary to invest much additional capital before we can complete the entire matter.' If defendant was to avoid the recording of a notice of default on the trust deed running to himself, he must, of necessity, obtain the notes secured by it; and the purchase of notes secured by other trust deeds would be advisable and perhaps necessary to avoid the foreclosure sales, in accordance with the purpose of the contract.

[22-26] "Plaintiffs further complain that defendant should have been required to assume the burden of proof on the accounting. At the trial defendant presented an account and produced evidence in support of the items contained in it, such as tended to show that the items of receipts and disbursements were correct in amount and that the disbursements claimed were for proper purposes, and on this evidence the court made and stated in its findings a complete account, which differed in some respects from that submitted by defendant. Plaintiffs' point here is not, as we understand it, directed at the proceedings on the account so stated and does not involve the claim that evidence is lacking to support the findings as to the items included by the court in its account. The contention is, rather, that the defendant should have been required to justify affirmatively his failure to make sales of the trust property. On an accounting for a trust, the trustee does have a burden to establish the correctness of his accounts, but the rule does not go so far as plaintiffs claim. Their main reliance in support of the claim is Purdy v. Johnson, 1917, 174 Cal. 521, 527, 163 P. 893, 896. That was an action against trustees for an accounting and other appropriate relief. The trustees presented an account to the court, and were cross-examined by the plaintiffs there in regard to the items in it, but apparently produced no evidence in its support. Of this procedure the court said: 'We think the course pursued was irregular. * * * The entire trial was conducted upon the erroneous theory that the burden of proof was upon the beneficiary to point out the particulars in which the account was erroneous, and that she was bound to go forward and establish affirmatively the impropriety of the charges and credits which she assailed. Such is not the law * * * in fact, the burden is upon the trustees to prove that charges made by them are proper.' As a final statement of the rule in this respect the court declared, at page 531 of 174 Cal., at page 897 of 163 P., 'that it is the duty of the trustees to support every item of their account, and that, wherever they fail to support the correctness of a charge or credit by satisfactory evidence, the item must be disallowed.' All of this the defendant here did. This rule goes merely to items in the account. It does not require the trustee to anticipate and defend against charges of dereliction of duty and malfeasance which do not arise from anything on the face of his accounts but are grounded on other matters. It does not remove from a plaintiff who sues a trustee on charges of fraud and malfeasance the burden, which the law would cast on him in case of another defendant, of proving his charges. The trustee is entitled to the benefit of the presumptions of regularity and good faith. See Estate of Vance, 1940, 141 Cal. 624, 626, 75 P. 323; Burke v. Maguire, 1908, 154 Cal. 456, 468, 98 P. 21.

"Many other points are made and argued in the 762 pages of briefs filed herein, but they relate to the contention that there was a repudiation of the trust and to the weight of the evidence and a discussion of them here is not deemed necessary in a disposition of this appeal."

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

An "independent contractor" is a person who is engaged in an independent employment or occupation, responsible to his principal only for the result and not for the manner or means by which it is accomplished.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Independent Contractor".

2. Master and servant ☞5

In determining whether an individual is an employee or an independent contractor, the most important factor is the right to control the manner and means of accomplishing the result desired, and, if the employer has the power to exercise complete control, whether exercised with respect to all details or not, an employer-employee relationship exists.

3. Master and servant ☞6

Employer's right to discharge at will without cause is strong evidence of employer's control over the manner and means of performing the work, on question whether relationship of employer and employee exist.

4. Taxation ☞59

Where publisher of a shopping news devoted to advertising merchandise had the right to and did exercise entire control of manner and time of distribution of the paper by minor carriers and had right to discharge at will, the carriers were not "independent contractors" but were "employees" within meaning of Unemployment Insurance Act. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; O. K. Morton, Judge Assigned.

Action by California Employment Commission against Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News Corporation for unemployment fund contributions. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Prior opinion 139 P.2d 342.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, Henry F. Prince, and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., Clarence A. Linn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Forrest M. Hill and Doris H. Maier, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

EDMONDS, Justice.

Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News, owned by the appellant corporation, is a publication devoted to the advertising of retail merchants. It has no subscribers but, without charge, regularly on Wednesday and Saturday of each week, carriers leave a paper at each dwelling house within certain designated territories. The Employment Commission (formerly the Unemployment Reserves Commission) has ruled that these carriers are employees within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act (formerly the Unemployment Reserves Act, Stats. 1935, chap. 352, p. 1226, as amended; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1935 Supp., Act 8780d, as amended) and sued the publisher for the amount assertedly due as contributions to the unemployment fund. The corporation's appeal is from a judgment in favor of the commission.

The paper has been published since 1922, and at the date of the trial was distributed by about 1,000 boys, selected by the corporation, more than 90 per cent of whom were under 18 years of age. They had no written contract but were assigned to specific routes under an oral agreement terminable at the will of either the publisher or the carrier. Each boy was required to obtain a work permit from the school authorities. Compensation ranged from $2.00 to $2.50 per week, depending upon the route to which the boy was assigned.

The distribution area was divided into districts, each in charge of a manager responsible to the publisher's circulation manager. Reporting to the district manager were inspectors, each having approximately 10 routes under his jurisdiction. The inspector supervised the delivery of the paper by the carriers and required compliance with the rules and instruction of the publisher. Since 1938 there have been junior inspectors to assist in directing the delivery system.

The publisher's truck delivered the papers to specified places, where each carrier checked in with his junior inspector and received his allotment with a Shopping News bag. The boy was required to walk the route and could not use skates, a bicycle or other means of conveyance. The delivery rules specified how the paper should be placed at each residence and the boys were instructed not to walk on lawns, or in flower beds. They were permitted to have one helper, approved by the Shopping News. Each boy was required to complete the delivery of the papers on his route by 8 a. m. on Wednesdays and 9 a. m. on Saturdays. He then reported whether he was short or over in the number of papers delivered. The inspectors checked all complaints made regarding the manner in which papers were delivered and the boys were subject to dismissal for failure to comply with the publisher's instructions.

Upon these facts, the superior court found that Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News Corporation had the right of potential and actual control over the carriers as to the manner and means of the performance of their work in connection with the distribution and delivery of the Shopping News and other advertising matter which was from time to time delivered by them. These carriers were not independent contractors, the court declared, and it concluded that the publisher was an employer within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act, supra, and subject to its provisions during the years 1936, 1937 and 1938. Judgment accordingly was rendered in favor of the commission in the amount payable for the period not barred by the statute of limitations. Code Civ. Proc. § 338.

The appellant contends that the carrier boys were independent contractors and not in "employment" within the meaning of section 6.5 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, supra. And the term "employment" as used in that statute, says the publisher, must be read with the same meaning which it had generally under the law of California at the time the unemployment legislation was adopted. But if the boys were in "employment," the argument continues, the act is inapplicable to them because the express terms used by the Legislature evidence an intention to exclude from the operation of the enactment persons earning less than the minimum amount entitling them to benefits under its provisions, and particularly to school boys earning "pocket money" through part time employment. The commission takes the position that the act not only includes the persons who are employers or employees, as judicially defined at the time the act became effective, but also those in "any relationship where the income of an individual is dependent upon the will of another." If the act is limited in its application to the employer-employee relationship, the commission declares, the finding of the trial court, that such relationship existed, should be sustained, and the judgment affirmed upon the ground that the carriers in "employment" under the act, received remuneration which constituted "taxable wages."

his principal only for the result and not for the manner or means by which it is accomplished. Moody v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 204 Cal. 668, 269 P. 542, 60 A.L.R. 299. In determining whether an individual is an employee or an independent contractor, the most important factor is the right to control the manner and means of accomplishing the result desired. If the employer has the power to exercise complete control, whether or not that potential control is exercised with respect to all details, an employer-employee relationship exists. S. A. Gerrard Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 17 Cal.2d 411, 110 P.2d 377; Murray v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 216 Cal. 340, 14 P.2d 301; Moody v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra; Hillen v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570; Press Publishing Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 190 Cal. 114, 210 P. 820; Claremont Country Club v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 174 Cal. 395, 163 P. 209, L.R.A.1918F, 177; Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 P. 491, Ann.Cas.1917E, 390; Rest.Agency, § 2. And strong evidence of the employer's control is his right to discharge at will, without cause. Globe Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 208 Cal. 715, 284 P. 661; Press Publishing Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra; Melone v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 9 Cal.App.2d 569, 50 P.2d 503; Call Publishing Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 89 Cal.App. 194, 264 P. 300.

[4] In the present case there is substantial evidence to support the findings of the trial court that the boys were employees within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act, supra. As defined by that statute, the term "employment" means "service * * * performed for wages or under any contract of hire written or oral, express or implied." § 6.5, as amended in 1937, St.1937, P. 2056. The testimony clearly shows that the publisher of Shopping News had the right to entirely control the manner and time of its distribution. Although the carriers were allowed to cover their routes in the manner they chose with reference to the point of starting and ending, the corporation not only reserved the right to direct the boys' work in almost every other detail but it exercised that right. Moreover, a boy's employment was terminable either without cause or for noncompliance with the corporation's requirements as to delivery of the paper. Certainly, under these circumstances, there is no basis for a determination that the boys were independent contractors.

[5] Turning to the second point presented by the appellant, it is earnestly urged that if the boys who worked during the period specified by the complaint were "employees" within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act, supra, the legislation is nevertheless inapplicable to them by reason of its express terms. In support of this contention, the publisher points to the provisions of the statute which state the basis for the legislation and specify the persons who are eligible for benefits from the unemployment fund.

Section 1 of the statute declares that, due to the lack of "permanent employment" by large numbers of persons, "by reason of which their purchasing power is unstable," those who contribute to the production and distribution of "consumption goods" are unable to purchase them and, since private charity and local relief are inadequate to prevent the harmful effects of unemployment, "this act is designed to accumulate a reserve to assist in protecting * * * against * * * unemployment * * *." By the amendment to this section adopted in 1939, p. 1968, the Legislature stated that the purpose of the unemployment insurance fund was to provide "benefits for persons unemployed through no fault of their own. * * *." Originally a worker was eligible to receive a weekly benefit whenever his wages were less than the amount to which he would be entitled if totally unemployed. Commencing in 1937, an employee must have earned at least $156 for the preceding year in order to qualify for benefits. Since 1939, the base has been $300. Deering's Gen. Laws, 1937, Act 8780d, § 56, and 1939 Supp. Act 8780d, § 57, and an "unemployed" person may earn as much as $3.00 a week without affecting his right to benefits. The term "employment" is broadly defined, with certain specified exceptions such as agricultural labor, domestic work in a household, and public service.

The only provision concerning minors excludes from the definition of "employment" the "service performed by a child * * * in the employ of his father or mother" § 7(d), and unless it may be said that a person earning less than the amount entitling him to benefits is not an employee within the meaning of the statute, the publisher must pay contributions based upon the wages of the carriers who worked for it during the years 1936, 1937 and 1938. The record shows that a few of the boys working for Shopping News had employment other than that as a carrier and earned total wages exceeding the minimum amount which determines eligibility. However, one who pays a worker wages amounting to less than that minimum is not excused from making contributions based upon the amount of such compensation, for it must be presumed that the Legislature has included within its enumeration of the services not included in the term "employment," all of the persons whose earnings shall not be subjected to the payment of contributions.

[6-8] The legislation constitutes a valid exercise of the state's taxing power (Car-michael v. Southern Coal & Coke Co., 301 U.S. 495, 57 S.Ct. 868, 81 L.Ed. 1245, 109 A.L.R. 1327; Gillum v. Johnson, 7 Cal.2d 744, 62 P.2d 1037, 63 P.2d 810, 108 A.L.R. 595), and its objects and purposes are not limited to the raising of revenue. It is a remedial statute and as such must be liberally construed for the purpose of accomplishing its objects. California Employment Comm. v. Black-Foxe Military Institute, 43 Cal.App.2d Supp. 868, 110 P.2d 729; Los Angeles County v. Frisbie, 19 Cal.2d 634, 122 P.2d 526. Certainly the appellant's conclusion that the legislation was intended only to apply to persons regularly engaged in "permanent employment" in the distribution and production of "consumption goods," and was enacted to provide unemployment insurance for the benefit of persons ordinarily in "permanent employment" who, due to economic conditions, are "unemployed through no fault of their own," places a much too narrow interpretation upon the language of the act. However, it should be noted that no constitutional question has been presented in this case. On the contrary, the parties have proceeded upon the theory that the legislation, insofar as it taxes the wages of the carriers, meets all constitutional tests.

The judgment is affirmed.

CURTIS, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. As I understand the majority opinion, it requires an employer to pay contributions and to make deductions from wages of employees in support of the unemployment fund, although such employees' wages are less than the minimum entitling them to receive the benefits of the California Unemployment Insurance Act upon becoming unemployed. Stats.1935, chap. 352, p. 1226, as amended; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1935 Supp., Act 8780d, p. 2039, as amended. I do not believe that a reasonable interpretation of this legislation sustains such a conclusion.

The act is an integrated and self-contained aggregation of rules, built one upon the other, all of which rules are phrased in certain terms, which in turn are carefully and artificially defined. Each clause of the statute must be read in the light of all the rest of the statute—most particularly in the light of the definitions.

As the problem is here presented, the disputed point is the identification of the "employer" who is liable for payment of contributions to the unemployment fund. In the first place, to be subject to the tax, the employer must employ individuals in the conventional legal sense; that is, the legal relationship of employer and employee must be established. Assuming, as the majority opinion in short holds, that the facts herein do establish such legal status, there still remains the question of whether the Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News is an "employer" within the special meaning of the act. Concededly, the specifically excepted services—such as agricultural labor or domestic work in a household—do not constitute "employment" under the act, and the employer of individuals in occupations which are so expressly without the coverage of the act would not be required to make contributions based on "wages" paid for such "employment." Upon like reasoning, no more liable as a taxpayer is the employer of individuals who are just as definitely excluded from the benefits of the act not by reason of the character of their work but by reason of their minimum earnings according to the declared operative schedule of the applicable legislation. Thus, at the time involved herein, an employee must have earned in the preceding year not less than $156 in order to qualify for benefits (Stats.1937, ch. 743, p. 2064, Deering's Gen. Laws, 1937, vol. 2, Act 8780d, § 56, p. 4136)—a sum considerably more than the yearly aggregate of newsboy carriers receiving $2.00 to $2.50 per week and denoting the base pay for services which would be deemed "employment" within the meaning of the act.

The legislative scheme manifestly contemplates that the taxable pay roll should relate to the "employment" of persons entitled to the benefits of the act, and that the respective contributions of the "employer" and "employee" must be measured accordingly. This plan has been followed and emphasized in pertinent additions to the act. In 1939 section 9.2 was adopted to provide: "An individual shall be deemed 'unemployed' in any week during which he performs no services and with respect to which no wages are payable to him, or in any week of less than full-time work if the wages payable to him with respect to such week are less than his weekly benefit amount." Stats.1939, ch. 674, § 2, p. 2146, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1939 Supp., Act 8780d, § 9.2, p. 1702. At the same time the Legislature increased the base pay to $300, Stats.1939, ch. 674, § 13, p. 2151, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1939, Supp., Act 8780d, § 57(e), p. 1723, and provided that an "unemployed" person may earn as much as $3.00 a week without affecting his right to benefits. Stats.1939, ch. 674, § 12, p. 2150, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1939 Supp., Act 8780d, § 55, p. 1721. Thus the base pay determinative of eligibility to the unemployment benefits is even more clearly defined as the basis for computation of the "taxable pay roll" within the operative force of the act. Accordingly, a conceded employee earning less than $3.00 a week would be deemed "unemployed," and it necessarily follows that the respective percentage contributions from the "employer" and "employee" would not be required from such minimum compensation.

It is true, as the majority opinion notes, that the act "is a remedial statute and as such must be liberally construed for the purpose of accomplishing its objects"—the relief of unemployment—but it seems to be a clear perversion of legislative intent to assume that wages paid to persons expressly made ineligible to the protection of the act are nevertheless taxable. To so extend the operation of the statute to persons not within its letter appears to be not only improper, but likewise cause for challenge of its constitutionality. It is argued that since the contributions collected on wages go into a common fund for the purpose of paying unemployment insurance benefits, whether or not the person whose earnings are so taxed draws such benefits is of no importance. Claim of Cassaretakis, 289

The above noted cases are not persuasive of any other conclusion. First, in considering the Cassaretakis decision [289 N. Y. 119, 44 N.E.2d 395], it is pertinent to note the distinguishable feature of the New York Unemployment Insurance Law which puts the entire burden for contributions upon the employer. The question there presented was whether the New York statute was applicable to marine employments. In holding that employees in such work were within the protection of said law and entitled "to receive benefits upon becoming unemployed," the New York Court of Appeals at page 126 of 289 N.Y., at page 394 of 44 N.E.2d, made the following observation cited by the commission herein: "This tax is an excise based upon the exercise of the privilege of employing individuals. Citing the Carmichael and Steward cases, supra. The obligations of the employer under this law are not to his employees but to the State. Likewise, claimants of benefits assert their rights against the State and not against the employer. The employer's duty to pay contributions and the employee's right to receive benefits are independent of each other. The employer must continue to pay the tax although none of his employees ever becomes entitled to benefits through lack of employment; the employee has a right to receive benefits upon becoming unemployed although his employer has failed to contribute." (Italics added.) Significant in this language is the recognition that the employee within the scope of the act is the one entitled to its benefit features, and that the employer's payment of a nondiscriminatory excise tax based upon his exercise of the privilege of employing an individual to perform services for him is independent of his employee's right to the statutory coverage upon becoming unemployed. The decision thus stands for the desirability of construing a state unemployment insurance law to protect as many employments as are fairly within its scope and increase the number of potentially eligible recipients of benefits, but it does not touch upon the problem here presented where the legislative plan provides for contributions to be exacted from both the employer and employee upon the basis of a pay roll for services not excepted from the terms of the California act.

The Carmichael case, supra, sustained the constitutionality of the Alabama Unemployment Compensation Act, which was attacked on the following grounds: (1) That it infringed the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment; (2) that the state was coerced by the federal government in adopting the Social Security Act 42 U.S.C.A. § 301 et seq.; and (3) that it involved an unconstitutional surrender of power by the state to the federal government. Like the California statute, the Alabama act provides for contributions by employers and employees, and the pay-roll levy creating a fund for use for relief of unemployment was designated an "excise tax"—an exaction on the right, on the one hand, to employ, and, on the other hand, to be employed. Carmichael v. Southern Coal & Coke Co., supra, 301 U. S. 508, 57 S.Ct. 871, 81 L.Ed. 1245, 109 A.L.R. 1327; see, also, Gillum v. Johnson, 7 Cal. 2d 744, 763, 62 P.2d 1037, 63 P.2d 810, 108 A.L.R. 595. But in so upholding the Alabama Act insofar as the questions raised under the federal Constitution were concerned, the Carmichael case did not consider the propriety of including in the taxable pay roll wages of persons excluded from the benefits of the state unemployment insurance law. Rather that case assumes throughout that the base pay refers to "employment" within the coverage of the state law and that the burden on the employee is offset by his eligibility to the statutory benefits on becoming unemployed.

The Steward case, supra, upheld the validity of the tax imposed by the Social Security Act upon employers as within the power conferred upon Congress to levy an "excise" on the right to have individuals in employment, but necessarily under the scheme of the federal legislation involved the employee's relation to the taxable pay roll insofar as coverage was concerned was not considered. The distinguishable element of the California act is its manifest contemplation that only the wages of persons "in employment" as therein prescribed should be included in the taxable pay roll determinative of the contributions of both the employer and the employee.

As a further point to be noted here, the majority opinion states: "The record shows that a few of the boys working for Shopping News had employment other than that as a carrier and earned total wages exceeding the minimum amount which determines eligibility." Such observation as to the total earnings of a few of the newsboy carriers does not fortify the propriety of the judgment herein holding that the wages of all the newsboy carriers, the great majority of whom were receiving total wages less than "the minimum amount which determines eligibility" are to be included in the taxable pay roll. In my opinion, the ineligibility of a conceded employee to enjoy the protection of the act because not "in employment" within its meaning—whether by reason of the character of his work or the below minimum earnings—is a controlling factor in establishing the exclusion of his wages from the base pay roll determinative of the respective and related contributions of the employer and the employee.

Upon the premise of this interpretation of the Legislature's plan of unemployment relief as embodied in the act—that it does not apply where the employee upon becoming unemployed is without its benefit coverage—the judgment herein should be reversed.

EDMONDS, Justice.

California Employment Commission, formerly Unemployment Reserves Commission, which administers the Unemployment Insurance Acts (Stats.1935, Chap. 352, p. 1226, as amended; Deering's Gen.Laws, 1935 Supp., Act 8780d, as amended), sued for contributions assertedly payable upon the amounts earned by the carriers of the Pasadena Independent from 1936 to 1940. The trial court found that E. D. Bates and F. F. Runyon, the owners and publishers of the newspaper, were not employers within the meaning of the statute and that the carriers were independent contractors. The commission has appealed from the judgment rendered against it on these findings and the question presented for decision is substantially the same as that determined in California Employment Comm. v. Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News Corp., Cal.Sup., 150 P.2d 186.

The facts are undisputed. During the years for which contributions are claimed, respondents as copartners were engaged in the publication and distribution of the Pasadena Independent. In 1936 the Independent was judicially determined to be a newspaper of general circulation under section 4460 of the Political Code; it has not been admitted by the United States Post Office as second class mail matter. The publication was delivered on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays of each week throughout the city of Pasadena and vicinity by carrier boys, practically all of whom were under the age of 18 years. The city or general distribution area was divided into approximately 200 routes. Although the price of the paper was 15 cents per month, in the absence of a stop order or notice to the contrary, the carrier left a paper at each residence on his route regardless of whether or not a subscription had been obtained.

Some of the boys were assigned to routes upon an application to carry the paper. Often an applicant had to wait until a route was open. Carriers were also secured through advertisements, and very often a boy was referred to the paper by one who was then working for it. When a boy was selected, the terms of a standard contract were explained to him. This contract, with a letter of transmittal, was mailed to the boy's parents for their signatures. Under the contract the carrier acquired no right or ownership in his route or subscription list and he could be discharged at any time the respondents desired to do so.

The letter stated that the paper would require the boy to make delivery to every family on the route which might be assigned to him and to call on each one of them at the end of the month. He was expected to get as many new customers as possible, and in connection with that purpose, to attend monthly meetings for sales training. The letter also stated that a work permit issued by the school authorities would have to be obtained. No contract was made without the signatures of the boy's parents, although, in some cases, work was commenced before the contract was signed.

At the time the boy was engaged he was given a map of the route assigned to him, instructed generally as to his compensation, expected earnings, manner and method of delivery, the importance of attending sales meetings, and the method to follow in securing subscriptions. Boys without experience in the delivery of papers were told how the papers should be folded, carried on their bicycles and delivered. At an early hour of the morning of delivery days, the boys picked up the papers at street corners where they had been left by trucks. The carriers were not required to get the papers or to complete their delivery at any particular time but, of necessity, the routes had to be covered before school commenced. If a boy did not pick up his papers by 6 a. m., the district supervisors or inspector of the paper would call at the boy's home to ascertain the reason for his tardiness.

Practically all of the boys used bicycles, and although they were permitted to cover the route in any way they chose, the paper periodically issued bulletins or notices containing suggestions as to how a carrier might increase his efficiency and earning capacity. Six district supervisors or inspectors employed by the paper, each in charge of a particular number of routes, had charge of distribution. These men checked the boys' work, riding over each route. The paper required a report from the carrier upon each complaint concerning irregular delivery or improper conduct. If the publishers deemed the complaint was justified, a small fine was sometimes imposed upon the boy, but it was often remitted after explanation to the customer.

As compensation for his work, the carrier received one-half of his subscription collections with a guarantee of $5.00 per month. The collections were made in the last week of each month and the first week of the following month. Prior to each collection period, a meeting to which the respondents arranged transportation, was held at its offices. The carrier was then given the collection book for his route, and the circulation manager led a discussion concerning ways and means of improving delivery of the paper, increasing subscriptions and similar topics. The collection book consisted of a card for each resident on the route. The carrier was told to enter on the cards appropriate notations concerning the date of each call and whether a subscription was secured. As soon as a carrier had canvassed his route for subscriptions he prepared a collection summary sheet which, together with the collection book, was returned to the respondents' office for verification. If a carrier's book showed many calls and but few collections, another boy was sent to canvass the route. If a boy's collections were below average, the circulation manager discussed the situation with him. Occasionally such a boy was asked to take a short vacation; sometimes he was discharged. The books of respondents reflected separate accounts for each carrier, showing his earnings and collections, and an honor chart was maintained upon which the boys were rated for collections, complaints, and general efficiency. Boys with superior ratings received passes to theatres, free trips, merchandise, and bicycle tires.

The appellant commission contends the evidence is insufficient to support the trial court's finding that the carriers were independent contractors and not employees within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Arguing that the Legislature intended its definition of "employment" to be more inclusive than the scope of the employment relation as defined generally by the law of this state at the time the act was adopted, nevertheless, the commission maintains, according to settled principles which govern a determination as to when there is the relation of master and servant, the carriers were employees. The publishers deny that the Legislature by its definition of "employment," intended to broaden the scope of the employment relation and in support of the judgment maintain that, according to the law in effect at the time the legislation was adopted, the boys were independent contractors.

The facts relating to the conditions under which the carriers distributed the paper not only show that the publisher had the right to control the delivery methods of the boys, but an exercise of that control in detail. The carriers had no property right in their routes and they were subject to discharge for any violation of rules. In all essential respects their relationship with the publisher was the same as the carriers who were held to be employees in the Shopping News case, and the principles which were stated and applied as the grounds of that decision are determinative of the present controversy.

The judgment is reversed; the purported appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is dismissed.

Himrod & Parks, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from a decree in a proceeding to determine heirship, and from an order denying a motion to vacate.

Christ Corcofingas, the deceased, died in Los Angeles County on April 5, 1942. His will, duly admitted to probate, made a specific bequest to a local resident, and left the rest of his estate to five brothers and sisters living in Greece. Respondent Kallimanis, executor of the will and the only heir at law living outside of Greece, filed his petition to determine heirship, alleging that reciprocal rights of inheritance do not now exist between the Kingdom of Greece and the United States because of the domination of Greece by the armed forces of Germany; and that, by virtue of sections 259 and 259.1 of the Probate Code, the gifts to Greek residents lapsed and must be distributed in accordance with the laws of succession of this state.

Appellant Crowley, United States Alien Property Custodian, entered an appearance and also filed a document entitled "Vesting Order Number 1649," stating that the entire estate, except the local bequest and the amounts necessary to pay expenses, taxes and debts, had been vested in the Alien Property Custodian, pursuant to his authority under the Trading With the Enemy Act, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 1 et seq. A hearing was had and the court found that respondent was entitled to the property and that appellant had no interest therein, and rendered its decree accordingly.

The decree was signed on July 23, 1943; it was entered on July 29, 1943, and notice of entry of judgment was served and filed July 31, 1943. Notice of appeal was filed on September 27, 1943, and on the same day appellant filed in the superior court a "notice of motion to vacate judgment and enter a different judgment," specifying October 18, 1943, as the date upon which the motion would be made in court. This notice of motion, supported by affidavits, set forth as its grounds (1) that at the hearing no evidence had been introduced on the issue whether reciprocal inheritance relations existed between the United States and Greece at the time of the testator's death; (2) that subsequently information had been received from the State Department that such relations did exist at that time; and (3) that sections 259, 259.1 and 259.2 of the Probate Code were unconstitutional. Shortly thereafter, on October 7, 1943, appellant filed in the superior court a document entitled "Dismissal of Appeal" stating that he "hereby abandons and dismisses said Appeal" taken on September 27, 1943. This abandonment was filed in the lower court in accordance with rule 19(a) of the Rules on Appeal, and appellant states that it was done in order to remove any doubt as to the jurisdiction of the superior court to consider the motion to vacate the judgment. The motion to vacate was denied on November 22, 1943.

Thereafter, on November, 24, 1943, appellant filed a new notice of appeal from the decree determining heirship, and from the order denying the motion to vacate. Clerk's and reporter's transcripts were duly filed.

[1] The present motion to dismiss is based on three grounds: (1) the decree determining heirship was final and binding because the abandonment or dismissal of the first appeal did not expressly state that it was "without prejudice" to another appeal; (2) the order denying the motion to vacate the decree is not appealable; (3) the new notice of appeal from the decree was not filed within the time prescribed by law. The second point, that the order denying the motion to vacate is not appealable, is admittedly well taken. Estate of O'Dea, 15 Cal.2d 637, 104 P.2d 368. The last contention, if sound, is determinative of the appeal from the decree, and since we have concluded that it is correct there is no need to discuss the first point.

A notice of appeal must be filed within sixty days from the entry of the judgment (rule 2(a), Rules on Appeal) unless the time is extended by new trial proceedings (rule 3(a), or by a motion to vacate the judgment (rule 3(b)). Rule 3(b) provides in part: "When a motion to vacate a judgment or to vacate a judgment and enter another and different judgment is made by any party on any ground within 60 days after entry of judgment, (1) if the motion is denied or not decided by the superior court within 120 days after entry of the judgment, the time for filing the notice of appeal from the judgment is extended for all parties until 30 days after entry of the order denying the motion to vacate or 120 days after entry of the judgment, whichever shall be less * * *." (Italics added.) As pointed out above, judgment was entered on July 29, 1943, and the new notice of appeal was not filed until November 24, 1943, obviously too late unless time was extended by the provisions of rule 3(b).

[2] The first question is whether the extension provisions of rule 3(b) are rendered inapplicable by reason of the failure of appellant to serve and file the notice of intention to move to vacate the judgment within ten days after notice of entry of judgment. Stated otherwise, the question is whether the motion to vacate must be a motion in compliance with the terms of section 663a, Code Civ.Proc., in order to extend the time to appeal. Respondent has assumed, in view of the title of the document ("notice of motion to vacate judgment and enter a different judgment"), that the moving party was proceeding under sections 663 and 663a. Appellant denies this, pointing out that the motion did not assert inconsistency between the findings and conclusions or judgment, but attacked the judgment on a number of different grounds. Appellant suggests that the motion was in some respects one under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure and, in any event, was not designed as a proceeding under sections 663 and 663a. The rule refers generally to any motion to vacate "on any ground," and thus covers all types of motions to vacate, statutory or otherwise.

The second question is whether the motion to vacate was "made" within 60 days after entry of judgment, as required by rule 3(b). The written notice of motion was filed September 27, 1943, within the period, but specified October 18, 1943, as the time when the motion would be made in court, and this latter date was more than 60 days after entry of the judgment. The precise question is, therefore, whether rule 3(b) refers to the written notice of motion or the oral motion itself.

[3] Appellant argues that a motion is "made" when it is "initiated" by a proper notice or application. Reference is made to rule 41(b) of the Rules on Appeal, which adopts the language of section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the effect that "the notice of motion shall be deemed to be a motion on all the grounds stated in the notice." Rule 3(b), however, uses the term "made" and refers to the "motion" and not the notice of motion. It has been consistently held in California that such language refers to the oral motion made in open court. See In re Morehouse, 176 Cal. 634, 169 P. 365; Thomas v. Superior Court, 6 Cal.App. 629, 92 P. 739; see, also, Estate of Grivel, 208 Cal. 77, 81, 280 P. 122. Rule 41(b) is not helpful, since it deals solely with motions made in the reviewing court, and the provision was included because the reviewing court may, under rule 41, decide the matter on the written papers, without any calendar hearing, and hence without any oral motion. See Witkin, New California Rules on Appeal, 17 So. Cal. L. Rev. 232, 284. Nor can it be reasonably urged that the language of rule 3(b) is inadvertent, for rule 3(a) expressly refers to the filing of a notice of intention to move as the step which must be taken within the period. The use of such distinct terminology, in two subdivisions of the same rule, would seem to indicate that different meanings were intended.

It follows that the notice of appeal from the decree was not filed in time and, accordingly, that appeal is dismissed. The order denying the motion to vacate being nonappealable, the purported appeal therefrom is dismissed.

MARKET ST. RY. CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION et al.

S. F. 16988.

Supreme Court of California.

Rehearing Denied July 27, 1944.

1. Constitutional law ⇨298(2)

Where street railway received copy of Railroad Commission's order instituting investigation into reasonableness of rates at hearing exhibits bearing on revenues and adequacy of service and facilities and were introduced and railway had opportunity to adduce additional evidence thereon, order reducing fares did not deny due process on theory that railway was not notified that it was charged with maintaining unreasonable rates, or that issue of unreasonableness was not framed or that railway was denied opportunity to present evidence on such issue. Gen. Laws 1937, Act 6386, § 32.

2. Constitutional law ⇨298(2)

Where Railroad Commission accorded street railway opportunity for reargument on petition for rehearing after ordering reduction in fares at which time railway failed to refer to any supplement or explanation of submitted data pertaining to rate structure, railway could not thereafter contend it was denied due process for want of opportunity to meet charge that it was maintaining an unreasonable rate. Gen. Laws 1937, Act 6386, §§ 32, 67.

3. Carriers ⇨18(2)

The unreasonableness of Railroad Commission order reducing fares of street railway must be established by showing that order interferes with railway's successful operation, its financial integrity, its facility to maintain credit and attract capital, and to compensate investors for risks assumed rather than by method employed to formulate a rate base. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, §§ 32, 67.

4. Public service commissions ⇨37

The responsibility for rate fixing is with Railroad Commission and unless its action is clearly confiscatory, courts will not interfere. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, §§ 32, 67.

5. Public service commissions ⇨35

The courts in reviewing Railroad Commission rate orders, when federal constitutional questions are involved, exercise an independent judgment on law and facts but refrain from sitting as a board of revision and will not disturb findings or conclusions of commission unless invasion of constitutional rights is clearly established. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, § 67.

6. Carriers ⇨18(2)

Street railway, on petition to review order of Railroad Commission reducing fares, had burden of showing that evidence did not support commission's finding of value, that reduced fare was unreasonable and would result in confiscation of its property, which showing must overcome strong presumption of correctness of findings and conclusions of commission. Gen. Laws 1937, Act 6386, §§ 32, 67.

7. Carriers ⇨12(11)

Where street railway under impact of direct competition with municipal system operated at a loss and did not devote to replacement and repair amounts charged off on its books for those purposes and amounts charged to depreciation reserve left from actual annual plant consumption, Railroad Commission in determining value of investment for rate purposes was justified in refusing to follow practice of adopting as an annual charge to plant consumption the railways book depreciation reserve or any other hypothetical sum approved by accounting practices. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, § 67.

8. Carriers ⇨12(11)

Where street railway under impact of direct competition with municipal system permitted its equipment to deteriorate to such an extent that there was no procurable evidence of fair value of property except amount contained in railway's offer to sell to municipality made in period when business was profitable, Railroad Commission was not arbitrary in rejecting for rate purposes railway's book values and capitalization and refusing to make precise estimates of actual deterioration and of growing concern or other value and accepting offer of sale as best evidence of fair value of property in its present condition. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, § 67.

9. Carriers ⇨12(11)

The real value and not nominal paper valuation determines amount of investment on which public utilities including street railways are entitled to a return.

10. Constitutional law ⇨298(2)

Eminent domain ⇨2(8)

Action of Railroad Commission in evaluating for rate purposes street railway properties in accordance with actualities and rejecting conjectural and unsatisfactory estimates of value or in treating railway's estimates as without probative value was not a taking of private property for public use without compensation or denial of due process.

11. Carriers ⇨18(2)

In proceeding to review Railroad Commission order reducing fares of street railway, where railway failed to show that results of order were not in accord with realities or that return on rate base under reduced fare would prevent railway from functioning adequately from either company's or investor's standpoint, order was affirmed. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, §§ 32, 67.

12. Carriers ⇨12(11)

Great deterioration in capital investment in street railway as result of direct competition with municipal system causing railway's ability to attract capital to suffer does not justify Railroad Commission in going beyond fixing of rate structure that will insure a fair return on value of capital investment when business is profitable. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, § 32.

13. Carriers ⇨12(11)

Where evidence authorized finding of inadequacy in maintenance and service of street railway, Railroad Commission was not arbitrary in taking such inadequacy into consideration in reducing fares as a protection to public at a time when railway was enjoying abnormal profits. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, §§ 32, 67.

14. Constitutional law ☞298(2)

The problem of value of service rendered by street railway and correctness of Railroad Commission's decision in consumer interest do not invoke constitutional question so long as otherwise investor or railway interest has received adequate consideration by commission. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, §§ 32, 67.

15. Carriers ☞18(2)

In proceedings to review order of Railroad Commission fixing rate structure of street railway, Supreme Court will not set aside commission's finding for mere errors of procedure not amounting to lack of due process and will only determine whether legislative process has resulted in confiscation. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, § 67.

16. Carriers ☞18(2)

Where Railroad Commission ordered reduction of fare of street railway for an indeterminate experimental period, commission retained jurisdiction to make appropriate adjustment if anticipated increased passenger traffic failed to materialize and Supreme Court would not assume that commission would reject an application to make such changes as experience might show to be necessary. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, §§ 32, 67.

In Bank.

Proceeding by the Market Street Railway Company against the Railroad Commission and others to review an order of the Commission reducing the rate of fare for transportation of passengers on petitioner's street railway line

Affirmed.

Cyril Appel and Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Everett C. McKeage, Roderick B. Cassidy, Wyman C. Knapp, Frank B. Austin, and John M. Gregory, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHENK, Justice.

The Railroad Commission on its own motion ordered an investigation into the reasonableness of the rates and the sufficiency and adequacy of the service rendered by Market Street Railway Company in San Francisco. After hearings the commission filed its opinion and order reducing the rate of base cash fare for transportation of passengers in the city from seven to six cents. The company petitioned for a rehearing which was denied. The matter is here on its petition for a review pursuant to section 67 of the Public Utilities Act, Stats.1915, p. 115, as amended; Deering's Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386.

The petitioner attacks the proceedings and order as a deprivation of orderly due process, and as a confiscation of its property.

[1] I. On the first, the procedural question, the company claims that it was denied due process by a failure of notice that it was being charged with the maintenance of unreasonable rates; that the issue of unreasonableness of rates was not framed during the course of the hearing; that the commission introduced no evidence of unreasonableness of the prevailing rate, and that the company was not afforded an opportunity to present evidence on the issue.

The petitioner does not claim that it did not receive a copy of the "Order Instituting Investigation," which was mailed to it. That order notified the company that "the commission, believing that public interest demands an inquiry into the reasonableness of the rates, as well as the sufficiency and adequacy of the service rendered by the Market Street Railway Company," would institute an investigation upon its own motion "into the reasonableness of the rates, charges, classifications, rules and regulations" of the company, "and also into the reasonableness, sufficiency and adequacy of the operations, service and facilities of said company." The 10th day of May, 1943, was set as the time for the commencement of the public hearings. Notice of the time of hearing was also sent to other public utilities, and public and civic bodies and officers, including the California Street Cable Railroad Co., the Mayor and the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco, the Department of Public Works, the Board of Public Utilities, the City Attorney, the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, the Office of Defense Transportation, and others. Hearings were conducted on May 10, July 15, and September 15, 1943. Thirty-three exhibits were introduced, consisting of reports and documents bearing on income and revenues, studies and reports of value, analyses of profit and loss accounts, operative expenses, statistical studies in passenger revenue and car and bus hours, as well as studies in operative equipment, traffic checks, results of operation, charges and revisions in operative practices, and comparative rate and operation analyses of Market Street Railway and the Municipal Railway of San Francisco. Certain voluminous annual and monthly reports in addition were by stipulation deemed to be before the commission. The oral evidence is contained in three volumes of transcribed testimony. Witnesses were produced by the commission, by the city and by the company. J. G. Hunter, produced by the commission, the first witness to testify, gave a résumé of the matters for investigation, which included "operating expenses, taxes, depreciation, studies on rate base figures, the estimated operating results that would obtain under different fare structures." Comparative balance sheets, charges and reports were introduced dealing with these subjects. Comparisons were made between appraisals based on book value and on historical cost. Testimony on the state of the physical properties, on employment conditions, on available manpower, on adequacy of the service and facilities, on the possibility of interchange of facilities and a universal transfer system, on the company's franchise obligations in roadbed upkeep, and on elements to be considered in evaluating service, was also received. Mr. Samuel Kahn, who is president and general manager of the company and an engineer and expert in utility management, and Mr. Leonard V. Newton, vice-president of the company and engineer in charge of operations, testified on behalf of the company. On direct and cross-examination Mr. Kahn testified and presented exhibits illustrating his opinion of the effect of various rate structures. Mr. Newton's testimony was confined mainly to operations and employment conditions.

[2] Thus, the company had the required notice of hearing on the question of reasonableness of the rates and full opportunity at the hearings to present any further evidence on the rate issue, had it chosen to do so. The notice and the course of the hearings were adequate to inform the company that the reasonableness of the present rate was under investigation. The discussion on this phase of the review may be concluded by stating that the various studies, reports and other statistical data, including the record in prior rate proceedings, together with the exhaustive investigation into the present state of the properties and the adequacy and value of the service, must be deemed to have had a direct bearing on the rate issue. The fact that the financial and rate base studies were required to be produced by the commission as a part of the record was sufficient to give to the company ample warning that the commission was seriously proceeding into an investigation of the reasonableness of the existing rate. In fact Mr. Kahn's testimony clearly indicated that he so understood the purpose of the inquiry. The statement of counsel that the elements of fair play were so lacking in the proceedings as to call for a conclusion that orderly due process was not observed is not supported by the record. The company had the opportunity to supplement or explain the reports and data introduced in evidence. The commission also accorded the opportunity for argument on the petition for rehearing, but no supplement or explanation of the submitted data was referred to on the argument on rehearing. At that time the petitioner merely contended that a rehearing should be granted in order to conduct further studies on the estimates of future revenues, expenses and net return under various rates, as well as valuation studies to supply evidence of different rate bases, including reproduction cost, different from those on which the commission placed its estimate of a fair return from operations under the reduced rate. Under these circumstances, the comment of the court in Railroad Com. of California v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 302 U.S. 388, at page 393, 58 S.Ct. 334, at page 338, 82 L.Ed. 319, is appropriate here: "As we have seen, the respondent [petitioner] was heard, the Commission received the testimony of respondent's witnesses, its exhibits and arguments. There is nothing whatever to show that the hearing was not conducted fairly." The petitioner's further demands are more properly addressed to the matter of reasonableness in relation to due process when we come to consider the second phase of this review, namely, the issue of confiscation.

II. The opinion of the commission gives the essential background. The year 1852 saw the first omnibus service in San Francisco; 1860 the first street railway; and 1873 the first cable line. The cable was more suited to the hilly terrain and some of the horsecar lines were converted to the cable method of operation. In 1893 Market Street Railway Company was incorporated and took over eleven of seven-teen independent street car lines.

By city charter amendments ratified by the electors in 1902, provisions were enacted for municipal acquisition of public utilities. (Stats. 1903, pp. 586 et seq.) Privately owned street railways were permitted to hold franchises for not to exceed twenty-five years, whereupon tracks and overhead construction should revert to the city without cost.

In 1902 United Railroads of San Francisco was incorporated. It succeeded to the properties of Market Street Railway Company and five additional lines. The earthquake and fire of 1906 caused heavy losses and a large reconstruction program ensued.

In 1912 the first municipal line was placed in operation. Municipal railway expansion proceeded rapidly in order to serve the traffic during the Panama Pacific International Exposition in 1915. The city built lines of extension parallel with some of the Market Street Railway lines.

United Railroads became unable to pay the interest on its bonded indebtedness and in 1921 its properties were acquired by the bondholders under foreclosure sale and were in turn sold to Market Street Railway Company. The twenty-five year franchise limitation was not enforced. Pursuant to section 131 of the city charter (Stats. 1931, p. 3052), the company surrendered its franchises and was granted a twenty-five year permit to continue operations subject to the right of the city to acquire the properties upon paying the fair value of the operative properties exclusive of going concern value or other intangible elements. In 1925 the company began placing motor buses in operation and by December, 1942 it had 125 buses in service.

The competitive factor induced by the continuing expansion of the municipal railway system became a constantly increasing threat to the operational and financial integrity of the company. The Market Street Railway Company came under the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, while the municipal lines remained subject to the regulation and supervision of the city. The municipality retained a five-cent fare even though the system was operated with a deficit. Market Street Railway's original franchises included a five-cent fare clause.

In 1937 Market Street Railway applied to the Railroad Commission for an increase of the fare to seven cents. The application was granted to the extent of permitting a two-cent transfer charge. At that time the company was admittedly not seeking the increase on the basis of a fair return on its investment, but sought merely to meet $1,000,000 additional annual operating expense due to increased taxes and labor costs. (Dec. No. 29889, 40 C.R.C. 525.) In its opinion in that proceeding the commission said: "It is clear from this record that operation under any reasonable fare structure will not in the near future yield a revenue sufficient to provide a full return on any reasonable rate base of applicant's property, so long as the competing Municipal lines are operating on a 5-cent fare. For that reason this record does not deal with the matter of establishing a rate base for this property. In fact, the only reference to valuation in this record is that which is contained in the application to the effect that a valuation made [in a report filed with the supervisors in 1929] by the late M. M. O'Shaughnessy, former City Engineer of San Francisco, shows that the present fair value of applicants property is at least $24,000,000." Its decision (ibid., p. 532) discloses that the president of the company was of the opinion "that experience alone could tell what results would obtain if the proposed fare structures were put into effect."

In 1938 the company made a supplemental application for an increase to a seven-cent fare on a showing that revenues had declined and that further increased operating expenses were imminent due to higher labor costs. The commission granted the application to the extent of permitting a seven-cent fare, four tokens for twenty-five cents. Again the commission noted that the company was not seeking the new rate on the basis of a fair return on its investment. (Dec. No. 30849, 41 C.R.C. 349, 351.)

The city of San Francisco granted franchises to bus companies for operation on a ten-cent fare in direct competition with the company, but refrained from granting any such franchises which would compete with the municipal lines. The company attempted to effect economies by installing one-man operation in its electrically operated cars, but that practice was discontinued when the federal courts upheld a San Francisco city ordinance forbidding one-man operation of street cars. City and County of San Francisco v. Market St. Ry. Co., 9 Cir., 98 F.2d 628; Market St. Ry. Co. v. City and County of San Francisco, 305 U.S. 657, 59 S.Ct. 357, 83 L.Ed. 426; Id., 306 U.S. 667, 59 S.Ct. 460, 83 L.Ed. 1062. The company had attempted to abandon unprofitable lines, but had been unable to obtain permission from the city to do so.

Consequently in the same year (1938) the company made a second supplemental application for a straight seven-cent basic fare. The showing was that as a result of the increase in fares in a twelve-month period more than 10,000,000 passengers had been diverted to the municipal lines, and the company was operating at a loss. San Francisco is a city with what is termed a "high riding habit" and a large percentage of the lost traffic consisted of short-haul riders who declined to pay the seven-cent fare. In that proceeding the commission concluded that the company was entitled to relief to prevent a collapse or partial collapse of its service, and, accepting the company's estimate that revenues could be increased only by a straight seven-cent fare, it granted the petition conditionally. It required the company forthwith to petition the board of supervisors of the city for permission to abandon operation on specified lines and for such form of relief as might be necessary to eliminate "jitney" competition. The company complied with the requirements and on December 12, 1938, the board of supervisors denied the requests. Thereupon, on December 27, 1938, the commission ordered the new schedule based on a straight seven-cent fare effective January 1, 1939.

The straight seven-cent basic fare has continued until the present time. The hoped for results, however, did not immediately materialize, even with the stimulation afforded by the holding of the Golden Gate International Exposition in 1939-1940. Compared with the year 1936, the last year under the five-cent fare, the 1941 traffic and revenue reached the lowest ebb, showing a falling off of 64,056,000, or 42 per cent, in revenue passengers, and $1,426,282, or 19 per cent, in passenger revenue. The figures show a decline of 39 per cent in revenue as compared to the maximum revenue year of 1925. The state of the operative properties and the adequacy of the service continued to decline. The company became unable to discharge its franchise obligations for roadbed maintenance and the city was attempting to collect $1,691-162.76 claimed as arrears.

After the entry of this country into the present world war in 1941, and upon the stepped-up production of war materials, an abnormal increase in traffic occurred resulting in increased revenue, accompanied, however, by a further marked deterioration in the operative properties and in the service to the public.

The commission examined the condition of the properties and the adequacy of the service in relation to the prevailing rates for transportation. It found evidence of long-time neglect, deterioration, mismanagement, indifference to urgent public need, and other causes productive of poor service, not all of which were chargeable to the war. The company refused to lease idle equipment to the municipality although the latter had sought to put it into service on its own lines after the Office of Defense Transportation had denied it priority rights for new equipment because of the existing condition of idleness of rolling stock in San Francisco, none of which was attributable to the city. The company was unsuccessful in retaining or drawing its share of the available manpower, which was being diverted to the Municipal Railway. Undeniably there is evidence of "deplorable condition of track, of deferred maintenance, unfulfilled street paving obligations, obsolescence of street car equipment, and the failure of the company to replace, during pre-war years, uneconomical and outdated facilities by modern, more efficient, and more profitable means of mass transportation," conditions which had grown progressively worse over a period of years antedating the commencement of the war. Service, with the exception of that to establishments directly engaged in the war effort, such as shipyards and army and navy concentration points, steadily declined in quality and adequacy. The commission stated that an analysis of the company's finances showed that over a period of years the company had diverted to payment of indebtedness funds urgently required for proper maintenance and for the replacement of depreciated property.

The record makes it apparent, and the commission recognized, that in the past competition was the factor which prevented the company from reaping financial benefit from any rate structure; that heretofore the private automobile has given the railways competition; that that source of competition is partially eliminated during the period of rubber and gasoline shortage; that the increased traffic due to war activities will not last, and that as soon as transportation conditions return to normal the company will again be handicapped by a seven-cent fare against the competition of the Municipal Railway and the automobile; and that under any rate structure the condition of the company will grow even worse than at the former low level unless the service is greatly improved. It is also disclosed that while prior to the war the five-cent fare produced a greater gross and net annual revenue than any fare in excess of five cents, a five-cent fare structure will not realize any net return to the company under a competitive system of operation.

Compared with Market Street Railway, the Municipal Railway under a five-cent fare has gained in quality of service and equipment, and in financial returns. As with Market Street Railway, however, the Municipal Railway's increase in financial returns began with the abnormal increase in traffic.

Attempts had been made to have the city of San Francisco acquire the Market Street Railway. Transportation surveys and property appraisals had been prepared and negotiations carried on over a long period of years. At the general election of November 3, 1942, the electorate of San Francisco rejected a proposed revenue bond issue to raise $7,950,000, the price theretofore settled upon at which the company would sell its properties to the city. A similar proposition at the same figure was again submitted and again rejected at a special election held April 20, 1943.¹

The commission rejected the company's book figures of cost and depreciation and selected the offered price, $7,950,000, as the value of the utility and rate base for the purpose of computing the return to the company under various rate structures. It concluded that operation under a six-cent fare, after deduction from gross passenger revenue of operating expenses, depreciation and taxes, would produce a net return of slightly more than six per cent on the rate base of $7,950,000. It computed that a seven-cent fare, allowing an increase in operating expenses to $7,940,000, including $750,000 for depreciation and $590,000 for taxes, would yield annual net operating revenues of $760,000, a return of 9.6 per cent on the rate base. Figuring the return from a seven-cent fare on a depreciation allowance of $500,000, which is the amount the company had been charging off annually, the percentage would be 12.7. The commission found both these rates of return excessive and unjustified by the present service. Its computation under a five-cent fare, with a depreciation allowance of $500,000, indicated a deficit of $1,153,000. On a six-cent basic fare it estimated annual gross revenue at $8,500,000, operating expenses, depreciation and taxes at $8,000,000, leaving a net operating income of $500,000, slightly more than six per cent on the base figure of $7,950,000, which return it found to be reasonable. It said that consideration of service alone and of the value of service to the patron would justify the fixing of a five-cent fare; but it determined that a six-cent fare was a just, fair and reasonable rate, provided every possible and reasonable effort promptly be made by the company to furnish an improved service, and that a fare in excess of six cents was unjust and unreasonable.

No contention is urged that a six per cent return on the investment is not adequate, under present conditions, to attract capital and keep a utility in a solvent condition. The question is whether the record clearly establishes that the selection of the figure of $7,950,000 as the rate base will result in confiscation of the company's property.

The commission rejected all other figures and selected the offered price as that most truly representative of the value of the company's properties. It said that "the only available indication in this record of the present value of the company's properties used and useful in the public service is the resolution of the company's Board of Directors, passed on March 25, 1943. The resolution (Exhibit 9) reads as follows:

"Sale of the Operative Properties of the Market Street Railway Company to the City and County of San Francisco. The President advised the Board that he had agreed with the Mayor and other city officials, as well as the Board of Super-sition to acquire the operative properties of the company on a self-liquidating plan for $7,500,000.

visors, to sell the operative properties of Market Street Railway Company to the City and County of San Francisco for the sum of $7,950,000.00 cash, which was the same amount agreed upon for the sale of the operative properties when a charter amendment for the purpose of raising such sum by a revenue bond issue was submitted to and rejected by the qualified electors of the City and County of San Francisco at the general election on November 3rd, 1942. The President stated further that a similar charter amendment, with several changes therein, for the purpose of raising the sum agreed upon for the sale of the operative properties of the Market Street Railway Company to the City and County of San Francisco by a revenue bond issue would be submitted to the qualified electors of the City and County of San Francisco at a special election to be held on April 20, 1943. The President also stated that the price mentioned is the amount that had been agreed upon for the purchase by the City and County of San Francisco of the operative properties of the company after negotiations in respect thereto which covered a considerable period of time and, as previously mentioned, is the best price obtainable therefor.

"Whereupon, on Motion of Director Fay, duly seconded by Director Scott, the following resolution was adopted.

"Resolved, that the actions of the President in negotiating the sale of and agreeing to sell the operative properties of the Market Street Railway Company to the City and County of San Francisco for the sum of $7,950,000.00 cash be, and the same hereby are, ratified, approved and confirmed; and it is

"Further Resolved, that the officers of the Market Street Railway Company be and they are hereby authorized and directed to perform all necessary and proper acts in order to carry out and complete the sale of the operative properties of the Market Street Railway to the City and County of San Francisco for the sum of $7,950,000 cash."

The commission adopted the price stated in the offer as the "present fair market value," without the necessity of expressing an "opinion on the reasonableness of the figure of $7,950,000 as an exact measure of the present fair value of the company's operative property in its present depreciated physical and service condition, with its past earning record and its prospective future under the competitive transportation situation obtaining in San Francisco." The petitioner contends that the ultimate figure adopted by the principals for the sale of the property to the city and therefore by the commission as the present fair market value was based on a capitalization of earnings; that the commission should have proceeded on a consideration of depreciated reproduction cost and historical cost, in accord with the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States in Smyth v. Ames, 169 U.S. 466, 18 S.Ct. 418, 42 L.Ed. 819, and other cases.

In Smyth v. Ames, after stating that the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates must be the fair value of the property being used for the convenience of the public, the Supreme Court proceeded to lay down the essential matters for consideration in ascertaining that value. 169 U.S. at page 546, 18 S.Ct. at page 434, 42 L.Ed. 819. "And, in order to ascertain that value, the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses, are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. We do not say that there may not be other matters to be regarded in estimating the value of the property. What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth."

Subsequent decisions emphasized the necessity for finding fair value by weighing all the elements prescribed in Smyth v. Ames. Notably in Minnesota Rate Cases, (Simpson v. Shepard) 230 U.S. 352, at page 434, 33 S.Ct. 729, at page 754, 57 L.Ed. 1511, 48 L.R.A., N.S. 1151, Ann.Cas. 1916A, 18, the Supreme Court said that there must be a "reasonable judgment, having its basis in a proper consideration of all relevant facts", repeating the language quoted from Smyth v. Ames. The emphasis progressed to the extent that in many cases, if one factor or element, particularly that of reproduction cost new, had not received consideration in arriving at "present fair value," it was determined that the constitutional due process requirement had been violated. State of Missouri ex rel. Southwestern Bell Tel. Co. v. Indianapolis Water Co., 272 U.S. 400, 47 S.Ct. 144, 71 L.Ed. 316; United Railways & Elec. Co. v. West, 280 U.S. 234, 50 S.Ct. 123, 74 L.Ed. 390; cf. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. City and County of San Francisco, 265 U.S. 403, 44 S.Ct. 537, 68 L.Ed. 1075; Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Co. v. Railroad Comm., 289 U.S. 287, 53 S.Ct. 637, 77 L.Ed. 1180; Railroad Comm. of State of Cal. v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 302 U.S. 388, 58 S.Ct. 334, 82 L.Ed. 319. Thus due process was deemed not to have been observed if it was shown that the regulatory body, in evaluating the plant or operative properties for rate purposes, had not considered depreciated reproduction cost as well as book cost, actual (sometimes called original or historical) cost, capitalization, etc. Since calculations under each formula led to widely different results it became apparent that in Smyth v. Ames rule had proved itself unworkable. Criticisms of it are found in the dissenting and concurring opinions in State of Missouri ex rel. Southwestern Bell Tel. Co. v. Public Service Comm., 262 U.S. 276, 289, 43 S.Ct. 544, 67 L.Ed. 981, 31 A.L.R. 807; Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. City and County of San Francisco, 265 U.S. 403, 416, 44 S.Ct. 537, 68 L.Ed. 1075; McCardle v. Indianapolis Water Co., 272 U.S. 400, 421, 47 S.Ct. 144, 71 L.Ed. 316; United Railways v. West, 280 U.S. 234, 255, 50 S.Ct. 123, 74 L.Ed. 390; and West v. Chesapeake & Potomac Tel. Co., 295 U.S. 662, 680, 55 S.Ct. 894, 79 L.Ed. 1640. In the Southwestern Bell Tel. Co. case, Justice Brandeis (Justice Holmes concurring with him), disagreed with the majority view that the commission must consider reproduction cost new under the slogan "Estimates for to-morrow cannot ignore prices of to-day," [262 U.S. 276, 43 S.Ct. 546, 67 L.Ed. 981, 31 A.L.R. 807] and advocated the prudent investment theory.

Tel. Co. case. The court decided that the commission was not bound to slavish adherence to reproduction cost new in a case where the evidence showed that it gave consideration to that element, the dissenters seeking to apply the Southwestern Bell decision. On the same day the court also decided Bluefield, etc., Co. v. Public Service Comm., 262 U.S. 679, 43 S.Ct. 675, 67 L.Ed. 1176, wherein reproduction costs had not received consideration and the court reversed, following the Southwestern Bell case, Justice Brandeis disagreeing with the grounds of reversal.

In the case of McCardle v. Indianapolis Water Co., 272 U.S. 400, 408, 47 S.Ct. 144, 71 L.Ed. 316, the court required a further step, namely, that the future as well as the present must be regarded; that present value could not be determined without an honest and intelligent forecast as to probable price and wage levels, probable yield over operating expenses, etc., during a reasonable period in the immediate future.

In 1933 the Supreme Court obviously began to anticipate a departure from adherence to Smyth v. Ames. In the case of Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Railroad Comm., 289 U.S. 287, 53 S.Ct. 637, 641, 77 L.Ed. 1180, the court in effect upheld the California commission which, in making a rate reduction order, had rejected reproduction cost figures as "too uncertain and hypothetical to enter into a rate base figure." The court relied on the Minnesota Rate Cases for the theory that the cost-of-reproduction method did not justify the acceptance of results which depended upon mere conjecture. It pointed out the necessity of distinguishing between the legislative and judicial functions; that it is the appropriate task of the commission to determine the value of the property affected by the rates it fixed, and that of the court, in deciding the question of confiscation, not to lay down a formula, much less to prescribe an arbitrary allowance, but to examine the result of the legislative action in order to determine whether its total effect is to deny to the owner of the property a fair return for its use. It said (289 U.S. at page 304, 53 S.Ct. at page 643, 77 L.Ed. 1180): "We do not sit as a board of revision, but to enforce constitutional rights. San Diego Land & Town Co. v. Jasper, 189 U.S. 439, 446, 23 S.Ct. 571, 47 L.Ed. 892. The legislative discretion implied in the rate-making power necessarily extends to the entire legislative process, embracing the method used in reaching the legislative determination as well as that determination itself. We are not concerned with either, so long as constitutional limitations are not transgressed. When the legislative method is disclosed, it may have a definite bearing upon the validity of the result reached, but the judicial function does not go beyond the decision of the constitutional question. That question is whether the rates as fixed are confiscatory. And upon that question the complainant has the burden of proof, and the court may not interfere with the exercise of the state's authority unless confiscation is clearly established."

In April 1934, the Supreme Court upheld the commission's order prescribing rates for telephone service in the case of Lindheimer v. Illinois Bell Tel. Co., 292 U.S. 151, 54 S.Ct. 658, 663, 78 L.Ed. 1182. It rejected the company's claim that the rates were grossly confiscatory because not based on estimates of original or book cost and reproduction cost new; for, to recognize the claim, it stated, would be to sanction "a large increase over the rates which have enabled it to operate with outstanding success. Elaborate calculations which are at war with realities are of no avail."

Nevertheless, less than six months later, in West v. Chesapeake & Potomac Tel. Co., June 1935, 295 U.S. 662, 55 S.Ct. 894, 79 L.Ed. 1640, the court affirmed a decree enjoining the commission from enforcing prescribed rates because of the method employed to ascertain value, namely, by the use of price trend indices, rather than on the ground that the rate was confiscatory.

In April, 1936, in St. Joseph Stock Yards Co. v. United States, 298 U.S. 38, 53, 56 S.Ct. 720, 726, 80 L.Ed. 1033, the majority of the court again reviewed the distinctive functions of commission and court, saying that the "judicial duty to exercise an independent judgment does not require or justify disregard of the weight which may properly attach to findings upon hearing and evidence. * * * Judicial judgment may be none the less appropriately independent because informed and aided by the sifting procedure of an expert legislative agency. * * * We have said that 'in a question of rate-making there is a strong presumption in favor of the conclusions reached by an experienced administrative body after a full hearing.' * * * The established principle which guides the court in the exercise of its judgment on the entire case is that the complaining party carries the burden of making a convincing showing and that the court will not interfere with the exercise of the rate-making power unless confiscation is clearly established. * * *"

In Railroad Commission of State of Cal. v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 302 U.S. 388, 58 S.Ct. 334, 82 L.Ed. 319, the court, reemphasizing the principle from Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Railroad Comm.; Lindheimer v. Illinois Bell Tel. Co.; West Ohio Gas Co. v. Public Utilities Comm., and other cases, refused to consider as an error amounting to a denial of due process the commission's treatment of the company's estimate of reproduction costs as without probative value. The dissenting opinion of Justice Butler, who invoked application of the Smyth v. Ames rule, pointed out that the California Commission consistently refused to apply the Smyth v. Ames criteria.

Then in Federal Power Comm. v. Natural Gas Pipeline Co., March 1942, 315 U.S. 575, 62 S.Ct. 736, 86 L.Ed. 1037, the court again appeared to approve nonadherence to the rule of Smyth v. Ames by utility commissions. It upheld an interim order of rate reduction by the Federal Power Commission, acting under the Natural Gas Act of 1938, 52 Stat. 821, 15 U.S.C. sec. 717, 15 U.S.C.A. § 717, which required that rates and charges for transportation and sale of gas in interstate commerce should be "just and reasonable." The gas company sought to have $8,500,000 claimed going concern value included in the rate base. In upholding the commission the court said: (315 U.S. at page 586, 62 S.Ct. at page 743, 86 L.Ed. 1037) "The Constitution does not bind rate-making bodies to the service of any single formula or combination of formulas. Agencies to whom this legislative power has been delegated are free, within the ambit of their statutory authority, to make the pragmatic adjustments which may be called for by particular circumstances. Once a fair hearing has been given, proper findings made and other statutory requirements satisfied, the courts cannot intervene in the absence of a clear showing that the limits of due process have been overstepped. If the Commission's order, as applied to the facts before it and viewed in its entirety, produces no arbitrary result, our inquiry is at an end."

Finally in Federal Power Commission v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 320 U.S. 591, 64 S.Ct. 281, 287, the court freed commissions from the necessity of following Smyth v. Ames. There the commission reduced gas rates. In testing the value of the utility property, it had omitted an item of $17,000,000 expended for drilling operations in an unregulated period of the utility's operations, and which in the same period had been recouped from earnings by having been charged off to operating expenses. The court rejected the contentions that the rate base should reflect the reproduction cost and trended original cost, and that the well drilling costs of $17,000,000 should have been included in the rate base. It said:

"Rate-making is indeed but one species of price-fixing. Munn v. [State of] Illinois, 94 U.S. 113, 134, 24 L.Ed. 77. The fixing of prices, like other applications of the police power, may reduce the value of the property which is being regulated. But the fact that the value is reduced does not mean that the regulation is invalid. * * * It does, however, indicate that 'fair value' is an end product of the process of rate-making not the starting point * * *. The heart of the matter is that rates cannot be made to depend upon 'fair value' when the value of the going enterprise depends on earnings, under whatever rates may be anticipated.

"We held in Federal Power Commission v. Natural Gas Pipeline Co., supra, that the Commission was not bound to the use of any single formula or combination of formulae in determining rates. Its rate-making function, moreover, involves the making of 'pragmatic adjustments.' Id., 315 U.S. at page 586, 62 S.Ct. at page 743, 86 L.Ed. 1037. And when the Commission's order is challenged in the courts, the question is whether that order 'viewed in its entirety' meets the requirements of the Act. Id., 315 U.S. at page 586, 62 S.Ct. at page 743, 86 L.Ed. 1037. Under the statutory standard of 'just and reasonable' it is the result reached and not the method employed which is controlling. Cf. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corp. v. Railroad Commission, 289 U.S. 287, 304, 305, 314, 53 S.Ct. 637, 643, 644, 647, 77 L.Ed. 1180; West Ohio Gas Co. v. Public Utilities Commission (No. 1), 294 U.S. 63, 70, 55 S.Ct. 316, 320, 79 L.Ed. 761; West v. Chesapeake & Potomac Tel. Co., 295 U.S. 662, 692-693, 55 S.Ct. 894, 906, 907, 79 L. Ed. 1640 (dissenting opinion). It is not theory but the impact of the rate order which counts. If the total effect of the rate order cannot be said to be unjust and unreasonable, judicial inquiry under the Act is at an end. The fact that the method employed to reach that result may contain infirmities is not then important. Moreover, the Commission's order does not become suspect by reason of the fact that it is challenged. It is the product of expert judgment which carries a presumption of validity. And he who would upset the rate order under the Act carries the heavy burden of making a convincing showing that it is invalid because it is unjust and unreasonable in its consequences. * * *

The conditions under which more or less might be allowed are not important here. Nor is it important to this case to determine the various permissible ways in which any rate base on which the return is computed might be arrived at. For we are of the view that the end result in this case cannot be condemned under the Act as unjust and unreasonable from the investor or company viewpoint." Answering other contentions the court said: "Congress has entrusted the administration of the Act to the Commission not to the courts. Apart from the requirements of judicial review it is not for us to advise the Commission how to discharge its functions."

[3, 4] The petitioner contends that the cases of Federal Power Comm. v. Natural Gas Pipeline Co. and Federal Power Comm. v. Hope Natural Gas Co. are inapplicable because they involved the commodity gas, as distinguished from the use of common carrier property. The petitioner does not contend, however, that the rate base theory of public utility valuation is not applicable in the present case. That theory of evaluating public utility property as determinative of the question of confiscation was adopted by the commissions, and assumed by the court to be proper, in the cited cases. It follows that the holdings of the Supreme Court in those cases may be considered in a case involving common carriers. Therefore those cases, particularly the Supreme Court's decision in the Hope Natural Gas Co. case, permits unreasonableness to be shown, not by the method employed to formulate a rate base, but by the fact that the "end result" of the commission's order interferes with the company's successful operation, its financial integrity, its ability to maintain credit and attract capital, and to compensate investors for risks assumed—in short, fails to provide a return sufficient to induce the utility enterprise to "perform completely and efficiently its functions for the public." The Supreme Court refrained from endorsing a particular method of valuation to arrive at the result of reasonableness, but left commissions free to follow Smyth v. Ames, or to select one or more of the heretofore recognized criteria or a different method, which, even if irregular, would not invalidate an order unless unreasonableness were clearly established. Thus responsibility for rate fixing, insofar as the law permits and requires, is placed with the commission, and unless its action is clearly shown to be confiscatory the courts will not interfere.

Section 32 of the Public Utilities Act, Stats. 1915, p. 115, as amended; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1937, Act 6386, empowers the California commission, after a hearing had upon its own motion or upon complaint, to make findings on the reasonableness of the rates charged by a public utility and to lower or increase the rates accordingly. By the same section the commission also has power and it is made its duty, after a hearing had on its own motion or on complaint, to determine the facilities and operation adequate to meet the public requirements, and to fix the just, reasonable and adequate rates for such service.

Section 67 of the Public Utilities Act provides for a review by this court for the purpose of having the lawfulness of the order and decision of the commission inquired into. That section restricts the review to a determination of whether the commission has regularly pursued its authority, including a determination of whether the order or decision under review violates any right of the petitioner under the Constitution of the United States or of the State of California. It further provides that the findings and conclusions of the commission on questions of fact shall be final and shall not be subject to review except as hereinafter noted, and that such questions of fact shall include ultimate facts and the findings and conclusions of the commission on reasonableness and discrimination. The exception to finality is that "in any proceeding wherein the validity of any order or decision is challenged on the ground that it violates any right of petitioner under the Constitution of the United States, the Supreme Court shall exercise an independent judgment on the law and the facts, and the findings or conclusions of the Commission material to the determination of said constitutional question shall not be final." That section also gives the court power to enter judgment either affirming or setting aside the order or decision of the commission.

[5] That part of section 67 which requires the independent judgment of the court on the law and the facts and withholds from the commission's findings and conclusions finality on constitutional questions, was added by amendment in 1933. This court thereafter recognized that the amendment was responsive to language in certain United States Supreme Court decisions which indicated that the Legislature must provide the means whereby the courts should exercise an independent judgment on the law and the facts when federal constitutional questions were involved. Southern California Edison Co. v. Railroad Comm., 6 Cal.2d 737, 59 P.2d 808; American Toll Bridge Co. v. Railroad Comm., 12 Cal.2d 184, 83 P.2d 1. The United States Supreme Court and this court assumed to exercise such judgment without statutory language, deeming it appropriate for the protection of constitutional rights; but in the exercise thereof, as variously stated in the decisions, the reviewing court refrains from sitting as a board of revision; and will not disturb the findings or conclusions of the regulatory body unless invasion of constitutional rights is clearly established. In the Edison Company case this court pointed out that the amendment added nothing which was not theretofore a part of our state law; that it did not materially affect the procedure theretofore followed in a review under the Public Utilities Act, and did not make the court a trier of disputed questions of fact already resolved by the commission. We said: 6 Cal.2d at page 748, 59 P.2d at page 813, "If the mere challenge on federal constitutional grounds was intended by the amendment of 1933 to be sufficient to take the case out of the rule that the findings and conclusions of the commission in such cases should be final and beyond review, then we would have grave doubt of the power of the Legislature thus to transfer to this court the traditional functions of the commission." In American Toll Bridge Co. v. Railroad Comm., supra, it was again stated that the amendment did not change the scope of the judicial review.

[6,7] In the present proceeding, as in the recent cases of Federal Power Comm. v. Natural Gas Pipeline Co. and Federal Power Comm. v. Hope Natural Gas Co., the standard for rate fixing is that of reasonableness. The petitioner herein must be charged with the burden of showing that the evidence does not support the commission's finding of value, and that the reduced rate is unreasonable and will result in confiscation of its property. That burden is coupled with a strong presumption of the correctness of the findings and conclusions of the commission. Ordinarily a public utility is a monopoly and is not subject to the travail of competition. Because of its monopolistic character, public interest requires that it submit to regulation for the protection of the consumer, and the utility in return is entitled to protection of its investor interest. In the case of monopolistic utilities it is possible to say that regulation to accomplish the two-fold purpose may be a relatively simple matter. But here the commission was confronted with facts which are unusual in utility rate regulation. It was faced with the problem of evaluating the property of a utility which was in direct competition with a municipal utility offering similar service in the same community, in large part serving the same territory, and over which the commission had no regulatory power. From the year 1912, when a competitive system of street car operation was established in San Francisco under municipal regulation, such obstacles to profitable operation by the commission regulated utility were created that commission regulation in effect gave way to regulation by competition. The evidence is clear that during the early competitive period and until the abnormal stimulation in public use brought about by the present world war, competition necessitated operation at a loss. Since the commencement of competition the company has not devoted to replacement and repair the amounts charged off on its books for those purposes, and its charges to depreciation reserve were lower than the actual annual plant consumption. In this connection it is significant that for tax purposes the company's accrued depreciation figure was shown to be $26,834,000, and its total depreciation reserve figure only $9,902,000. The factors which affected the value of the investment in this case justified the commission in refusing to follow the practice of adopting as an annual charge to plant consumption the company's book depreciation reserve or any other hypothetical sum approved by accounting practices. The evidence supports the conclusion that the company permitted unusual deterioration in view of negotiations for sale to the city started many years ago. The ordinary methods or theories of depreciation accounting therefore would not reflect the true record of the past annual plant consumption and the result, were such methods adopted, would not be in conformity with the facts. On the other hand, the evidence of obsolescence, depletion, depreciation and deterioration is such as to justify the commission's observation that there was no available or procurable evidence of the fair value of the property except the amount contained in the company's offer to sell to the city, made in the period when the business was profitable. Acceptance of the company's book figures or of the amount of outstanding capitalization, in order to arrive at the present worth of the properties, would result in a figure inflated so far above fair value as to impede the commission's authorized regulatory effort to restore the company as a useful public servant performing its functions adequately. Capitalization in any event has little relation to the depreciated value of the investment. Also going concern value can have little if any place in the rate base under the facts except as the special factor of competition has so affected that value as to indicate it at nil. Separate appraisal of the going concern element is not required. Federal Power Comm. v. Natural Gas Pipeline Co., supra.

[8] It cannot be said that under the facts of this case arbitrary action resulted merely from the commission's rejection of book values and capitalization, its refusal to make precise estimates of actual deterioration, of going concern or other values, and its acceptance of the company's offer of sale to the city made in a profitable period as the best evidence of the fair value of the utility in the present condition of its operative properties. The commission expressly refrained from considering whether the amount of the offer in relation to value under all the conditions was not too high. Furthermore, it appears that studies of valuation for sale purposes were also made by the city and by the commission, and only after such studies was a sale price selected which was deemed commensurate with the fair value of the property under existing conditions.

[9, 10] It is the real and not the nominal paper valuation that determines the amount of the investment on which the utility is entitled to a return. See Pond, Public Utilities, Fourth ed., vol. 2, pp. 1117, 1118. As said in Lindheimer v. Illinois Bell Tel. Co., 292 U.S. 151, 54 S.Ct. 658, 663, 78 L.Ed. 1182, the "actual experience of the company is more convincing than tabulations of estimates. * * * Elaborate calculations which are at war with realities are of no avail." There is no fundamental or statutory law which will preclude the commission from evaluating a public utility in accordance with the actualities. So to proceed is not to take private property for public use without compensation. There is no denial of due process in rejecting conjectural and unsatisfactory estimates of value, or in treating the petitioner's estimates as without probative value. Railroad Comm. of State of Cal. v. Pacific G. & E. Co., 302 U.S. 388, 397, 398, 58 S.Ct. 334, 82 L.Ed. 319. As was said in Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corp. v. Railroad Comm., 289 U.S. 287, 306, 53 S.Ct. 637, 644, 77 L.Ed. 1180, "The public have not underwritten the investment. The property, on any admissible standard of present value, may be worth more or less than it actually cost. The time and circumstances of the outlay, and the effect of altered conditions, demand consideration."

realities. Both before the commission and in this court it contented itself merely with urging that the commission proceeded erroneously in selecting for rate making purposes the offer price of $7,950,000, because, so it claims, that figure was based on a capitalization of earnings. The petitioner made no offer or attempt to show that the value fixed by the commission did not represent either the true depreciated legitimate cost or the true depreciated actual cost. In Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard), 230 U.S. 352, 566, 33 S.Ct. 729, 767, 57 L.Ed. 1151, 48 L.R.A., N.S., 1151, Ann.Cas.1916A, 18, it was said that "the company having assailed the constitutionality of the state acts and orders, was bound to establish its case, and it was not entitled to rest on expressions of judgment when it had it in its power to present accurate data which would permit the court to draw the right conclusion." Since it is impossible to say in the light of the evidence in this proceeding that the figure selected by the commission does not bear a proper relation to the fair value of the utility under existing conditions, it must be concluded that the petitioner has not shown arbitrary action on the part of the commission in selecting the sale offer price as the rate base, or that the evidence does not support the commission's finding that the figure selected represents at least fair value, if not more than that.

The petitioner has also failed to meet the burden cast upon it to establish that the return on the rate base under the reduced fare will prevent the utility's functioning adequately from the company or investor standpoint. The commission has the experience and the data at hand from which to cull the estimates of probable increase in traffic under a reduced fare and improved service, and of the probable future operating revenues, expenses, and other costs. This court will not disturb its findings on those disputed questions of fact. The company is now and for several years has been doing an abnormally increased traffic business with returns greatly in excess of its operating costs plus increased reserves for depreciation and taxes. It does not question that under a seven-cent fare it has enjoyed a return of more than a fair percentage above the constitutional line of confiscation on the fair value as found by the commission. Nor is it questioned that a return of six per cent on the value of its capital investment is unconstitutional. The petitioner claims that the commission's estimates are false, and that falsity resides in the fact that at the prevailing cost per head for passenger transportation, it will suffer a deficit on the estimated volume of increased traffic at the six-cent fare. The fallacy, however, is in the assumption that the cost ratio under the six-cent fare will be the same as under the seven-cent fare. The commission answers that the assumption is not true, inasmuch as the increase in traffic is expected, not necessarily in the peak hours, but in large part from the patronage in off hours which was diverted to Municipal Railway, or discontinued upon the inception of the higher rate, and which is expected to be regained materially upon the reduction of the fare and the improvement of the service. The petitioner also claims that the commission did not consider the evidence of a probable increase in labor costs pursuant to pending negotiations with labor unions. The commission on the other hand states that it did give consideration to that element. The commission's figures, with increased allowances for operating expenses, depreciation and taxes, must be deemed to resolve these disputed points adversely to the petitioner. "Long operation and adequate records make forecasts of net operating revenues fairly certain." Driscoll v. Edison L. & P. Co., 307 U.S. 104, 120, 59 S.Ct. 715, 723, 83 L.Ed. 1134.

[12] The foregoing discussion demonstrates that the interests of the investor have received constitutional protection by the action of the commission. Under rule by competition and the consequent great deterioration in its capital investment, the utility's ability to attract capital has undoubtedly suffered. But this is not an element that can be controlled by the regulatory body beyond the possibility of insuring to the utility a fair return on the value of the capital investment when business is profitable. The fact that the utility has suffered deficits in the past does not justify excessive profits in the future. Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Railroad Comm., 289 U.S. 287, 313, 53 S.Ct. 637, 77 L.Ed. 1180; Federal Power Comm. v. Natural Gas Pipeline Co., 315 U.S. 575, 590, 62 S.Ct. 736, 86 L.Ed. 1037. "When a business disintegrates, there is damage to the stockholders, but damage also to the customers in the cost or quality of service." West Ohio Gas Co. v. Public Utilities

[13,14] The record is also clear that the commission has not been arbitrary in acting for the protection of the public which is under compulsion to use the present depleted and inadequate service, or which may be expected to make use of an improved service. As the commission said in its opinion, "After making such allowance (for war time difficulties) the important question remains to what extent the ratepayer, under war conditions, should be compelled to pay the same or higher rates for an inadequate and inferior service while the utility enjoys abnormal profits." It is unnecessary to consider whether the seven-cent fare would still be unreasonable were the petitioner performing a fully adequate and efficient service. The findings of inadequacy in the maintenance and service are supported by the evidence. The commission is empowered under the statute in fixing the fare to take into consideration the quality of the facilities and service. The commission decided that even in war time improvement was possible, and that the value of the improved service would be no more than six cents. The problem of the value of the service, and the correctness of the commission's decision on the consumer interest, do not involve constitutional questions, so long as otherwise the investor or company interest has received adequate consideration by the commission. When the company interest has received constitutional protection, the findings of the commission on the consumer interest become final in the proceeding. The question involving that interest then has been answered by the commission correctly pursuant to the statute and the authorities to the effect that the reasonableness of rates should not be considered apart from the adequacy of the service, and that the public should not be charged more than the service is reasonably worth. The statute is a legislative recognition of the public's right to demand that consideration be given to the value of the service. *Covington & L. Turnpike R. Co. v. Railroad Comm., 289 U.S. 287, 315, 53 S.Ct. 637, 77 L.Ed. 1180. Pragmatic adjustments depend upon the particular facts. Federal Power Comm. v. Natural Gas Pipeline, supra. It does not appear from the facts in this record that the rate fixed by the commission is so unreasonably low as to call for a declaration that Market Street Railway Company has been deprived of its property without due process of law or without just compensation.

[15] The petitioner asserts some errors in the admission and consideration of statistical and other documentary evidence. It is not the function of the reviewing tribunal in these proceedings to set aside the legislative finding for mere errors of procedure not amounting to lack of due process. Its duty is to ascertain whether the legislative process has resulted in confiscation. West v. Chesapeake & Potomac Tel. Co., 295 U.S. 662, 674, 55 S.Ct. 894, 79 L.Ed. 1640.

[16] The petitioner objects to the apparent indeterminate duration of the experimental period under the six-cent fare fixed by the commission. The commission still has jurisdiction and if from the monthly reports filed by the company during a reasonable experimental period it appears that the expected increase in passenger traffic on the utility's system due to the reduction in fare and improvement in service does not materialize, the commission has the power to make appropriate adjustments. As the prescribed rate is expressly stated to be tentative, there is no ground for assuming that the commission will reject an application to make such changes as experience may show to be necessary in order to produce the stipulated revenue. 1. Descent and distribution §86

The purpose of the Code section giving probate court power to inquire into an assignment by an heir before making distribution was to give probate court some control over agreements providing compensation for services of so-called "heir-hunters." Probate Code, § 1020.1.

4. Courts §198

The probate court is a court of special and limited jurisdiction and has jurisdiction only to extent that law prescribes.

5. Descent and distribution §86

The Code section authorizing probate court to inquire into assignment by heirs does not grant such court general jurisdiction to set aside an assignment in its entirety and for all purposes, but merely purports to grant limited jurisdiction, under certain circumstances, to ignore assignment in whole or in part for purpose of distribution of estate. Probate Code, § 1020.1.

6. Descent and distribution §86

On appeal, on the judgment roll, from a decree recognizing assignment of heir's interest in estate only to the extent of $1,000, District Court of Appeal would as-

7. Descent and distribution 86

Where probate court found that circumstances warranted setting aside heir's assignment of an interest in estate to respondent but decree awarded respondent a lesser amount, the words "set aside" were used in limited sense of setting aside assignment only so far as it prescribed amount of compensation to respondent for finding heir, and award of reasonable compensation was not objectionable as a recovery on quantum meruit which was not within issues of pleading. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; M. G. Del Mutolo, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Andrew Lund, deceased, on petition of Frank Lund, to determine the validity of an assignment by petitioner of a portion of petitioner's share of estate to M. E. Hanlon. From a decree fixing the amount distributable to M. E. Hanlon under the assignment, Frank Lund appeals.

Affirmed.

Simeon E. Sheffey, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Robert E. Hatch, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SPENCE, Justice.

Appellant Frank Lund, as an heir and a person entitled to take under the will of the deceased, filed an instrument entitled "Petition Pursuant to Section 1020.1 of the Probate Code". He alleged therein that he was entitled to one-half of the estate of the deceased; that respondent Hanlon asserted a claim to one-third of the share of appellant which claim was denied by appellant; and he prayed that the probate court inquire into the claim of respondent and adjudge that respondent had no right, title or interest in the estate or in the share of appellant. Respondent answered by alleging that appellant had executed an agreement in writing whereby appellant had assigned to respondent a one-third interest in appellant's share; and respondent prayed that said one-third interest be distributed to respondent. The probate court filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law and decreed that respondent was entitled to have distributed to him the sum of $1000 out of appellant's share of the estate. This amount was substantially less than one-third of appellant's share but no appeal has been taken by respondent. Appellant has taken this appeal from said decree upon the judgment roll.

Section 1020.1 of the Probate Code, enacted as a new section in 1941, reads as follows:

"The court before making distribution of any property of a decedent to any assignee or transferee of any heir, devisee or legatee or before making distribution to any person other than an heir, devisee, or legatee pursuant to any agreement, request or instructions of any heir, devisee or legatee or of any attorney-in-fact of any heir, devisee or legatee may on the motion of any person interested in the estate or on the motion of the public administrator or on its own motion inquire into the consideration for such assignment, transfer, agreement, request or instructions and into the amount of any fees, charges, or consideration paid or agreed to be paid by the heir, devisee or legatee and into the circumstances surrounding the execution of such assignment, transfer, agreement, request or instructions and if it finds that the fees, charges or consideration paid by any such heir, devisee or legatee is grossly unreasonable or that any such assignment, transfer, agreement, request or instructions was obtained by duress, fraud or undue influence it may refuse to make distribution pursuant thereto except upon such terms as it deems just and equitable. * * *

[1] At the time of the enactment of said section, sections 530, 530.1 and 1201a of the Probate Code, which had been enacted in 1939, were repealed. Stat. 1941, p. 2893, Ch. 1162. Said section 1020.1 and the former section 530.1 appear to have been enacted in an attempt by the legislature to give the probate court some control, at least for the purpose of distribution, over agreements providing compensation for services of so-called "heir-hunters". The present section purports to permit the probate court, upon motion of an interested person or upon its own motion to "inquire into the consideration" for any assignment by an heir, devisee or legatee and "into the amount of any fees, charges, or consideration paid or agreed to be paid by the heir, devisee or legatee and into the circumstances surrounding the execution of such assignment." It then provides for certain alternative findings which may be made. The probate court may find either (1) that such assignment was obtained by "duress, fraud or undue influence" or (2) that "the fees, charges or consideration paid by any such heir, devisee or legatee is grossly unreasonable." It is then provided that upon the making of either finding the court "may refuse to make distribution pursuant thereto except upon such terms as it deems just and equitable."

[2, 3] The anomalous nature of section 1020.1 is at once apparent. Prior to the enactment of said section and its forerunner, the probate court had no jurisdiction to determine the issue of the validity of an assignment upon the distribution of an estate. Estate of Howe, 161 Cal. 152, 118 P. 515. This section apparently attempted to give the probate court jurisdiction to determine that issue, at least for the purpose of distribution. It further attempted to give the probate court jurisdiction, assuming the validity of the assignment, to determine the question of the reasonableness of the compensation, at least for the purpose of distribution. We are not called upon here, however, to determine the numerous questions which may arise with respect to said section. Appellant invoked its provisions and respondent is not complaining of the decision of the probate court. In other words, neither party claims that the section is invalid. Respondent did not appeal and cannot complain on this appeal of the refusal of the probate court to distribute the estate in strict accordance with the terms of the assignment. We will therefore assume solely for the purpose of this discussion that the section is valid.

If it may be said that the section is anomalous in nature, the pleadings and findings herein are equally anomalous. Appellant alleged neither that the assignment was obtained by "duress, fraud or undue influence" nor that the charges were "grossly unreasonable". Appellant's petition contained allegations more in the nature of a complaint to quiet title to his share in the estate. Similarly the findings of fact contain no findings conforming precisely to the findings contemplated by said section. The probate court made extensive findings but we need set forth only the portions thereof which are material on this discussion. Finding VI recites: "That the signature of Frank Lund to said document was obtained under circumstances that warrants this court, in the exercise of its equity powers herein, to set aside and refuse to make distribution, pursuant to said document." Finding VIII recites: "Upon the petition and at the request of said Frank Lund, the court has invoked its powers prescribed by Section 1020.1 of the Probate Code of the State of California, and refuses to make distribution to or on behalf of M. E. Hanlon, pursuant to the terms of said document hereinabove set forth; that the court taking into consideration all the circumstances, and the fact that he was the first to inform Frank Lund, that he had some money coming from somewhere, and the probability that Frank Lund might never have found out about his father's estate, if it had not been for M. E. Hanlon, and the fact that his sister, Lillian Blanche Imel, her agents or attorneys never made any attempt to find him and it was to her advantage if he were not found, the court finds that M. E. Hanlon rendered a service to Frank Lund; the court finds that the service rendered by M. E. Hanlon is of the reasonable value of One Thousand Dollars ($1000.00)." From these findings, the court concluded that respondent was entitled to receive said sum of $1,000 as the reasonable value of his services and that "all decrees of distribution in the matter of this estate shall be in accordance with the foregoing conclusions of law." A "Decree under Section 1020.1 Probate Code" was entered accordingly.

Appellant argues that the probate court "was warranted in setting the document aside"; that "when the document was so set aside, respondent had no interest in the estate"; that the probate court erred in permitting a recovery upon a quantum meruit which was a recovery upon a cause "not within the issues of the pleadings"; and that in any event, respondent could not recover upon a quantum meruit as the services performed in locating appellant were not performed at appellant's request. We believe appellant's argument ignores the nature of said code section which merely permits the probate court to "refuse to make distribution pursuant thereto (the assignment) except on such terms as it deems just and equitable". We believe further that appellant's argument is based upon the false premise that the probate court "set aside" the document in its entirety and for all purposes and permitted a recovery upon a quantum meruit.

[4-7] It is elemental that the probate court is a court of special and limited jurisdiction and that it has jurisdiction only to the extent that the law prescribes. As we read section 1020.1 of the Probate Code, it does not purport to grant to the probate court general jurisdiction to "set aside" an assignment in its entirety and for all purposes. It merely purports to grant to the probate court the limited jurisdiction, under certain circumstances, to ignore the assignment in whole or in part for the purposes of the distribution of the estate. In this proceeding in which appellant invoked the provisions of said section, appellant was granted relief to the extent that the probate court ignored the assignment in part for the purpose of distribution. In other words, it recognized the assignment of appellant's interest only to the extent of $1000. This sum was found to be the reasonable value of respondent's services and, on this appeal upon the judgment roll, we must assume that there was ample evidence to sustain that finding. Despite the informality of the pleadings and findings, we are satisfied that this finding is sufficient to support the decree against the attack made by appellant. While the probate court recited in its findings that circumstances warranted it "to set aside and refuse to make distribution pursuant to said document", it did not decree that the assignment be "set aside" and its jurisdiction extended only to the refusing, as it did, to make distribution to the extent specified in the document. We are of the opinion that the finding using the words "set aside" must be interpreted in the limited sense of setting aside or ignoring the document only insofar as it prescribed the amount of compensation and that, as so interpreted, the probate court acted in the manner contemplated by the section in that it acted upon the agreement of the parties but gave said agreement force and effect, for the purposes of distribution, not according to its precise terms but only to the extent of awarding reasonable compensation for respondent's services for which appellant had agreed to pay a larger amount. In view of these conclusions, we find no merit in appellant's argument that the probate court "set aside" the document and permitted a recovery upon a quantum meruit.

In conclusion, we desire to emphasize the fact that no question has been raised concerning the validity of the section under consideration. We desire to state further that no question has been raised concerning the validity generally of agreements providing compensation, by assignment or otherwise, for the services of so-called "heir hunters". We are therefore not called upon to pass upon either of said questions.

Robert L. Moore, of Los Angeles, for respondent First Church of Christ.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

Minnie F. Cottrill died on August 9, 1941. She left an holographic will dated January 10, 1939, to which there were two codicils. The last codicil was dated June 20, 1940. The estate was of the approximate value of $49,000. Her only heir was a niece, the appellant. The will and codicils were admitted to probate and provided that the estate should be distributed as follows: $50 to the niece; $105, in the aggregate, to other persons; and the residue to The First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, Massachusetts. Said Church was a charitable institution.

On May 17, 1943, the executrix filed her second and final account, and a petition for final distribution wherein the executrix sought distribution in accordance with the provisions of the will. Appellant filed objections to the petition for final distribution, wherein she stated that she was a niece of decedent; that the will devised and bequeathed to a charitable corporation for charitable uses more than one-third of the estate; that the will was executed more than six months before decedent's death; that appellant was entitled under the law to have "distributed to her two-thirds of the estate"; and that the petition for distribution, in asking for distribution of more than one-third of the estate to the charitable corporation, was contrary to law. The executrix and the Church (residuary beneficiary) each filed a general demurrer to said objections, and specified as grounds therefor that said objections and the record show that said objector was a niece of testatrix, that the will and codicils were executed at least six months prior to the death of testatrix, and that the objector had no legal basis for objecting to the distribution in accordance with said petition. The demurrers were sustained without leave to amend. An order was made settling the second and final account as rendered, and an order was made that distribution be in accordance with said petition for final distribution. The appeal is from said orders, and from the order sustaining the demurrers without leave to amend.

Section 41 of the Probate Code, as amended in 1937, provided: "No estate * * * may be bequeathed or devised to any charitable * * * corporation * * * for charitable uses, by a testator who leaves a spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor surviving him, who, under the will, or the laws of succession, would otherwise have taken the property so bequeathed or devised, unless the will was duly executed at least thirty days before the death of the testator. If so executed at least thirty days before death, such devices [sic] and legacies shall be valid, but they may not collectively exceed one-third of the testator's estate as against his spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor, who would otherwise, as aforesaid, have taken the excess over one-third; and if they do, a * * * deduction * * * shall be made so as to reduce the aggregate thereof to one-third of the estate. All property bequeathed or devised contrary to * * * this section shall go to the * * * niece * * * to the extent that they [she] would have taken said property * * * but for such devises or legacies * * *." (Italics added.)

Section 43 of the Probate Code provides: "Nothing in this article contained shall apply to bequests or devises made by will executed at least six months prior to the death of a testator who leaves no spouse, child, grandchild or parent, or when all of such heirs, by a writing executed at least six months prior to his death, shall have waived the restriction."

It will be noted that testatrix had executed her will and both codicils more than six months prior to her death.

Appellant contends that section 41 of the Probate Code, as amended in 1937, supersedes section 43 of that code, and limits the aggregate of charitable devises and bequests to one-third of a testator's estate when such testator is survived by a niece—even though the will was executed more than six months before the death of the testator.

The Probate Code was adopted in 1931. Article II of Chapter I, Division I, of the Probate Code, entitled "Gifts to Charity," consists of four sections—40, 41, 42 and 43. The provisions of sections 41 and 43 have been stated above. Section 40 provides that the limitations of that article apply to both foreign and domestic wills. Section 42 provides that certain municipal and state institutions are excepted from the limitations of that article. Said sections 40 and 42, however, are not involved herein. When the Probate Code was adopted, sections 41, 42 and 43 of that code were taken practically verbatim from former section 1313 of the Civil Code. Typical instances of differences in the language used in said sections of said codes are: That the word "unless" was used in the Probate Code in lieu of the word "except," the word "death" was used therein in lieu of the word "decease," and the word "article" was used therein in lieu of the word "section." In adopting the Probate Code in 1931, former section 1313 of the Civil Code was divided into three parts; and in substance, the first part became section 41, the second part became section 42, and the third part became section 43. Section 43, above quoted, has not been amended. Section 41, at the time the Probate Code was adopted, provided: "No estate * * * may be bequeathed or devised * * * for charitable uses, unless done by will duly executed at least thirty days before the death of the testator. If so made at least thirty days before death, such devises and legacies shall be valid, but they may not collectively exceed one-third of the estate of a testator who leaves legal heirs, and if they do, a * * * deduction * * * shall be made so as to reduce the aggregate thereof to one-third of the estate. All dispositions of property made contrary hereto shall be void, and go to the residuary legatees or devisees or heirs, according to law." (Italics added.)

[1, 2] It is to be noted that the principal difference in section 41 before and after the 1937 amendment, insofar as the issue here involved is concerned, is that before the amendment the section stated that no testamentary disposition of property to charity could exceed collectively one-third of the estate of a testator who leaves "legal heirs"; and that after the amendment the section stated that no testamentary disposition of property to charity could exceed collectively one-third of the estate of a testator "as against his spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor," who would otherwise, under the will or the laws of succession, have taken the property so bequeathed or devised. (Italics added.) In other words, before said 1937 amendment the general expression "legal heirs" was used in section 41, and after the said amendment a specific expression designating certain heirs was used in said section. Before the amendment, a niece was included in section 41 under the general expression "legal heirs"; and after the amendment, a niece was included in that section under the specific designation of certain heirs. Under said section 41, before said amendment, there was no limitation as to how distant the degree of relationship of "legal heirs" might be. After said amendment of that section, the degree of relationship of a person who might invalidate a testamentary disposition to charity of more than one-third of an estate, within the provisions of said section 41, was limited to a certain classification of heirs. The effect of the amendment, therefore, was to make a limitation as to the degree of relationship of heirs who could invalidate such testamentary gifts to charity. Such a limitation enlarged or extended the right of a testator to make testamentary gifts to charity, by decreasing the number or classes of heirs who could object to such disposition of property. The 1937 amendment eliminated some of the collateral and more distant relatives in whose behalf the charitable gift restrictions had theretofore operated. A niece, however, was not one of the collateral relatives so eliminated by the amendment but was retained, under an express provision of the amendment, as one in whose behalf said restrictions operated. Section 41 was no more favorable to a niece after the amendment in 1937 than it was before the amendment, since a niece was included in that section before and after the amendment. With respect to charitable institutions, however, said section was more favorable to them after the amendment than it was before, since there were fewer classes of heirs who could object to charitable bequests. As above stated, section 43 was not amended, and it expressly provided that nothing "contained" in said "article" should apply when certain conditions stated in section 43 existed. Section 41, being "contained" in said Article II, was subject to said provisions of section 43. Former section 1313 of the Civil Code, upon which said Article II was based, provided in the last portion thereof that "Nothing in this section contained shall apply" under certain conditions there stated, which conditions were the same as those stated in section 43. (Italics added.) Under said section 1313 of the Civil Code, when said certain conditions existed, that is, the decedent left no husband, wife, child, grandchild or parent and the will was executed more than six months prior to the death of the testator, the "legal heirs" referred to in that section could not invalidate the testamentary disposition to charity. In Re Estate of Graham, 1923, 63 Cal.App. 41, 218 P. 84 (which was decided when section 1313 of the Civil Code was in effect) the testatrix left no husband, parent, child or grandchild. She executed a will more than six months prior to her death, and gave more than one-third of her estate to charity. Second cousins (as shown by the transcript therein) of testatrix filed objections to a distribution under the terms of the will. The court overruled said objections and ordered that the estate be distributed in accordance with the will. The effect, therefore, of that decision was that the provisions in said section 1313 in the Civil Code, which were the same as the present provisions in section 43 of the Probate Code, rendered inapplicable the other provisions of section 1313, with respect to objections by "legal heirs," when the will had been executed more than six months before the death of a decedent, who left none of the relatives listed in section 43. In interpreting the Probate Code provisions relative to "Gifts to Charity," especially in view of the reference in section 43 to the whole of Article II, all of the code sections in said Article II should be considered together and as a whole. When so considered, the interpretation of Article II, insofar as the effect of the provisions of section 43 (relative to a will made more than six months before death) is concerned, should be the same as the interpretation in Re Estate of Graham, supra, of the similar provision in former section 1313 of the Civil Code. In Re Estate of Yule, 1943, 57 Cal.App.2d 652, 135 P.2d 386, which arose after the 1937 amendment to section 41, it was contended by appellants that a testamentary disposition of property to charity should be limited to one-third of the estate. The appellants were half-sisters, nephews and nieces (as shown by the clerk's transcript therein). Respondents contended, and it was so held, that under section 43 the disposition was valid. The court said, 57 Cal.App.2d at page 655, 135 P.2d at page 388: "It is provided in section 43 of the Probate Code that the restriction referred to in section 41 shall not be applicable to bequests or devises made by will executed at least six months prior to the death of a testator who leaves neither spouse, child, grandchild or parent. The will now before us was executed more than six months before the death of decedent, who left none of the relatives listed in section 43 of the code. It follows that the gift in question is not limited by the restrictions of section 41." In the present case, the will was executed more than six months before the death of decedent, who left none of the relatives listed in section 43 of the Probate Code. The testamentary gift herein to a charitable institution is not limited by the restrictions of section 41 of the Probate Code.

[3, 4] The amendment of section 41 in 1937 did not operate to repeal section 43. The presumption is against repeal by implication. The subject matter of the two sections is not the same. In amending section 41 the legislature did not attempt to revise the law covered by the two sections, and as those sections now stand they are not less harmonious or less reconcilable than they were before the amendment. For these and for other reasons the two sections must be read together. See 23 Cal.Jur. 694-703.

[5] The order settling the second and final account, and the order for final distribution are affirmed. The appeal from the order sustaining the demurrers is dismissed, such order not being an appealable order.

1. Fraud $\S$ 58(2)

In action for fraud in sale of dwelling house to plaintiff, evidence justified trial court's conclusions that defendant corporation's local manager should have informed himself of prior leaky condition of house before making representations to plaintiff that it was in perfect condition, and was guilty of actual fraud in making such representations after his attention was directed to repairs necessitated by former leaks, even if he believed such representations to be true. though rescission of contract would not afford buyer adequate remedy.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edward J. Kelly, Judge.

Action by Arthur L. Herzog against the Capital Company, a corporation, and another for fraud and deceit in the sale of a dwelling house to plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Louis Ferrari, of San Francisco, and Edmund Nelson and G. L. Berrey, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Monroe & McInnis and C. Rupert Linley, all of San Diego, for respondent.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment awarding plaintiff damages for fraud and deceit in the sale of a dwelling to him.

The residence in question is located in the city of San Diego and it is admitted that it was owned by defendants, with the record title standing in the name of the Capital Company. At the time of the sale a Mr. Yakel was local manager of the Capital Company in San Diego.

In June, 1938, plaintiff was in search of a residence in San Diego. He went to the office of Hotchkiss and Anewalt, realtors, and was shown the house in question by Mr. Yakel who took him through it. The house had been newly painted inside and out and the floors had been sanded and refinished. In the inspection plaintiff noticed that lines in the plaster in one of the upstairs bedrooms indicated that the plaster had been repaired and then painted. He called Yakel's attention to those patches and was assured that the house was in perfect condition in all respects. In the words of plaintiff, Yakel said, "there had been some leaks in the house at some time, but they had been patched and repaired, but at that time the house was perfectly intact."

Both plaintiff and Roscoe Porter testified that Yakel told plaintiff, in effect, that $1000 had been spent on the house; that it had been completely repaired; that it was in perfect condition. Plaintiff testified that he believed those representations and relied on them; that he would not have purchased the house had he known its true condition; that he did not learn of the falsity of those representations until Deember, 1939, or early in January, 1940; that between the time he purchased the house in June, 1938, and December, 1939, or January, 1940, there had been no hard rains; that in December, 1939, or early in January, 1940, there were very hard rains; that the house then leaked very badly; that the water poured in through three of the walls, ran down the walls, and dropped from the ceilings; that this recurred in succeeding hard rains; that the interior plaster became loose and hung from the ceilings; that furniture had to be stacked and covered to protect it from water. The condition described in the record was very bad and shows that the house was unfit for habitation in such condition.

Plaintiff had repairs made in 1940, but the leaking was not stopped. He finally employed an architect to investigate and advise him. This architect finally removed sections of the interior plaster in order to determine the cause of the leaks. He found structural defects in the original construction of the building; that there was no cross-bracing in the walls which permitted them to sway from wind pressure or during earth tremors. This would tend to crack the exterior and interior plaster. There was no sheeting on the outside of the studding under the exterior stucco. The studding was covered with a paper that was not waterproof. A wire mesh was applied over this paper and covered with exterior stucco which was not waterproof resulting in the rotting of the paper and the rusting of the wire. Water came in around the windows and other places besides through the plaster.

The leaks were finally stopped at a cost to plaintiff of something more than $2339.39. Two of the exterior walls and part of a third were covered with water proof paper, metal lath and water proof stucco. All of the windows were removed and others installed. The interiors of several rooms were replastered and redecorated. There were other necessary repairs which we need not specify.

From 1926 to 1937, the house had been owned and occupied by Irvin M. Schulman. It had leaked during heavy rains during the entire time of his occupancy. He had expended about $4000 in unsuccessful attempts to stop those leaks.

In 1937 he sold the house, through Mr. Yakel, to defendants. He told Mr. Yakel about the house leaking and sold it "as is".

Thus Mr. Yakel had actual knowledge of the leaky condition of the house prior to its sale to plaintiff.

Plaintiff paid $9500 for the house. There is evidence to the effect that its reasonable market value in the condition it was in at the time of the sale to plaintiff was not more than $4500. The trial court gave plaintiff judgment for $3500 damages.

Defendants argue that reasonable market value is not the equivalent of "actual value" which is now made the basis of assessing damages in fraud cases such as this. Sec. 3343, Civil Code. As the case must be retried we need not decide this question.

Defendants attack the judgment on many grounds. It is argued that the complaint fails to state a cause of action; that the action was barred by the statute of limitations; that the representations made by Yakel were puffing and sales talk and mere expressions of opinion; that there was no evidence that defendants knew the representations were false.

[1] We need devote little space to the consideration of these questions. The plaintiff did inspect the house but the structural defects were concealed and were only discovered during hard rains and after large holes were cut in the plaster. Signs of leaking had been covered by the repairs made. Yakel knew the history of the leaks in the house over a long period of time. He made positive statements to plaintiff that the house was in perfect condition even after his attention had been directed to repairs in the interior plaster undoubtedly made necessary by former leaks. The trial court was fully justified in concluding that the knowledge possessed by Yakel of the prior leaky condition of the house did not justify his positive representations to plaintiff that it was in perfect condition. While Yakel may not have actually known that the prior leaks had not been stopped, in view of his knowledge of the history of the house he should have informed himself on that subject before making the positive representations that the house was in perfect condition which carried the clear implication that it would not leak. The trial court was justified in concluding that "under the law it is a matter about which he should have informed himself before making the representations. * * * that the defendant's positive assertions in a manner not warranted by the information he possessed, of that which was not true even though he believed it to be true, constituted actual fraud within the meaning of subdivision 2 of section 1572 of the Civil Code." Shearer v. Cooper, 21 Cal.2d 695, 134 P.2d 764, 768; Graham v. Los Angeles First N. T. & S. Bank, 3 Cal.2d 37, 43 P.2d 543.

[2] The facts before us present as clear a case of actual fraud and deceit on the part of Yakel with consequent damage to plaintiff as any called to our attention in a considerable time. Yakel was a regular employee of the Capital Company and was described by its assistant secretary as "local manager" in San Diego. He had negotiated the sale of another house to plaintiff by defendants in June, 1936. He negotiated the sale of the house involved here by Schulman to defendants. He negotiated the sale of the house by defendants to plaintiff. He was their agent and the knowledge of the agent, within the scope of his employment, is usually considered to be the knowledge of the principal.

[3] Plaintiff purchased the house in June, 1938. The action was filed October 21, 1942, more than three years thereafter. It is alleged in the complaint, and plaintiff testified, that the fraud was not discovered until December, 1939, or early in January, 1940, less than three years before the action was filed. Plaintiff further testified that there were no hard rains between June, 1938, and December 1939, so there had been no leaks and the fraud had not been discovered. The trial court was justified in regarding the allegations of the complaint, as well as the proof, sufficient, and in holding that the statute of limitations had not run. Rutherford v. Rideout Bank, 11 Cal.2d 479, 80 P.2d 978, 117 A.L.R. 383.

The next argument of defendants is much more serious to the cause of plaintiff. The agreement to purchase signed by plaintiff contained the following:

"The undersigned has examined said property and each and every part thereof, and agrees to purchase same in its existing condition and the undersigned agrees that there are no promises, representations, verbal understandings or agreements, excepting those contained herein.

"I understand that the sale of subject property is subject to acceptance by Capital Company, San Francisco, and in the event said offer is rejected, deposit set forth shall be returned."

Commencing with Speck v. Wylie, 1 Cal.2d 625, 36 P.2d 618, 619, 95 A.L.R. 760, it has been consistently held in California that similar provisions would not prohibit rescission of a contract obtained by the fraud of a selling agent committed without the knowledge of the principal. The reason for the rule is thus stated in a concurring opinion by Mr. Associate Justice Shenk:

"As I understand this rule, it is that an innocent principal so contracting with another may relieve himself from liability for the fraud of his agent, but he is nevertheless subject to rescission on the part of the defrauded party. The rule proceeds upon the theory that an innocent principal so contracting may not be permitted to enrich himself by reason of his agent's fraud, and that any property received by such principal is held by him as a constructive trustee for the person defrauded." See, also, Lozier v. Janss Inv. Co., 1 Cal.2d 666, 36 P.2d 620; Greenberg v. Du Bain Realty Corp., 2 Cal.2d 628, 42 P.2d 628; Graham v. Los Angeles, etc., Bank, supra; Weiner v. Roof, 10 Cal.2d 450, 74 P.2d 736; Rutherford v. Rideout Bank, supra; Longway v. Newberry, 13 Cal.2d 603, 91 P.2d 110; Curtis v. Title Guarantee, etc., Co., 3 Cal.App.2d 612, 40 P.2d 562, 42 P.2d 323; Rothstein v. Janss Inv. Corp., 45 Cal. App.2d 64, 113 P.2d 465.

It is also stated in many of those cases that an action for damages could not be maintained by the defrauded buyer against the innocent principal under the circumstances disclosed. Each of the actions was for rescission so such statement was not necessary for the decision.

Plaintiff seeks to distinguish those cases from the instant case. In practically all of them the agent committing the fraud was a broker whose compensation depended on his success in completing the sale. Here the agent committing the fraud was a regular employee who occupied the position of local manager of the Capital Company. The authority he possessed is not made at all clear in the record.

It is argued that the knowledge of this agent should be imputed to his principal and that the principal is responsible for his fraud; that, therefore, defendants were not innocent principals and should not have the protection of the rules announced in the foregoing cases.

[4] It is recognized in California that "the rule generally is that one who accepts the fruits of a fraud, with knowledge of the misrepresentations or concealments by which the fraud was perpetrated, thereby inferentially ratifies the fraud complained of and will be liable therefor, even though he did not personally participate in the fraud, and this is so apart from any consideration of the theory of agency." McClung v. Watt, 190 Cal. 155, 211 P. 17, 20.

In Kalkruth v. Resort Properties, Ltd., 57 Cal.App.2d 146, 134 P.2d 513, 516, relied on by plaintiff, the sale was negotiated by an agent and the contract contained a clause somewhat similar to the one involved in the instant case. The fraudulent representations were made by a selling agent but were later repeated, ratified and affirmed by the president and general manager of the corporation selling the property. A judgment for damages was affirmed, this court saying: "If the principal participates in the fraud, then the fraud becomes its own and it cannot escape liability."

[5] It seems to us that it might be possible to draw a logical distinction between fraud committed by a broker authorized by the owner to act in a sale where compensation depends on concluding the sale, and fraud on the part of a regular employee of the owner who was its local manager. Here rescission does not afford plaintiff an adequate remedy as he had spent a little less than $3500 in repairs and in betterments in addition to the sums paid on the purchase price. However, we have reluctantly reached the conclusion that the judgment for damages must be reversed. This is compelled by the cases of Harnischfeger Sales Corp. v. Coats, 4 Cal.2d 319, 48 P.2d 662, and Schroeder v. Dickinson & Gillespie Corp., 6 Cal.App.2d 175, 44 P.2d 425. Any further relaxation of the rule of Gridley v. Tilson, 202 Cal. 748, 262 P. 322, must be made by the Supreme Court and not by us.

Harnischfeger Sales Corp. v. Coats, supra, involved a judgment for damages for fraud against the seller committed by its agent. The contract of sale contained a clause very similar to the one involved in the instant case. The judgment for damages was reversed by the Supreme Court because of that clause in the contract. The briefs, filings on the petition for hearing, and the opinion of the District Court of Appeal (40 P.2d 875) give a much more extended statement of facts than those set forth by the Supreme Court. Those facts cannot be distinguished in principle from the facts of the instant case. The same conclusion was reached in the case of Schroeder v. Dickinson & Gillespie Corp., supra, in which a hearing was denied by the Supreme Court.

We consider those cases controlling here and therefore the judgment for damages cannot be sustained.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Henry S. Stephenson, deceased, wherein June Rand Stephenson, as executrix, and Marshall B. W. J. WOOD, Justice.

On this appeal by June Rand Stephenson in her individual capacity it is contended that the court lacked jurisdiction to grant the petition for partial distribution to Marshall B. Stephenson, whereby 11,747 shares of the capital stock of Palomas Land & Cattle Company were distributed to him without recognizing in appellant any community interest therein.

Appellant married Henry S. Stephenson on July 11, 1939, and remained his wife until his death on March 29, 1941. Appellant was named as executrix of the will and qualified as such on April 23, 1941. Respondent is the son and only child of decedent by a former marriage. By the terms of the will appellant was given certain real property, all the cash on hand at the time of the testator's death, all of his stock in June Rand Kenilworth Company and the residence. The residue of the estate was given to respondent.

Appellant filed on April 9, 1942, her first account and report as executrix and a petition for partial distribution wherein she alleged that time for presenting claims had expired and all claims presented against the estate had been paid; and that she and respondent had entered into an agreement for the compromise and settlement of certain differences between them respecting their interests in the estate whereby she was to receive from respondent $9,000 in cash and one-fourth of the stock of Hueco Cattle Company, a part of the residue of decedent's estate, and in consideration thereof she agreed among other things to satisfy her claim for family allowance and pay all expenses of administration and succession taxes. She prayed that her account and report be settled and the Hueco stock distributed to herself and respondent in accordance with the terms of the agreement. Respondent had theretofore paid to appellant the agreed $9,000 and on April 24, 1942, orders were made settling the account and report and distributing the Hueco stock as prayed.

Respondent filed a petition for partial distribution on September 3, 1943, asking that the 11,747 shares of the stock of Palomas Land & Cattle Company, which constituted a part of the residue of the estate, be forthwith distributed to him and that appellant be directed to file her final account and close the estate. An order to show cause was issued and served on appellant on September 11, 1943, notifying her that the petition would be heard on September 27, 1943. No objection was filed by appellant to the petition before September 27, 1943, but on that date, after the petition had been called for hearing appellant filed an instrument in which she stated that she appeared in her capacity as widow and objected to a distribution of any of the assets of the estate until her community interest therein be first determined. Appellant's counsel stated at the inception of the hearing that appellant claimed community interest in the Palomas stock on the ground that decedent, following his marriage with appellant, had devoted much time and effort to effect the allowance of a general claim of the Palomas Company against the Mexican government. Appellant's counsel stated that he was "planning to commence proceedings to determine her community interest in the assets of the estate". Respondent's counsel replied that the evidence would show that appellant had no community interest in the Palomas stock and that the court on the hearing could and should determine all claims to the stock by anyone whether as surviving spouse or otherwise. The court overruled appellant's objection and proceeded to hear the evidence on respondent's petition for partial distribution, much of which was directed only to matters showing the efforts and time given by decedent in the interest of the Palomas property. The court filed findings in which it was found that decedent became incapacitated by reason of a "stroke" on July 29, 1940; that during the period of his marriage with appellant decedent had received a salary from the Palomas Company for the services rendered; that respondent conducted as superintendent the operations and business of the Palomas Company; and that appellant at no time owned or acquired any interest, community or otherwise, in the shares of the Palomas Company stock.

After the commencement of the hearing on respondent's petition appellant filed a separate petition in which she asked that it be decreed that she had a community interest in the stock in the Palomas Company. With this petition she filed a demand for a jury trial.

[1] The probate court unquestionably had jurisdiction to determine what interest appellant had, as surviving wife, in the estate which was being administered and could determine what property, if any, was community property. Colden v. Costello, 50 Cal.App.2d 363, 122 P.2d 959. It is conceded that these questions could be determined upon final distribution. In re Estate of Kelpsch, 203 Cal. 613, 265 P. 214. Appellant contends, however, that prior to final distribution the only method by which the interest of a surviving wife in alleged community property can be determined is that provided by sections 1080 and 1081 of the Probate Code, commonly called proceedings to determine heirship.

[2] The proceedings for partial distribution of an estate prior to final distribution have been authorized at all times since the establishment of the probate courts in California. The provisions now in effect on the subject are sections 1000 and 1001 of the Probate Code. It is made mandatory by section 1001 that the court make the order of distribution, for it is there provided that if it appears that the estate is but little indebted and that inheritance taxes have been paid and that the distribution of the portion of the estate may be made without loss to creditors or injury to others "the court shall make an order" for the delivery of the share of the estate or such portion thereof as the court may designate to the person entitled thereto. It is common knowledge that for many years petitions for partial distribution have been used by widows in California as a means for having their community interests determined. 11B Cal.Jur. 688. And in response to petitions for partial distribution filed by others widows have brought and obtained their community property interests. In Re Estate of McCarthy, 127 Cal. App. 80, 15 P.2d 223, a petition for partial distribution was filed by a nephew of the decedent. The widow, Gertrude McCarthy, claimed a community interest in the property but the court found that she had no community interest therein. The reviewing court reversed the decree, holding that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding that the appellant had no community interest in the property sought to be distributed, and remanded the cause for a determination of the question as to what portion of the property of the estate, if any, was community property.

[3] The Probate Code clearly gives power to the court to order a partial distribution of an estate and, given the prescribed conditions, it is made mandatory upon the court to make the order. But to exercise that power accurately it is necessary that it first be determined what persons are entitled to the order and what portion or portions of the estate should be distributed to them. The same reasons which make it proper for the court to exercise jurisdiction to determine the interest of the widow upon final distribution are applicable when the court is called upon to order a partial distribution. In Re Estate of Ross, 187 Cal. 454, 202 P. 641, the appeal was by a relative of the decedent from an order granting a petition by the administrator for a ratable distribution. The court, in referring to William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, 48 P. 323, said that the term distribution includes not only the determination of the persons entitled thereto but also the "proportion or parts" to which each is entitled, and stated [187 Cal. 454, 202 P. 646]: "Although that case involved a final distribution, the same considerations apply to a distribution under section 1663, for, before the court can make an order for ratable distribution, it is necessary to know who the parties entitled to the estate are. Therefore in such a proceeding the court may determine who the heirs are and to what proportion of the estate each is entitled."

[4,5] As above noted, at the commencement of the hearing on respondent's petition no proceedings to determine heirship were pending. The filing of the heirship proceedings during the progress of the hearing did not compel the court to terminate the hearing and decide the issues then before the court at a later hearing on appellant's heirship petition. All of the interested parties were then before the court and the issues were clearly set forth. Appellant had had notice of the pendency of respondent's petition and was not prejudiced by the action of the court in proceeding therewith.

[6] Appellant's claim that she was prejudiced by being deprived of a jury trial is without merit. She made no demand for a jury trial in the matter heard by the court. Her only demand for a jury trial was made at the time she filed her own petition to determine heirship and, as we have seen, the court was justified in proceeding with the hearing of the issues on respondent's petition for partial distribution.

The order is affirmed. Respondent to recover costs on appeal from appellant in her individual capacity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harold B. Landreth, Judge.

Mae A. Wilson was convicted of feloniously employing an instrument upon the person of another with intent to procure a miscarriage, and she appeals.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Morris Lavine, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and T. G. Negrich, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Defendant was accused by information of the violation of section 274 of the Penal Code in that on August 2, 1943, she feloniously employed an instrument upon the person of Marcella Anderson with the intent to procure a miscarriage. Having been found guilty by a jury, she has appealed from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

Mrs. Anderson testified that on July 31, 1943, she had talked to defendant, a physician, on the telephone, stating that she had missed one period; that defendant told her that the fee would be $100 and to come to her office on August 2. The witness went to defendant's office on August 2 with her husband. Defendant told her husband that since the patients were women he could not remain. The witness gave $100 to defendant and asked her what method she used and was told that it was a curettement. Defendant then placed the witness upon an operating table. Mrs. Anderson did not see any instrument but she felt something inserted into her vagina. She stated that defendant was in front of her, working between her legs. She felt a "motion of cleaning inside of her" and suffered pain. She was on the table about thirty-five minutes and during this time she heard a noise, "the sound the different things made, she laid down different things that she used that I felt inside of me". After she left the operating table she felt weak. Defendant told her to take a dose of castor oil when she reached home. The witness then went downstairs where her husband met her and they went home. When she arrived home she continued to bleed and the next day she was taken to the hospital.

Harold Anderson testified that he was the husband of Marcella Anderson; that he went to the office of defendant with his wife on August 2 but that he was told to remain outside of the office because of the presence of women patients. He stated that he gave $100 to his wife and then went downstairs. He stated that he knew what his wife went to defendant's office for and when asked if he took her there for the purpose of having an abortion performed he stated, "well that was more or less up to her".

Maynard Young, a special agent for the Board of Medical Examiners, testified that he was one of the arresting officers; that he found no instruments in defendant's office nor any records of her business for the past year.

Dr. Charles Malone testified that he is a physician and that he attended Mrs. Anderson at the General Hospital beginning August 4, 1943. He stated that he found a body in the uterus, that the patient "was about to lose the pregnancy conception which was in the uterus". When asked concerning her condition he answered, "inevitable abortion". He stated that it was his "opinion that the abortion was induced". The witness further stated: "We cannot specify what has been used. The means of inducing an abortion are many and various. We can only say that there was some interference. I couldn't say whether it was an instrument or something else."

Defendant denied that she had performed an abortion or curettement on Mrs. Anderson or that she had in any manner interfered with the pregnancy of Mrs. Anderson. She stated that she did not know that Mrs. Anderson was pregnant and that she had received only the sum of $10. She further stated that she attempted to make a bimanual examination of the vagina but was unable to complete the examination because "she was too sore and tender".

[1] The testimony of Marcella Anderson was not corroborated as required by law. A defendant cannot be convicted of the crime commonly called abortion upon the testimony of the woman upon or with whom the offense was committed, unless she is corroborated by other evidence. Penal Code, § 1108. Nor can a conviction be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense. Penal Code, § 1111. We need not consider whether the testimony of Harold Anderson would supply corroboration of the testimony of his wife, for he aided and abetted in the transaction and was an accomplice therein. There is nothing whatever in the testimony of Dr. Malone which connects defendant with Mrs. Anderson's condition. It might be inferred from his testimony that steps had been taken to bring about a miscarriage but in no way was defendant connected with the transaction by Dr. Malone's testimony.

[2] It was ruled in the supplemental opinion in People v. Josselyn, 39 Cal. 393, 400: "An essential element in the crime is a criminal intent on the part of the defendant; and any testimony, in addition to that of the witness, Locke, tending to show such intent, would be a sufficient corroboration of her testimony to bring the case within the statute, even though she might not be corroborated in respect to the particular method employed to produce the abortion." In People v. Wah Hing, 15 Cal. App. 195, 209, 114 P. 416, it was held that the "modified view" in the Josselyn case was the "correct view". This rule is approved in People v. Lee, 81 Cal.App. 49, 53, 252 P. 763, and in People v. Gilman, 43 Cal.App. 451, 455, 185 P. 310. An application of the rule of the Josselyn case compels the conclusion that the record fails to disclose the requisite corroboration of the testimony of Mrs. Anderson. No inference can be drawn from the testimony of any witness except that of Mrs. Anderson, or possibly that of her husband-accomplice, that defendant was guilty of any criminal intent.

[3,4] The trial court erred to the prejudice of defendant in admitting the testimony of the witness Maynard Young concerning a conversation which he had with defendant. It appears that the prosecution considered that it would assist in establishing the guilt of defendant by proof that the officers found no instruments in her office. In People v. Lee, supra, it was held that surgical instruments which had been found in the defendant's possession were admissible in evidence to show guilt notwithstanding it was admitted that the miscarriage of the prosecutrix was sought to be accomplished by administering medicine. It was held that it could be fairly inferred that the instruments would have been used in the subsequent treatment of the prosecutrix if she had continued to remain under the care of the defendant. In the present case we have the opposite situation, for the prosecution attempted to show the guilt of defendant by the fact that she had no instruments in her office. If the reasoning in the Lee case is correct, it would appear that the absence of the instruments in the present case is an immaterial feature. But the prosecution not only introduced evidence to show the absence of surgical instruments in defendant's office but in doing so it improperly brought before the jury a conversation which the officer had had with defendant in which the officer asked defendant the whereabouts of her instruments and she replied, "that those instruments had never been returned, we had taken them at the time of the previous arrest". A motion was made to strike this testimony but the motion was denied by the trial court. Testimony concerning a previous arrest of defendant was clearly inadmissible. The testimony was improperly interjected into the case in an improper attempt to prove an immaterial fact.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

LANE et al. v. PACIFIC GREYHOUND LINES et al.
No. 12487.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Hearing Granted Aug. 30, 1944.

1. Evidence ⇨118

Whether declarations constitute a part of the res gestae does not depend on what is said, but on the circumstances under which and when and where the declarations are made.

2. Evidence ⇨118

Some discretion must be allowed the trial court in determining whether declarations are admissible as a part of the res gestae.

3. Evidence ⇨118

Where, following collision, bus driver gave aid to two passengers who had fallen from their seats, then ascertained whether any passengers had been injured, and requested passengers to remain in the bus, left bus and inspected crushed car, then went out on highway and flagged a passing motorist and sent him for police aid, following which bus driver secured and lighted flares and placed them on highway, exclusion of subsequent declarations by bus driver that he had not seen approaching automobile before collision, as not a part of the res gestae, was not an abuse of discretion.

4. Appeal and error ⇨970(2)

Ruling of trial court on declarations offered as a part of the res gestae should not be disturbed in absence of abuse of discretion.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1056(4)

Any error in holding that defendant bus driver's statements after collision were binding on him alone, and not on defendant bus company, was harmless in view of jury's verdict for both defendants.

6. Trial ⇨234(1)

Where jury was permitted to consider the effect of bus driver's declarations in determining driver's negligence and was required to find for or against driver and bus company, an instruction that bus driver's declarations were not binding on bus company was proper.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1064(4)

Where it was doubtful whether language used in instruction was understood by jury to mean anything more than that negligence was not presumed and that the party alleging negligence had the burden of establishing it, the instruction was not prejudicial although there was language used which implied that defendants as well as deceased were entitled to benefit of rebuttable presumption of due care. Code Civ.Proc. § 1963, subd. 4.

8. Automobiles ⇨246(43)

Where bus company and driver pleaded contributory negligence and also that at time of accident motorist was making an illegal left turn and there was evidence to support such defenses, court properly charged on appropriate signal for a left turn as defined by the Vehicle Code. Vehicle Code, §§ 544, 546, 604, St.1935, pp. 185, 186, St.1939, p. 2199.

9. Trial ⇨234(4), 240

In action for motorist's death resulting from collision with bus, court properly refused to charge that though driver was not exceeding speed limit, if he was going too fast in the 25 mile an hour zone north of intersection, such negligence would render him liable, since if he had been going at a slower rate the decedent would have cleared the intersection before the bus struck his automobile.

PETERS, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. F. Bray, Judge.

Action by Naomi Gae Lane, Harold Lane, and Marjorie Dam against the Pacific Greyhound Lines and James C. Perkins for death of John Harold Lane resulting from collision with bus owned by corporate defendant and driven by individual defendant. From a judgment for defendants, the plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

F. H. Dam, of Berkeley, for appellants.

Cooley, Crowley & Supple, of San Francisco, and T. H. DeLap, of Richmond, for respondents.

KNIGHT, Justice.

This is an action for damages brought by the adult heirs of John Harold Lane who met his death in a collision between an automobile he was driving and a Greyhound bus. The collision occurred about 7:30 o'clock on the night of December 22, 1940, on San Pablo Avenue at the Tehama Street intersection, in El Cerrito, Contra Costa County. The deceased was travelling in a northerly direction; the bus was southbound, and the collision occurred as the deceased was making a left turn off San Pablo Avenue into Tehama Street. Plaintiffs alleged that the collision was caused by the negligent operation of the bus by the driver, James C. Perkins, while driving the bus within the scope of his employment; therefore under the doctrine of respondeat superior Pacific Greyhound Lines, a corporation, was joined with Perkins as party defendant to the action. The joint answer filed by the defendants admitted that Perkins was driving the bus in the course of his employment; but they denied the allegations of negligence on his part, and set up two special defenses. In the first it was charged generally that at the time of the accident the deceased was operating his car in a careless and negligent manner, and that such negligence was a proximate cause of the accident and proximately contributed thereto. In the second special defense it was alleged that at the time of the accident the deceased was making an unlawful left turn across the central dividing line of San Pablo Avenue and that such unlawful act was a proximate cause of the collision and contributed proximately thereto. This defense was based on the provisions of section 604 of the Vehicle Code of 1939, St. 1939, p. 2199, in effect at the time of the accident, which declared: "It is unlawful for any person to drive any vehicle on any State highway which has been divided except to the right of the central dividing section, curb, separation or line or to drive any vehicle over, upon or across any such dividing section, curb, separation or line, or to make any left turn or semicircular or U turn on any such divided highway except through an opening in the dividing curb, section, separation or line." A jury returned a unanimous verdict in favor of defendants; a motion for new trial was made and denied, and from the judgment entered on the verdict plaintiffs appeal.

Two main points are urged in support of the appeal. The first involves rulings and an instruction limiting the effect of certain testimony introduced by plaintiffs; and the second concerns the giving and refusing to give other instructions. No contention is made that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. However, a disposal of plaintiffs' first point requires a statement of facts.

Construing the evidence most strongly in favor of the defendants, and resolving all conflicts therein in support of the implied findings of the jury, the essential facts established thereby are as follows: San Pablo Avenue at the time and place of the accident ran in a northerly and southerly direction. It was a four lane state highway, approximately 81 feet wide between curbs, and was divided along the center by a painted double line. The north and south bound traffic lanes on each side of the double line were divided by a painted single line, those immediately east and west of the center double line being 10 feet 10 inches wide, the extreme westerly lane being 31½ feet wide, and the extreme easterly lane being 26 feet 2 inches wide. Tehama Street was a short street, which entered and ended on the west side of San Pablo Avenue. It was 25.80 feet wide between curbs, without any sidewalks. The jury was instructed in accordance with the provisions of section 604 of the Vehicle Code, that if at the time of the accident "there was a central dividing line on San Pablo Avenue without any opening in said central dividing line or turning marker or markers at the intersection of Tehama, then under the law John Lane had no right to make or attempt to make a left hand turn into Tehama at said intersection"; and there is an abundance of evidence showing that there was a painted double central dividing line across the Tehama Street intersection, without any opening or any turning marker or markers at the intersection. The accident occurred on a Sunday night during a heavy rain storm. The vicinity of the intersection was extremely dark, the closest street light being on the northerly side of San Pablo Avenue approximately 250 feet from the Tehama Street intersection. A street traffic sign located 62 feet north of the line of Tehama Street on the west side of San Pablo Avenue marked the end of the 25 mile an hour zone, south of which it was lawful to drive up to 45 miles an hour. The El Cerrito police station was located on the east side of San Pablo Avenue about 500 feet north of Tehama Street.

The deceased lived on Tehama Street, about 116 feet from San Pablo Avenue. He was 66 years old, his eyesight was impaired, and his operator's license required him, while driving a car, to "wear adequate glasses." On the night of the accident he was driving home alone from San Francisco in an Essex sedan. The bus was travelling at a speed of 23 miles an hour in the most westerly southbound lane. The headlights were burning, and there was a large illuminated sign across the top of the front of the bus displaying the name "Oakland." When the deceased reached a point about 50 feet south of the southerly curb line of Tehama Street he turned suddenly to the left across the double dividing line in front of the oncoming bus to enter Tehama Street, and the impact occurred in the extreme west lane of San Pablo Avenue about 42 feet south of Tehama Street. The front end of the Essex was crushed and the deceased received injuries causing instant death.

Perkins had been a driver for Greyhound for two years, and had been on this particular run for six months immediately preceding the accident. On the night in question, on account of the heavy rains and the extremely wet pavement, he was travelling through the 25 mile an hour zone at 23 miles an hour and after passing into the 45 mile an hour zone he continued to travel at only 23 miles an hour. Approaching the Tehama Street intersection he saw at a distance of about a thousand feet the lights of a car approaching in the opposite direction on the east side of the highway, and as its lights came closer he saw that it was pursuing a course next to the double dividing line. Just about as the bus was crossing the Tehama Street intersection Perkins again saw the approaching car; it was about 50 feet away, and without slackening its speed it suddenly made a left turn across the double line into the pathway of the bus. Perkins instantly applied his brakes with full force, sounded his horn, and swerved sharply to the right toward the westerly curb of San Pablo Avenue, but was unable to avoid the collision.

The sudden swerving and stopping of the bus caused two girls to be thrown from the front right seat. Perkins helped them up and after learning that none of the passengers had been hurt, he requested all of them to remain seated in the bus. He then got out of the bus and went forward to see what had happened to the occupant of the other car; and upon reaching the window he saw the deceased slumped over the broken steering wheel. Perkins then stepped out on the highway, signalled a passing automobile and asked the occupant to drive to the police station and notify the police of the accident. He then took some flares from the rear of the bus to light and place in the highway to warn approaching automobiles. On account of the heavy rain he was unable to light the first two, but succeeded in lighting the third one. Several police officers, including the chief and a lieutenant, arrived within a few minutes after the accident, and placed more warning flares on the highway. Perkins then went to a nearby house to phone to his employer of the happening of the accident, after which he returned to the scene of the accident and assisted the police in making their investigation of the accident, and in taking photographs and measurements.

There was some testimony given by the two girls who were riding on the right front seat, aged 15 and 12 years, respectively, and by the brother of the younger girl, aged 15, who was riding immediately behind the girls, to the effect that the windshield wiper on the right hand side of the bus was not operating, and that at some time prior to the collision the driver had wiped the windshield on that side with a cloth; and the older girl and the boy testified that by looking through the window at objects they passed they estimated that the bus was travelling between 35 and 45 miles an hour immediately before the collision. In contradiction thereof, however, the driver testified that on account of the heavy rain storm he was watching the speedometer and driving "very cautiously" and kept the speed down to 23 miles an hour, even after passing the sign post into the 45 mile an hour zone. He also testified that the windshield wipers were working; and the record shows that when the police arrived they tested both windshield wipers and found that they were in good working order. Furthermore, the driver testified that he had no recollection of having wiped the windshield with a cloth; that the bus was provided with a windshield fan to prevent the windshield from "fogging."

Some of plaintiffs' witnesses testified that pieces of broken glass were seen and found within the intersection, upon which testimony plaintiffs seem to base the theory that the collision occurred within the intersection. But such theory was clearly negated, not only by the testimony of the driver, but by the testimony given by three police officers as to the physical conditions found to exist immediately after the accident and the next morning when they made further investigation. In this respect the record shows that the investigation conducted by them immediately following the accident extended over a period of an hour and a half; they took pictures with the aid of a synchronizer and flash lights, and also took various precise measurements with a steel tape; and with the aid of lighted flares and flash lights they carefully examined the surface of the highway. The police officers testified that the point of impact was 40 feet south of the south curb line of Tehama Street, in the extreme west southbound lane of San Pablo Avenue, and that no glass or debris of any kind was seen or found north of that point. The bus was about 35 feet long, and the police testified that the front end of the bus stopped 82 feet south of the south curb line of Tehama Street, the front right corner of the bus being $13\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the west curb line of San Pablo Avenue, and the left rear corner 4 feet west of the painted single line dividing the two southbound lanes. The bus was thus facing diagonally to the right or west, the direction in which it was turned by the driver when he saw the car of the deceased start to make the left turn.

On the morning following the accident, Cyrus K. Dam, son of plaintiffs' counsel and son-in-law of the deceased, visited the scene of the accident and took some pictures and measurements of the highway; and as a witness for plaintiffs he produced a map he had prepared from notes and measurements made by him that morning and during the several weeks following the accident. The map was not introduced in evidence, but it appears from the testimony given by the witness in connection therewith that it showed a painted single line across the Tehama Street intersection with small buttons thereon north and south of the intersection, which the witness claimed represented small painted circles indicating turning points between the circles. But he took no photographs showing any of the painted lines on San Pablo Avenue, nor any circles or buttons or markers of any kind at or near the Tehama Street intersection; and in contradiction of his testimony there is the testimony of three police officers, the driver, and other witnesses who testified positively that there was a double central dividing line running through the Tehama Street intersection and that there were no turning markers or circles or buttons of any kind therein at that intersection. Moreover, the photographs taken by the police on the day after the accident and those taken ten days later plainly show that there was a continuous double central dividing line running through the Tehama Street intersection with no markers or circles therein at that point.

Plaintiffs also introduced testimony to the effect that shortly after the accident the driver had stated that he did not see the other car until he struck it; but the driver positively denied ever having made any such statement, and his testimony that he did see the approaching car before the collision is strongly corroborated not only by the physical conditions found to exist immediately following the accident, but by the testimony of bus passengers to the effect that just before the impact occurred they realized something unusual was about to happen because the driver diverted the course of the bus suddenly to the right and applied the brakes with such force as to throw some of them forward in their seats.

From the foregoing narration it will be seen that the evidence, although conflicting on some points, is amply sufficient to support the verdict in favor of the defendants on any one or all of three grounds: First, that Perkins was not negligent in the operation of the bus; secondly, that the deceased was negligent in making a left turn over the central dividing line on San Pablo Avenue in violation of a state traffic law; and third, that aside from the question of the violation of the state traffic law he was negligent in attempting, under all the existing conditions and circumstances shown by the evidence, to make a left turn across San Pablo Avenue into Tehama Street.

At the time the testimony relating to Perkins' post-accident declarations was received the trial court ruled that they were binding on Perkins for all purposes but were not binding on the Greyhound; and Attorney Hoey, who conducted the trial on behalf of plaintiff (Attorney Dam being associated with him), signified his concurrence in the trial court's ruling and the jury was admonished and afterwards instructed in accordance with such ruling. On motion for new trial, however (Attorney Hoey having soon thereafter withdrawn as plaintiffs' attorney, Lane v. Pacific Greyhound Lines, 51 Cal.App.2d 705, 125 P.2d 510), Attorney Dam contended that Perkins' post-accident declarations were admissible as part of the res gestae and therefore binding also on the Greyhound; and on this appeal the same contention is urged as ground for reversal. There is no merit in the contention.

The particular facts relating thereto are as follows: As their first witness plaintiffs called the driver under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and he was interrogated by both sides as to the circumstances of the accident. In describing it he testified, as above stated, that prior to the collision he had seen the approach of the other car, first at a distance of about a thousand feet, and again when it was only 50 feet away from him. Thereafter plaintiffs called four witnesses, none of whom were bus passengers, and one being a child ten years old, who testified in substance that shortly after the accident Perkins had said that he did not see the other car until he struck it. The first of these witnesses, Floyd Olsen, lived with his wife and ten year old daughter on Tehama Street a short distance from San Pablo Avenue. He testified that upon hearing a crash he looked through the window and saw the light of a bus on San Pablo Avenue; that he then went outside, got in his car which was parked in front of his house, and drove to the scene of the accident; that upon his arrival Perkins was standing on the highway at the bus doorway. The examination of the witness then continued as follows: "Q. And what else did you observe there at that time and place? What did he do, if anything? A. Well, he was standing there, possibly— he gave me the impression at least of being stunned or from shock and he was merely standing there and I looked at the other car or looked at the car ahead of the bus and then I looked at him— to the driver of the bus and said— Mr. Crowley [attorney for defendants]: (interrupting) Now just a minute. What was said there is hearsay as far as the Greyhound is concerned. Mr. Hoey: Well, as far as the defendant Perkins was concerned he was there." The court then said: "It would be binding on Mr. Perkins. It wouldn't be binding on the Greyhound." And Attorney Hoey replied "No." The witness then went on to say: "Well, I turned to the driver and said, 'Where did the other car come from,' and the driver stood there and said 'I don't know where it came from. I didn't see him at all.'" Continuing, Olsen testified that at the driver's request he went back to his home, phoned for the police ambulance, and then returned to the scene of the accident; that after the police arrived he accompanied the driver up to his (Olsen's) home, so the driver could phone to his company; that after Perkins had phoned Mrs. Olsen asked him "where the other car was and he repeated again, 'I didn't see the old man until I hit him,' and this was about, oh, fifteen or twenty minutes, I should judge, after he had made the statement to me first." Attorney Crowley objected to the question in response to which the last answer was given upon the ground that it called for "hearsay insofar as the Greyhound is concerned"; thereupon the court admonished the jury "that this conversation is not binding in any way upon the defendant Pacific Greyhound Lines and is only to be considered by you in connection with establishing any responsibility on the part of the defendant Perkins, any liability on the part of the defendant Perkins." Afterwards Olsen's wife and his ten year old daughter testified to the same statement having been made by Perkins in their home. When Mrs. Olsen was asked the question "And what did he say at that time?" the following proceedings took place: "Mr. Crowley: (interrupting) That is objected to on behalf of the defendant Greyhound Lines, Your Honor, as hearsay, incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, not binding on the defendant Greyhound. Mr. Dam: If Your Honor please, I have been thinking of that same objection over night and there are two propositions that I would like to state to Your Honor very briefly. Now whether or not a statement by the driver of the bus would be what is technically called in the law an admission against interest is one thing and whether or not any statement made by the driver of the bus would be evidence upon the question of whether or not he was guilty of negligence or as tending to show negligence on his part is another thing." Mr. Crowley thereupon stated that it would save time if Mr. Dam would submit authorities on the point, and in response the court said: "Yes. I was going to suggest if you have any authorities you want to present to me get it to me during the noon hour and the other side will do the same and in the meantime I will make the same ruling I did yesterday and instruct the jury that any admissions made, or statements made by the driver of the automobile—of the bus, to Mrs. Olsen is not binding on the Pacific Greyhound Lines but is binding upon himself. Mr. Dam: That's merely as an admission against interests. The Court: Well, it is binding on him for all purposes and it is not binding on the Pacific Greyhound Lines. Now if you can show me any authority to the contrary, then I can instruct the jury to the contrary. Proceed." Plaintiffs' fourth witness on this point, named Gilbert, heard the crash while visiting at a home on San Pablo Avenue about four blocks from the Tehama Street intersection; and he walked up to the scene of the accident. There were several people gathered around when he arrived; and he testified, subject to the same objection and ruling, that he heard the driver make a statement to the effect that he did not know where the other car came from.

At no time after the trial court invited Attorney Dam to submit authorities on the question as to whether the Perkins declarations were binding on the Greyhound, did counsel make any attempt to do so, nor did he thereafter intimate by way of any argument that the trial court's ruling was erroneous; therefore, in conformity with its ruling, and the concurrence therein by Attorney Hoey, the trial court, as part of its charge to the jury, stated: "Any evidence here about any statements, if any, made by the driver, Mr. Perkins, to anyone after the accident, was not admitted against, and is in no way related to or binding on the Pacific Greyhound Lines."

On motion for new trial, however, Mr. Dam argued that Perkins' post-accident declarations were admissible as part of the res gestae, citing the case of Showalter v. Western Pacific R. Co., 16 Cal.2d 460, 106 P.2d 895, 897, decided in November, 1940, about nine months prior to the trial herein; and he now relies on that case as the principal authority in support of his contention that the trial court's ruling herein and the instruction given in conformity therewith were erroneous. In that case, under the facts, it was held in accordance with the trial court's ruling that the declarations were admissible as part of the res gestae. There is no similarity whatever between the facts of that case and those here presented; but applying the law as laid down in that case to the factual situation here presented definitely demonstrates that the trial court's ruling herein and the instruction given in conformity therewith should be sustained.

[1] In the Showalter case the facts were these: About 9 o'clock at night, a railroad brakeman named Showalter was riding on top of a freight car in carrying out a switching movement, and a fellow brakeman named Parrott, who was a member of the same crew, heard Showalter "holler." Parrott ran over to ascertain the trouble, and found Showalter lying across the tracks, between the trucks of the freight car, which had run over him, cutting off his legs, and soon afterwards he died from the effects of his injuries. In the action for damages brought by his widow, Parrott was asked if he had any conversation with the deceased, and he answered, "I did—as I remember, I asked him, 'How in the world did it happen, Joe?'"—"He said, 'I got knocked off.'" Being asked if that were all the conversation, Parrott replied, "Well, he said, 'I am all done, both legs cut off.'" There was no other evidence in the case tending to show the cause of the accident, and it was held that the declarations were properly admitted by the trial court as part of the res gestae. In so holding the court went on to point out that there had been considerable confusion in this and other jurisdictions as to the rule of res gestae and that the rule which it deemed "to be correct was enunciated in the early case of People v. Vernon, 35 Cal. 49, 95 Am.Dec. 49—namely, that declarations which are voluntary and spontaneous and made so near the time of the principal act as to preclude the idea of deliberate design, though not precisely concurrent in point of time therewith, are regarded as contemporaneous and admissible." Later on the court said: "* * * in our opinion the rule to be followed is that where a declaration is made under the immediate influence of the occurrence to which it relates and so near the time of that occurrence as to negative any probability of fabrication, said declaration is admissible." And so in the present case, if immediately following the impact the driver had voluntarily and spontaneously made the declarations attributed to him, there would have been some legal ground upon which it could have been held that under the rule of the Showalter case the declarations were admissible as part of the res gestae. But those are not the facts. As already pointed out, following the impact the driver first gave aid to the two girls who had fallen from their seats; he then took the precaution to ascertain whether any of his passengers had been injured, and requested them to remain seated in the bus; thereupon he got out of the bus, went forward and inspected the crushed car, then went out on the highway and flagged a passing motorist and sent him for police aid, following which he secured and lighted the flares and placed them on the highway. It was after all these things had been done that Olsen claims to have had the conversation with the driver; and the second and third declarations which it is claimed were made to the other parties were made at least 20 minutes after the first one was made to Olsen—after the driver had walked up to Olsen's house and telephoned to his employer, and returned to the scene of the collision. Admittedly the determination of the question of whether the declarations constitute part of the res gestae does not depend on what was said, but on the circumstances under which and when and where the declarations are made. If admissible it makes no difference whether they are in favor of or against the party making them; and it is quite certain that if here, under identical circumstances, the driver had made declarations in his favor, and sought to prove them by the parties to whom they were made, in support of his case, they

[2-4] Furthermore, the Showalter case holds that while heretofore the practice in this state has been to deny any discretion in the trial court in determining the admissibility of alleged res gestae statements, some discretion must necessarily be allowed the court under the doctrine there laid down. And in the present case, on account of the many things that happened between the time of the impact and the conversation Olsen claims to have had with the driver, it clearly would be unreasonable to hold as a matter of law that the trial court's ruling limiting the effect of the declarations constituted an abuse of the exercise of its discretionary power. As said in the Showalter case, in quoting approvingly from Lloyd v. Boulevard Express, 79 Cal. App. 406, 249 P. 837, the trial court before whom the witness appears is better prepared to pass upon the evidence upon which the admissibility of such statements depends than is an appellate court, and its ruling should not be disturbed unless it has abused its discretion. This court adhered to the same doctrine in Siebel v. Shapiro, 58 Cal.App.2d 509, 137 P.2d 56.

In two of the cases cited with approval in the Showalter case it is said that questions as to the admissibility of statements as part of the res gestae depend upon whether such statements are the emanations of acts done, before the excitement usual to the accident has subsided, or are statements made after the excitement has subsided and the witness has time to calculate a policy to be pursued; and in an effort to bring the present case within the forepart of the above rule, plaintiffs call attention to the testimony given by Olsen to the effect that when he first saw the driver on the night of the accident he was given "the impression" that the driver was "stunned." But the trial court, in the exercise of its discretionary power, was fully justified in concluding that all of the driver's activities following the happening of the accident and before Olsen arrived upon the scene, completely refuted any "impression" Olsen may have gained from looking at the driver while he stood on the highway in the dark and in a driving rain storm. Another factual difference between the present case and the Showalter case was this: There the declarant was dead, and his declaration furnished the only means of explaining the cause of the accident; whereas here there was ample evidence showing the circumstances of the accident, including the testimony of the declarant himself, who was fully cross-examined in behalf of the plaintiff. This factor also was one the trial court was entitled to consider in the exercise of its discretionary power in passing upon the question of whether the declarations should be admitted as part of the res gestae.

Two cases which are strikingly similar in their facts to the present case, and which support the trial court's ruling herein, are Bodholdt v. Garrett, 122 Cal.App. 566, 10 P.2d 533, and Shaver v. United Parcel Service, 90 Cal.App. 764, 266 P. 606. In the former case the plaintiffs were injured when struck by a truck belonging to the City of Oakland and driven by an employee named Garrett. Immediately after the accident happened one of plaintiffs' witnesses walked across the street to interview Garrett, and Garrett stated that the collision was due to a broken spring in the front portion of the truck. Plaintiffs claimed that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that this statement or admission of the driver was in no way binding on the City of Oakland. On appeal it was held otherwise, the court saying: "Statements of an employee not part of the res gestae and not made spontaneously or as the result of excitement of the accident are not binding upon the employer. Shaver v. United Parcel Service, 90 Cal.App. 764, 770, 266 P. 606. While it is true that time is not the controlling element in the matter of res gestae, still the statements must be, not only contemporaneous, but voluntary and the result of excitement, and made before a person has time to calculate and consider the form and substance of the explanation."

[5] In any event, plaintiffs have not shown that the trial court's ruling limiting the effect of the declarations operated to their prejudice. As above stated, liability was claimed against the Greyhound only under the doctrine of respondeat superior, and such liability depended entirely upon the issue of the negligence of the driver. Neither under the pleadings, the theory on which the case was tried, nor the evidence, could a verdict have been rendered for or against one of the defendants. If the driver was negligent and his negligence was the proximate cause of the accident, plaintiffs were entitled to a verdict against both defendants, but if the driver was not negligent plaintiffs were not entitled to a verdict against either. The jury was fully instructed accordingly, and it rendered a verdict in favor of the defendants, which necessarily was based on the finding that the driver was not negligent. Even assuming, therefore, that the driver's declarations should have been received in evidence as against both defendants, under the theory that they were part of the res gestae, the only evidentiary effect thereof would have been to raise a conflict on the issue of the driver's negligence; that is, as to whether he did or did not see the approaching car before he struck it; and such a conflict was created and already existed by reason of the admission of the declarations against the driver; and such conflict was resolved by the jury in favor of the driver by the rendition of a verdict in favor of the defendants.

[6] Plaintiffs argue that because of the wording of the instructions hereinabove quoted, the jury was precluded from considering the effects of the declarations as against the Greyhound; but that is not true, because in any event the Greyhound would have been liable if its driver was found to be negligent, and the jury was afforded a full and unlimited right, under the instructions, to consider the effect of the declarations in determining the issue of the driver's negligence. The trial court therefore very properly submitted to the jury but two forms of verdict, one whereby it could find against both defendants, and the other whereby it could find in favor of both defendants.

Moreover, the questions as to the correctness of the trial court's ruling and the propriety of the instruction were restricted to the issue of the driver's negligence. They were in no way related to nor did they involve the determination of the two defenses of the contributory negligence of the deceased, which were raised by the answer and upon which, if all the essential elements thereof were established, defendants were entitled to a verdict even though the driver was found to be negligent; and as we have shown, the evidence is amply sufficient to sustain the verdict on either of these defenses.

On page 64 of appellants' opening brief is set out a quotation purporting to embody the remarks made by the trial court in ruling upon the motion for new trial. That quotation was not taken from the record and forms no part thereof. Attorney Dam sought to have the quotation inserted in the reporter's transcript at the time it was settled, but failed to accomplish that purpose. Thereafter he petitioned Division Two of this court, wherein the appeal was then pending, for an order to compel the trial court to insert those remarks in the transcript. In answer to that petition the trial judge filed an affidavit denying having made the remarks; and the petition was denied. Later a hearing before the Supreme Court was denied. Lane v. Pacific Greyhound Lines, 55 Cal.App.2d 525, 131 P.2d 53.

[7] The objections made by plaintiffs to the other instructions are not sustainable. One of the objections is directed against an excerpt taken from a general instruction relating to presumptions and burden of proof. The entire instruction contains several paragraphs and covers two full pages of the reporter's transcript. The major portion of the general instruction embodies the substance of several separate instructions proposed by plaintiffs based on the rebuttable presumption declared by subdivision 4 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure "That a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns." In one paragraph of the general instruction as given, language was used implying that the defendants as well as the deceased were entitled to the benefit of that rebuttable presumption, and in the following cases it is held that where a party in whose behalf the benefit of the presumption is claimed is alive and testifies fully in the case, the question of his negligence is to be determined on the evidence without regard to the presumption, and that in such cases an instruction based on said code section should not be given. Speck v. Sarver, 20 Cal.2d 585, 128 P.2d 16; Paulsen v. McDuffie, 4 Cal.2d 111, 47 P.2d 709. Reading the general instruction here as a whole, it would seem doubtful whether the language used could have been understood by the jury to mean anything more than that negligence is not presumed and that the party alleging it has the burden of establishing it. In any event, in the cases above cited, it is held that where the party claiming the benefit of the presumption has testified fully in the case, the giving of the instruction embodying said code section is not prejudicial.

driver in making a left turn, the court properly gave an instruction based on sections 544 and 546 of the 1939 Vehicle Code, St.1935, pp. 185, 186, which instruction reads: "The appropriate signal for a left hand turn is that the hand and arm be extended horizontally beyond the side of the automobile continuously during the last fifty feet travelled by the automobile before turning." Plaintiffs' objection thereto is that there was no evidence that the deceased did not comply with the foregoing provisions. The theory on which the defendants based their defenses of contributory negligence, and the testimony given by the driver in support of those defenses, justified the giving of the instruction.

[9] The court refused to give an instruction proposed by plaintiffs to the effect that notwithstanding the driver was not exceeding the speed limit when the collision occurred, nevertheless if he was going too fast in the 25 mile an hour zone north of the intersection, such negligence would render him liable, since if he had been going at a slower rate in the 25 mile an hour zone the decedent would have cleared San Pablo Avenue before the bus struck him. The court was justified in refusing the instruction for two reasons: First, it was a formula instruction, and entirely omitted the proposition that the deceased himself must have been free from contributory negligence; secondly, it was clearly an argumentative instruction. The two remaining instructions proposed by plaintiffs, the refusal to give which is assigned as error, were fully covered by other instructions embodied in the court's charge.

After a complete review of the entire record, we are convinced that the action was fairly and carefully tried by the trial court, that its charge to the jury was fair, full and complete, that the evidence sustains the implied findings of the jury, and that no reasons have been shown which would justify the setting aside of the verdict.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

WARD, J., concurs.

PETERS, Presiding Justice (dissenting).
I dissent.

The majority opinion holds that the trial court correctly ruled that the admissions of Perkins were not admissible against his employer, and, further, that even if they were admissible against the employer, the error in excluding them was not prejudicial. Both holdings, in my opinion, are clearly erroneous.

The majority opinion sets forth in detail the facts most favorable to defendants. There is no doubt that such evidence supports the verdict. The important point is that the evidence was conflicting and would support a verdict for either plaintiffs or defendants. It was plaintiffs' main theory at the trial that Perkins failed to observe decedent's car which admittedly had both headlights lit; that in the exercise of ordinary care he should have observed the oncoming car; that the driver was late on his schedule and was speeding to make up time; that the windshield wiper on the right of the windshield was not working; that just prior to the accident Perkins was engaged in wiping the windshield; that Perkins' negligence in failing to observe the Lane car was the sole proximate cause of the accident. Plaintiffs introduced ample evidence to support each step of this theory of the cause of the accident.

Much is said in the majority opinion about the exact point of impact, and about whether or not a left turn could lawfully be made into Tehama Street. Plaintiffs' witnesses definitely fixed the point of impact within the intersection. The evidence is most unsatisfactory as to whether at this intersection the highway was marked so as to permit a left turn. There is ample evidence to support an implied finding that it was so marked.

Under these circumstances it is obvious that any fair consideration of the question as to whether prejudice occurred as the result of any error must start with the admission that the evidence was of such a nature that it would support a verdict for either plaintiffs or defendants.

The main error complained of is that the trial court erroneously ruled that certain admissions of Perkins were not admissible against the Greyhound company. These admissions were vital to plaintiffs' case. They were introduced for the purpose of showing that Perkins was negligent in failing to keep a proper lookout immediately before the accident. To this end plaintiffs produced four witnesses—Richard Olsen, his wife, his ten-year-old daughter, and a high school teacher. They all testified that within a period varying from two to twenty minutes after the collision Perkins stated that he did not see the Lane car at all prior to the accident. This evidence not only impeached Perkins but was admissible on the basic question as to whether Perkins was negligent. If believed by the jury it necessarily would prove that Perkins was negligent.

These four witnesses were all disinterested. The Olsens lived on Tehama Street, and the high school teacher was visiting near the scene of the collision on the night in question. Mr. Olsen testified that he had never met or spoken with decedent; that he heard the crash and immediately left his home and proceeded to the scene of the accident; that when he arrived Perkins was standing beside the bus and "he gave me the impression at least of being stunned or from shock and he was merely standing there." As Olsen started to testify as to what the driver then said, the following occurred:

"Mr. Crowley [counsel for defendants] (interrupting): Now just a minute. What was said there is hearsay as far as the Greyhound is concerned.

"Mr. Hoey: Well, as far as the defendant Perkins was concerned he was there.

"The Court: It would be binding on Mr. Perkins. It wouldn't be binding on the Greyhound.

"Mr. Hoey: No.

"A. [the witness]: Well, I turned to the driver and said, 'Where did the other car come from,' and the driver stood there and said, 'I don't know where it came from. I didn't see him at all.'"

Olsen then asked the driver if he should call an ambulance. The driver said to get the police ambulance. Olsen then ran home. He estimated that he had been with the driver a minute to two minutes when he started to go back to his home. He called to his wife to telephone for the ambulance, got his flashlight and returned to the scene, using the flashlight to ward off traffic until the police arrived. The police arrived two or three minutes after he returned from telling Mrs. Olsen to telephone. When he had been there "probably ten or fifteen minutes" he returned to his home a second time, taking the driver with him upon his suggestion to the driver that he might want to telephone his employer. The driver telephoned in the kitchen with the door closed. The witness was asked if he heard the driver make any statement when he came out of the kitchen. At this point counsel for defendants objected: "Now we object to that as hearsay insofar as the Greyhound is concerned, your Honor." The court then admonished the jurors as follows: "The jurors are instructed that this conversation is not binding in any way upon the defendant Pacific Greyhound Lines and is only to be considered by you in connection with establishing any responsibility on the part of the defendant Perkins, any liability on the part of the defendant Perkins."

The testimony being thus limited, Olsen was then permitted to testify: "Mrs. Olsen asked him where the other car was and he repeated again, 'I didn't see the old man until I hit him,' and this was about, oh, fifteen or twenty minutes, I should judge, after he had made the statement to me first."

On the following day of the trial, when Mrs. Olsen was on the stand and was asked if she had any conversation with Mr. Perkins, Crowley again stated his objection that anything Perkins said would not be binding on defendant Greyhound. At this point Mr. Dam, who was co-counsel for plaintiffs with Mr. Hoey, expressed his disagreement with the court's ruling that what Perkins said would not bind his employer. Without permitting Dam to pursue his arguments the court suggested that the attorneys present any authorities they had to him during the noon hour, and that in the meantime his ruling would stand. Mrs. Olsen then testified that after using the telephone Perkins said: "I do not know where the old man came from. I didn't see him until I struck him." She estimated that his remarks were made about five or ten minutes after the accident.

Joyce Olsen went on the stand immediately after her mother, and testified that the bus driver said after telephoning, "I don't know where the old man came from."

Francis Gilbert, Richmond High School teacher, testified that he was visiting near the intersection and that he went out after hearing the crash and heard the driver say to one of the men present, in substance, "I don't know where the car came from." He estimated the time as within two or three minutes after he heard the crash. The police officers had not yet arrived. The witness was not acquainted with anyone connected with the accident. Twice during the brief examination of this witness the court reiterated the admonition that testimony as to statements of Perkins after the accident were not binding on Pacific Greyhound.

Perkins denied unequivocally that he had made statements such as those attributed to him by the Olsens and Gilbert. He testified that he stopped a southbound car and requested the driver to turn back and notify the police at the station between two and three blocks north on San Pablo. After the police arrived he asked of those then present if anyone had a telephone. Olsen offered his telephone. Perkins denied that the suggestion to use his telephone had come from Olsen. He said that he had no conversation with Mrs. Olsen but to apologize for tracking water into her house.

The defendants urge, and the majority opinion holds, that the court's rulings, excluding this testimony as against Greyhound, were correct, and that, even if erroneous, the error was not prejudicial because the jury returned a verdict in favor of Perkins against whom the evidence was admitted. This presents the two crucial points on this appeal: (1) was this evidence admissible against the Greyhound, and (2) if it was, were the rulings of the trial court to the contrary prejudicial? I am of the opinion that, under the most recent cases in this state, and according to the weight of authority elsewhere, these declarations of Perkins were clearly admissible against Greyhound, that the rulings of the trial court to the contrary were erroneous, and that such error was prejudicial to the plaintiffs.

The declarations of Perkins being in the nature of admissions were, of course, admittedly admissible as against him. Admissions of a party to an action are not within the hearsay rule and may be offered against such party. Lampton v. Davis Standard Bread Co., 48 Cal.App. 116, 191 P. 710; Shaver v. United Parcel Service, 90 Cal.App. 764, 266 P. 606; IV Wigmore on Evidence (3d ed.) p. 3, § 1048; 10 Cal. Jur. § 307, p. 1057. It is also the law that the admission of an agent of a party acting within the scope of his authority is in legal effect the admission of the principal and may be introduced against such principal. IV Wigmore, supra, p. 119, § 1078; 10 Cal. Jur. p. 1083, § 322. But where the admission is outside the scope of the agent's authority—and admissions of an agent made after an accident are generally held to be outside the employment—evidence thereof may not be introduced against the principal. Froeming v. Stockton Electric R. Co., 171 Cal. 401, 407, 153 P. 712, Ann. Cas.1918B, 408; Willard v. Valley Gas &

Fuel Co., 171 Cal. 9, 16, 151 P. 286; Luman v. Golden Ancient Channel M. Co., 140 Cal. 700, 709, 74 P. 307. However, there are situations where the statements of the agent, although they may not be introduced as admissions of the principal made through his agent, are nevertheless admissible on a different theory. Where the remarks of the agent constitute part of what has probably been erroneously referred to as the res gestae, they may be introduced either for or against the principal. The basis of admissibility is not that the statements were made by an agent. Remarks of a bystander are equally admissible under proper circumstances.

Until recently most decisions in this state, including the two relied upon so heavily in the majority opinion, adhered to a very strict rule in determining what statements constituted part of the res gestae. It was necessary that the remarks be "contemporaneous" with the event. If made thereafter in the form of narrative explanation they were held not to be part of the res gestae and not admissible. But in Showalter v. Western Pacific R. Co., 16 Cal.2d 460, 106 P.2d 895, the Supreme Court brought this state into line with the great weight of American authority, and expressly overruled those cases which hold that admissibility is dependent on proximity in time of the declaration to the principal event or on continuation of the occurrence to which it relates. 16 Cal.2d at page 467, 106 P.2d at page 899. It was there held that if a statement is made under such circumstances of physical shock or nervous excitement as to preclude the likelihood of reflection and fabrication, it is admissible. The test is whether the declarant is still under the influence of the happening and his statement a spontaneous expression growing out of it and not the result of reason and reflection. 16 Cal.2d at page 470, 106 P.2d at page 901; see, also, VI Wigmore, supra, pp. 133-155, §§ 1746-1750; Am.Law Inst., Model Code of Evidence, Rule 512b. Wigmore finds that "there is in the judicial opinion of today something of an approach to uniformity" in the acceptance of this test. VI Wigmore, supra, p. 135, § 1747.

In the Showalter case the administratrix of a deceased brakeman brought an action for his wrongful death against his employer, Western Pacific R. R. Co., under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51 et seq. The decedent's legs were severed when a car ran over him. A fellow brakeman was permitted to testify for plaintiff that he heard decedent "holler," that he ran to him and asked, "How in the world did it happen, Joe?" [16 Cal.2d 460, 106 P.2d 897] The dying man replied, "I got knocked off. * * * I am all done, both legs cut off." The court refused to hold that there was error in admitting the declarations.

It will be noted that in the Showalter case the trial court admitted into evidence under the spontaneous declaration exception what otherwise would have been inadmissible as a self-serving declaration. This holding was affirmed by the Supreme Court. That court held that the trial court has some discretion in determining whether the evidence falls within or without the spontaneous declaration exception, and that such discretion had not there been abused. That some such discretion exists seems to be the general rule. See VI Wigmore, supra, at p. 154 in § 1750. In the instant case the trial court ruled the evidence inadmissible against the employer. The majority opinion holds that such ruling was within the discretion of the trial court, and that even if the trial court could have admitted the evidence against the employer it was not an abuse of discretion to have refused to do so.

It is obvious that such discretion exists only where reasonable minds can reasonably differ as to whether the challenged remarks were evoked by the event or were the result of premeditation. There are situations where the remarks in question are so close to the event and so patently evoked by it without premeditation that it must be said, as a matter of law, that they are admissible. On the other hand, there are situations where the remarks are so far removed from the event and so obviously the result of premeditation that, as a matter of law, the evidence is not admissible. In between these extremes is the field in which the trial court has some discretion. In determining into which class the proffered evidence falls, the nature of the event, the nature of the declaration, the time elapsing between the event and the declaration, and perhaps other factors must be considered.

In the present case it seems too clear to require extended comment that the declarations were spontaneous declarations and, as a matter of law, should have been admitted against the employer. The accident was a severe one. After the accident Perkins appeared stunned and shocked. The time interval was from two to twenty minutes. Moreover, and of great if not of conclusive importance, the remarks to which the witnesses testified were against the interest of the declarant, rather than self-serving, as in the Showalter case. The usual controversy concerning this type of evidence involves remarks favorable to the interests of the declarant. Where a remark is offered that is obviously self-serving, a trial court must scrutinize it with care to be sure that the remark was in fact spontaneous and not the result of premeditation. But when the remark offered is against the interests of the declarant the possibility or probability of fabrication is virtually eliminated. The very fact that the remark is against the interest of the declarant demonstrates the probability that it was spontaneous. That circumstance alone gives it verity. Here the circumstances testified to by the witnesses were such as to exclude any other reasonable hypothesis than that the remarks were spontaneous and not premeditated. Premeditation would obviously have sealed the lips of Perkins.

The majority opinion suggests that the rule of the Showalter case is distinguishable in that there the testimony of the declarant was unavailable, since he was dead. Here the declarant testified at the trial. It is suggested that the exception to the hearsay rule here involved is applicable only where the witness is unavailable. It is quite clear that it is not a qualification of the spontaneous declaration exception that the death, absence or other unavailability of the witness must be shown. VI Wigmore, supra, p. 138, § 1748. The spontaneity of the utterance attaches to it a guarantee of trustworthiness. "The extrajudicial assertion being better than is likely to be obtained from the same person upon the stand, a necessity or expediency arises for resorting to it." VI Wigmore, supra, p. 138, § 1748.

Consistent with its rulings made during the trial, the court instructed the jury that: "Any evidence here about any statements, if any, made by the driver, Mr. Perkins, to anyone after the accident was not admitted against, and is in no way related to or binding on the Pacific Greyhound Lines."

Defendants vigorously urge, and the majority opinion seems to agree, that even if the trial court committed error in ruling that the declarations were admissible only as against Perkins and were not admissible against the employer, and in so instructing the jury, such errors were not and could not be prejudicial for the reason that such declarations were admitted against Perkins and the jury found in his favor. Had the jury been properly instructed, this argument would be unanswerable. Obviously, if the jury did find that even with this evidence admitted against him Perkins was not guilty of negligence, any error in excluding such evidence against the employer would be non-prejudicial. However, after reading the instructions, there is no way of knowing whether the verdict for Perkins was based upon the theory that Perkins was free from negligence or Lane was guilty of contributory negligence, or whether such verdict was based on the theory that Perkins could only be held if the Pacific Greyhound Lines was held. This anomalous situation is caused by the fact that several of the instructions are obviously conflicting. Because of the admissions made by Greyhound in its answer, the only issue involved was the liability of Perkins. From beginning to end the case was tried on the theory that Greyhound's liability turned on the liability of Perkins—if he was liable his employer was liable; if he was not liable his employer was not liable. Pursuant to this theory, early in its charge, the court instructed the jury that "any negligence on the part of defendant, Perkins, in the operation of a Greyhound stage, or bus, belonging to said corporation, * * * is also the negligence of said corporation, Pacific Greyhound Lines." Then, just before concluding its charge, and in line with its reiterated rulings at the trial, the court gave the instruction quoted above that: "Any evidence here about any statements, if any, made by the driver, Mr. Perkins, to anyone after the accident, was not admitted against, and is in no way related to or binding on the Pacific Greyhound Lines."

There cannot be any doubt as to the meaning of this last instruction. Its plain purport was to tell the jury that they could in no way consider these statements in determining the liability of Pacific Greyhound Lines; that if they deemed such statements necessary to find the driver negligent, and but for them would not find him negligent, they must exonerate the Pacific Greyhound Lines. As already pointed out, this instruction was erroneous. Then almost immediately following this instruction the court concluded its charge as follows:

"There have been prepared for your convenience and use, two forms of verdict which under the law it is possible for you to return in the case now on trial. These forms will be handed to you by the clerk when you retire. They have no significance in and of themselves and are not to be considered by you for any purpose other than as a convenience for your use, having been prepared only for the purpose of saving you labor when you have finally reached a verdict. When you have reached your verdict, your foreman will sign the verdict that you have found and it will then be your duty to return the same to the Court.

"If under the facts of the case and the instructions given you you desire to render a verdict for the plaintiffs you will use the form of verdict the body of which reads, 'We, the jury in this case, find for the plaintiffs, and assess their damages against the defendants in the sum of blank dollars.' You will fill in that blank the amount of damages that you award, have that verdict signed by your foreman and disregard the other form of verdict.

"On the other hand if under the facts and the instructions you desire to render a verdict for the defendants you will use the form of verdict the body of which reads, 'We, the jury in this case, find for the defendants'; disregard the other form of verdict; have this form signed by your foreman and come into Court."

There is no ambiguity about this last instruction. The jury was told in plain and unmistakable language that there were but two possible forms of verdict, one, a verdict in favor of plaintiffs and against both defendants, and the second, a verdict exonerating both defendants. The jury was told that it must bring in a verdict holding both defendants or exonerating both. But it had previously been instructed, erroneously, that evidence as to any statement made by Perkins was "not admitted against and is in no way related to or binding" on the Greyhound company. Thus, under this last mentioned instruction, the jury was told that if in order to hold Perkins the statements made by him had to be considered, the employer was not liable. Then, in the next breath, the jury was told, in effect, that either both defendants were liable or neither was liable. There is no way this court can know what went on in the jury room. The jury may have believed that Perkins was not negligent or that Lane was guilty of contributory negligence. If the jury so believed, the error in the instructions relating to the admissions was not prejudicial. But the jury may have believed that Perkins was negligent, basing this conclusion upon his admissions. Having been instructed that both defendants or neither must be held they would then have been faced with the situation where they believed Perkins was negligent, but they had been told that the evidence upon which that determination was based could not be considered and was in no way related to the liability of the Greyhound. Thus, under such a hypothesis, which is equally reasonable with the first suggested hypothesis, the jury's verdict might reasonably be based on the theory that the jury found that since, under the erroneous instruction, the employer could not be held, and since they had been told that both or neither must be held, that both must be exonerated. Thus, the jury's verdict for Perkins is not necessarily a determination that he was free from negligence or that decedent was guilty of contributory negligence. Equally reasonably it can be inferred that the verdict reflects the understanding of the jury, induced by the court's instructions, that it must hold both defendants or neither, and that although based on his admissions the jury thought Perkins was negligent, they must exonerate him because they could not hold the employer. Under such circumstances the erroneous rulings and instruction were obviously prejudicial. The legal problem presented is substantially identical to that presented in Bradley v. Rosenthal, 154 Cal. 420, 97 P. 875, 129 Am.St.Rep. 171, where the court, in a case where it was impossible to tell whether a verdict for the agent represented the jury's view that he was free from negligence, or that he should be exonerated by reason of an erroneous instruction, held the error prejudicial.

Defendants also urge that the error, if any, was not prejudicial by reason of the decision in Gorzeman v. Artz, 13 Cal.App. 2d 660, 57 P.2d 550. That case held that even where declarations are made by an agent under such circumstances that they are not admissible as to the principal, nevertheless, where both principal and agent are sued in the same action, and no issue as to scope of employment is presented, the principal is liable if the agent is held on any evidence competent as to him. Why defendants cite this case is not apparent. If it correctly states the law it demonstrates to a certainty the error in the instruction relating to the admissions of Perkins, heretofore quoted. Moreover, the jury was told, preliminarily, that any negligence of the employee was negligence of his employer, but subsequently were told that the admission evidence was in no way related to Pacific Greyhound Lines. Thus, it was told, in effect, that if it deemed such evidence essential to establish negligence of the driver, it should not hold Greyhound Lines, and, further, that it should hold both defendants, or neither. It has already been pointed out that the statements of Perkins, if made, were admissible against his employer as spontaneous declarations, and that the court's rulings during the trial and instruction to the contrary were erroneous. Whether such rulings and instruction were prejudicial depends on whether the verdict in favor of the driver necessarily exonerates him of negligence. For reasons already stated, it is apparent that it does not, that it may represent the jury's view that it should hold both defendants, or neither, and since it could not hold the employer without resort to the admission evidence, it should hold neither defendant.

On the evidence it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that defendant driver was free from negligence, or that decedent was guilty of contributory negligence. Since the decedent was not alive to testify, the plaintiffs are aided by a presumption that he exercised due care for his safety, and this presumption is a species of evidence on which the jury may base a verdict of freedom from contributory negligence. Westberg v. Willde, 14 Cal.2d 360, 364, 94 P.2d 590. Under such circumstances, in my opinion, the judgment and order denying a new trial should be reversed.

It should be pointed out that plaintiffs are not precluded from urging error in the instruction that any evidence as to admissions of Perkins was in no way related to the liability of defendant Pacific Greyhound Lines because they did not submit a correct instruction. If a general instruction is given, which is correct as far as it goes, a party may not complain that a more specific or elaborate instruction was not given in the absence of a request therefor. But if an instruction is affirmatively erroneous a party is not precluded from asserting error because he did not request a proper instruction. Colgrove v. Lompoc, etc., Club, 51 Cal.App.2d 18, 124 P.2d 128; 24 Cal.Jur. p. 796, § 74, citing cases. Nor should it be held that plaintiffs acquiesced in the ruling of the court. Attorney Hoey did signify his agreement with the court's position when the matter first arose, but, as the record shows, on the following morning Attorney Dam, co-counsel with Hoey, withdrew this consent by urging that the ruling be reconsidered.

It was also clearly error to instruct the jury that there was a presumption that the bus driver exercised due care. Since the driver was alive, and testified fully as to the facts of the accident, his negligence, under the decisions, must be determined on the evidence without regard to any presumption. Speck v. Sarver, 20 Cal.2d 585, 587, 128 P.2d 16; Paulsen v. McDuffie, 4 Cal.2d 111, 119, 47 P.2d 709. Whether this error alone would compel a reversal need not be determined inasmuch as the errors above mentioned, in my opinion, compel such reversal.

For the foregoing reasons it is my opinion that the judgment should be reversed.

The failure of proponent of will to comply with Code requirements as to contents of petition for probate of will and as to mailing of notice of time and place of hearing on petition would justify refusal of court to proceed until such requirements are complied with. Probate Code, §§ 326, 328.

6. Wills ⚭319

The failure to give notice by mail to testator's heirs and legatees of time and place of hearing on petition for probate of will does not render void, and therefore subject to collateral attack, order admitting will to probate. Probate Code, § 328.

7. Wills ⚭270

The fact that communication with two Russian heirs, who were in enemy occupied territory, was prohibited under Trading With the Enemy Act, did not prevent court from obtaining jurisdiction to admit will to probate where a notice by publication was in due form. SHINN, Justice.

This is a proceeding in mandate brought by the executor of the estate of Jacob Kahan, deceased, against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and a judge thereof sitting in probate, seeking a writ directing the court to proceed with the administration of said estate. The will of decedent was admitted to probate the 27th day of November, 1942, and the usual proceedings were had thereafter until the court was asked to confirm a sale of real estate. The court refused to proceed with the hearing or to take further steps in the administration, for the reason that the judge of the probate department where the proceeding is pending was and is of the opinion that the court acted without jurisdiction of the parties in ordering the will admitted to probate, and that the order and all subsequent proceedings are void. The contention is that the proceedings are void because at the time the petition was filed two of the heirs, who are also beneficiaries under the will, resided in Ukraina, Russia, in territory then occupied by the German army; that it was unlawful under the Trading With the Enemy Act, 50 U. S.C.A.Appendix, §§ 2, 3, and also physically impossible to communicate with these heirs by wire or by mail, and that they were not notified of the proceedings as required by law. Sections 327 and 328, Probate Code, read as follows:

"§ 327. When the petition is filed, the clerk of the court shall set the same for hearing by the court upon some day not less than ten nor more than thirty days thereafter, and shall give notice of the time and place of hearing by publishing the same in a newspaper published in the county; if there is none, then by three written or printed notices, posted at three of the most public places in the county. If the notice is published in a weekly newspaper, it must appear therein on at least three different days of publication; and if in a newspaper published oftener than once a week, it shall be so published that there shall be at least ten days from the first to the last day of publication, both first and last days being included. If the notice is by posting, it must be given at least ten days before the hearing."

"§ 328. At least ten days before the hearing, copies of the notice must be personally served upon the heirs of the testator and the devisees and legatees named in the will and all persons named as executors who are not petitioning, or mailed, postage prepaid, from a postoffice within this state, addressed to them at their respective places of residence, if known to the petitioner, if not, at the county seat of the county where the proceedings are pending."

Notice of the hearing on probate of the will was duly published. On November 9, 1942, copies of the printed notices were mailed to the heirs, devisees and legatees, at addresses stated in the petition, except that those of the Russian heirs were sent to them by registered mail in care of the Alien Property Custodian, Washington, D. C. On November 27, 1942, at the time of the hearing, proof was made by affidavit of publication and mailing, and there was filed on that day a letter from the Alien Property Custodian reading as follows: "Bodkin, Breslin & Luddy, 1225 Citizens National Bank Bldg., Los Angeles, Calif. Dear Sirs: Re: Estate of Jacob Kahan, dec'd. The Alien Property Custodian acknowledges receipt, by registered mail, of two published copies of Notice of Hearing of Petition for Probate of Will and Codicil of Jacob Kahan, deceased, the hearing being set for November 27, 1942. By General Order No. 5 the Custodian requires a report of any interest of a designated national in this estate. The report is to be made on Form APC-3, herewith enclosed, and the term 'designated national' is defined in General Order No. 5, set forth in full in the report form. As provided in General Order No. 6, the Custodian will, within sixty days, determine whether or not he will accept service of the notice. Very truly, (signed) Francis J. McNamara, Assistant to the Alien Property Custodian." By said General Order No. 5, section 503.5 (7 Fed. Reg. 6199), the term "Designated National" is defined as meaning "Any person in any place under the control of a designated enemy country or in any place with which, by reason of the existence of a state of war, the United States does not maintain postal communication" and it is made the duty of executors and certain others to report to the Alien Property Custodian the interest of such designated nationals. General Order No. 6 of the Alien Property Custodian [7 Federal Register 6199], issued under authority hereinafter referred to, reads, in part, as follows: "Sec. 503.6 * * *

(a) In any court or administrative action or proceeding within the United States in which service of process or notice is to be made upon any person in any designated enemy country or enemy-occupied territory, the receipt by the Alien Property Custodian of a copy of such process or notice sent by registered mail to the Alien Property Custodian at Washington, D. C., shall be service of such process or notice upon any such person, if, and not otherwise, the Alien Property Custodian within sixty days from the receipt thereof shall file with the court or administrative body issuing such process or notice, a written acceptance thereof. (b) Such process or notice shall otherwise conform to the rules, orders or practice of the court or administrative body issuing such process or notice."

On the 6th day of October, 1943, the Alien Property Custodian filed his written appearance in the proceeding. It has been stipulated that this appearance may be deemed to have been filed at any date after the making and entry of the order admitting the will to probate. Under this stipulation the appearance should be considered as having been made within the time specified in the order, but it should be given no further effect since we regard the mailing of notice to the Alien Property Custodian, his acknowledgment of the receipt of the notice, and his later appearance in the action as of no moment in our decision of the question of jurisdiction to admit the will to probate.

[1] Respondent court gives as its first reason for refusing to act that the mailing of notice is a jurisdictional step in the proceeding to prove a will, and that no notice of the hearing was given to the Russian heirs by mail because the Alien Property Custodian did not, prior to the hearing, accept service of the notice which he had received by mail. And respondent goes further and says that in no event can the court acquire jurisdiction to probate a will if an heir, devisee or legatee is so situated at the time notice is published, or posted and mailed that it is impossible for him to receive actual notice or knowledge of the pendency of the proceeding. We do not agree with either of these contentions. A consideration of the nature of proceedings to administer upon the estates of decedents, the provisions of the Probate Code relating to the probate of wills, and the cases bearing upon the matter of notice has persuaded us that jurisdiction of the court to admit a will to probate does not depend upon the mailing of notice, but upon publication or posting of notice, as required by the code. We shall discuss later the nature of proceedings to administer upon the estates of decedents and, while what is to be said bears upon the present point, we shall examine first the code provisions.

Section 301 of the Probate Code specifies the county or counties in which wills must be proved and administration of estates had, depending upon the place of residence and the leaving of estate in the county in which administration is sought.

Section 326 reads as follows: "A petition for the probate of the will must state: (1) The jurisdictional facts; (2) Whether the person named as executor consents to act or renounces his right to letters testamentary; (3) The names, ages and residences of the heirs, devisees and legatees of the decedent, so far as known to the petitioner; (4) The character and estimated value of the property of the estate; (5) The name of the person for whom letters testamentary are prayed. No defect of form or in the statement of jurisdictional facts actually existing shall make void the probate of a will."

[2] Concededly, Los Angeles County is the proper county in which to administer the instant estate. Publication of notice as required by section 327, supra, gave the court jurisdiction over the parties, to the extent necessary in a probate proceeding, unless mailing of notice, as required by section 328, was a jurisdictional step. We believe that it was not and that the decisions support our conclusion. Nicholson v. Leatham, 1915, 28 Cal.App. 597, 153 P. 965, 155 P. 98, was an action in equity to set aside an order admitting a will to probate upon the ground that the order was void for failure to take steps essential to the giving of notice to those entitled thereto under sections of the Code of Civil Procedure which are now found in the Probate Code. The court said (pages 600, 601 of 28 Cal.App., page 967 of 153 P.): "As to the first proposition, the contention of appellants is that the courts of this state do not acquire jurisdiction to make an order admitting a will to probate upon a petition in due form filed and hearing had thereon upon proof of publication of notice as required by section 1303, Code of Civil Procedure, from which petition is omitted the names and residences of the heirs of the testator, if such names and residences be known to the petitioner, and that, in the absence of a copy of the published notice being addressed to such known resident heirs, as provided in section 1303, supra, an order made upon such petition admitting a will to probate may be set aside and vacated in a court of equity, regardless of lapse of time. In our opinion, the provisions of section 1300, Code of Civil Procedure [now section 326, Probate Code], as to what the petition for the probate of a will shall contain, other than subdivision 1 thereof requiring a statement of the jurisdictional facts, are, in so far as noncompliance therewith affects the jurisdiction of the court, directory." The reasons which the court gave for the quoted statement are omitted here in the interest of brevity. This holding was approved in Murray v. Superior Court, 1929, 207 Cal. 381, 278 P. 1033, in which it was said that the failure of the petitioner to state the names and addresses of legatees which were known to him would not deprive the court of jurisdiction to pass upon a petition for the probate of a will and objections thereto. And it was said that the power to proceed with the probate of a will attaches upon the production of the will and the filing of the petition pursuant to section 1300 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the publication of the notice provided for in section 1303 of that code. In Stiebel v. Roberts, 1941, 42 Cal.App. 2d 434, 109 P.2d 22, where there had been a failure to mail notice to a co-executrix of a petition for a probate homestead, as required by section 1200 of the Probate Code, it was said that the failure to give notice by mail or to personally serve the co-executrix did not affect the jurisdiction of the probate court and that jurisdiction was acquired by the filing of the petition and the posting of notice as required by law. In Security-First Nat. Bank v. Superior Court, 1934, 1 Cal.2d 749, 37 P.2d 69, it was held that the posting of notice of hearing of a petition to settle a trustee's account and the mailing of notice to one stated in the petition to be the beneficiary of the trust was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to settle the account, even though the petition failed to state the true names and addresses of the beneficiaries of the trust, as required by section 1120 of the Probate Code, and this notwithstanding the requirement of said section that notice of the hearing must be mailed to all beneficiaries, for the period and in the manner directed by section 1200 of the Code, at their addresses, if known, and if not known, at the county seat of the county where the proceedings are pending, or be personally served upon such persons. It is true that the court held that the judgment roll did not disclose that there had been a failure to give notice as required by law and that the order was therefore not subject to collateral attack, but the decision was to the further effect that the failure of the beneficiary to receive notice because of the trustee's failure to state his name and address in the petition, as required by section 1120, did not deprive the court of jurisdiction to settle the account.

[3-6] In view of the broad claims of respondent, to be hereinafter discussed, it seems appropriate that we state somewhat fully our reasons for holding that the applicable code sections call for the mailing of notice only as a matter of convenience and good administration, and not as a step upon which the jurisdiction of the court to initiate administration proceedings depends. In the procedure of giving notice by mail, the first step is compliance with subdivision 3 of section 326. The petition is the logical source of information to one charged with the duty of mailing notice, and to the court, as to the names and addresses of those who are entitled to notice of the proceedings. It is not required that they be stated unless they are known to the petitioner. The petition may be and often is filed by a stranger. If he does not know the names and addresses of those entitled to notice, he is not required to make any effort to ascertain them. Upon the hearing of the petition the court may rely upon the statements of the petition, giving the names and addresses of those entitled to notice, or upon petitioner's statement that they are unknown. No special duty is imposed upon the court to require proof as to such names and addresses, and it is discretionary with the court to direct such an inquiry or to proceed without it. The entire procedure for mailing may be nullified through the failure of the petitioner to ascertain the names and addresses of the interested persons or his omission to disclose those that are known to him. It is true that the requirement of section 328 for mailing of notice is expressed in mandatory terms, but so is the requirement of section 301 for the statement in the petition of the names and addresses of the interested parties, which has been held to be merely directory. It is consistent with the entire scheme of notice to regard the provisions of section 328 also as directory. The Legislature has recognized the obvious distinctions between proceedings for the administration of estates and adversary proceedings in which jurisdiction may be acquired by substituted service of summons. And it is because of that distinction, no doubt, that in probate matters there is no requirement that inquiry be made by a petitioner for the discovery of names and addresses that are unknown to him as there is where the court is asked to authorize publication of summons. If it had been intended to limit the power of the court to proceed upon constructive service in probate matters to cases in which no more certain methods of giving notice were available, we would expect to find in the Probate Code exacting requirements for the ascertainment of the names and addresses of persons interested in the estate and for personal service of notice upon them if they were in the county or in the state. And if the intention had been to require the giving of notice by mail before the court could proceed, jurisdiction would not have been allowed to rest upon the ignorance of the petitioner, his unwillingness to inform himself, or his willful omission, and there would have been no unnecessary discrimination between those whose names and addresses were stated in the petition and those whose names or addresses, or both, were, for some reason, not stated. Since there is no requirement for inquiry to learn names and addresses which are unknown to the petitioner, and since it has been held that the omission from the petition of names and addresses that are known to the petitioner does not deprive the court of jurisdiction, it necessarily follows that the whole procedure for the mailing of notice was intended to be directory only. This holding does not imply that the failure to comply with the requirements of sections 326 and 328 would not justify the refusal of the court to proceed until the sections had been complied with, nor that such failure might not be prejudicial to the rights of those who were entitled to, but were not given, notice by mail. The failure to give notice by mail does not render void the order admitting the will to probate and therefore subject to collateral attack.

[7] In this view of the requirement for mailing, jurisdiction to admit the will to probate depended upon the sufficiency of notice by publication, which was in due form. Respondent disputes the effectiveness of this notice upon the ground that postal communication between the United States and German occupied territory in Russia was and is prohibited by the Trading with the Enemy Act, supra. We may assume that under the circumstances the Russian heirs would not receive actual notice of the proceedings until the conditions due to the state of war had been removed and somewhat normal living conditions had been restored. But under these assumed facts we believe there was valid service of notice and that the court had jurisdiction in the premises.

The contention of respondent, as we view it, presents two questions. The first is whether it is within the power of the state to enact laws which permit the admission of wills to probate and administration of the estates of decedents upon constructive service of notice to the heirs, devisees and legatees under such circumstances that they cannot receive actual notice of the proceedings. If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, the second question is whether the statutory procedure for constructive service is nullified or was intended not to be applicable in such cases because it cannot result in actual notice.

[8] There is a diversity of authority as to whether the court can acquire jurisdiction by constructive service in adversary proceedings of persons residing in enemy territory. The conflicting holdings are stated in an annotation in 137 A.L.R. 1365 et seq., where the cases are collected, but we deem it unnecessary to review them or the reasoning which the several courts have employed in reaching their conclusions. We are concerned only with the jurisdiction of the court in probate matters. No case has been cited, and we have found none, holding that in the matter of the probate of a will, or initiation of other proceedings for administration upon the estate of a decedent, constructive service of notice of the proceeding is ineffectual as notice to interested parties residing in the territory of a nation at war with the United States or in territory occupied by the armed forces of such enemy. No case has come to our attention in which a claimant to an interest in an estate has been permitted to challenge, by collateral attack, an order or decree rendered after constructive service of notice of the proceeding, upon the ground that it would have been impossible for him to receive personal notice because he had been, during the effective period of the notice, in some inaccessible part of the world beyond the reach of ordinary means of communication.

[9,10] In considering the probate jurisdiction, it is important to have in mind that an heir has no vested interest in the estate of his ancestor prior to the latter's death. He takes by virtue of the statutes and not by reason of natural law. While there is some difference of opinion on this point, there is none in this state. In California and almost all of the other states it is recognized that the right to take by succession is subject to such conditions and limitations as the legislature may see fit to prescribe. It has been held in many cases in this state, and in none which we have found has it been questioned, that the broadest burdens, limitations and conditions may be attached to the right of inheritance. Whenever the question has arisen it has been held that the authority of the legislature in such matters is not subject to constitutional limitations. In re Wilmerding's Estate, 1897, 117 Cal. 281, 49 P. 181; Sharp v. Loupe, 1898, 120 Cal. 89, 52 P. 134, 586; Estate of Porter, 1900, 129 Cal. 86, 61 P. 659, 79 Am.St.Rep. 78; and Estate of Bump, 1907, 152 Cal. 274, 92 P. 643.

[11-13] One of the limitations upon the right of succession is the right of the ancestor to make disposition of his estate by will, which he may do, except in certain instances, to the exclusion of some or all of his relatives. Other conditions relate to the matter of proof of heirship and to proceedings for the proof of wills and the trial of contests involving their validity. When it is considered that one named by the statute as heir has no interest in the estate of his living ancestor which is entitled to protection on constitutional grounds, and that in the absence of statutes of succession he would take nothing, it may be questioned whether the courts can properly place any limitation upon the authority of the legislature to impose burdens or restrictions upon the estate itself or upon the rights of those who inherit it. We are not called upon to decide that question. The only questions involved are those relating to our Probate Code procedure for the proof of a will. It would sound anomalous to say that although the legislature has the absolute authority to authorize disposition of estates by will, there is some limitation upon its authority to enact procedure for admitting wills to probate or giving effect to them by decrees of distribution. It is nevertheless true that the probate laws of the several states do recognize the right of heirs to an opportunity to assert their interests before they are foreclosed by decree of court, and we do not intimate that this long established and universal policy might not bring in question the conclusiveness of decrees establishing the validity of wills, rendered without giving the heirs any notice of the proceedings or any opportunity to establish their relationships. If it should be conceded that arbitrary laws which allowed such ex parte procedure would for any reason be invalid, it would nevertheless be true, in view of the broad powers of the legislature, that laws which provided for some notice and opportunity to be heard could not be declared invalid unless they were wholly unreasonable and ineffectual. But if we concede for the purposes of our decision that the test of reasonableness may be applied to the actions of the Probate Code dealing with notice, which would be giving the most liberal consideration to the claims of respondent, we would be obliged to hold them valid. Their reasonableness is not to be judged from a comparison of the nature of the notice which they authorize with those requirements for notice which are of the essence of due process of law where vested rights are involved.

[14] In Estate of Davis, 1902, 136 Cal. 590, 69 P. 412, one who claimed to be an heir of the decedent filed a contest of a will after the expiration of the allotted period of one year (as the law then stood) following its admission to probate. She alleged that she had no notice or knowledge of the order admitting the will to probate until more than a year thereafter; that she was living in a foreign country and that the time between the first publication and mailing of notice and the time of the hearing was insufficient to give her notice, and she made the claim that the statute providing for constructive service was therefore unreasonable, that it denied her due process of law, and was void. In rejecting this contention, it was held that service of notice by publication or posting constituted due process, and the court stated (page 596 of 136 Cal., page 414 of 69 P.): "As before suggested, the proceeding as to the probate of a will is essentially one in rem, and in the very nature of things the state is allowed a wide latitude in determining the character of the constructive notice to be given to the world in a proceeding where it has absolute possession of the res. * * * Public policy demands that a will shall have a speedy probate, and the legislature, recognizing that fact, has given the heir, by express enactment, one year after that probate has been decreed, within which time he may attack the will. His rights are in no way concluded by the decree of probate. He has an entire year thereafter in which to attack the will, and he may attack it upon the same grounds and for the same reasons that he could attack it prior to its probate. Even the measure of evidence demanded of him for a successful attack is no different in the two cases. It is thus apparent that, in such a case as the one presented here, due process of law was in no degree denied [Laura Tracy, plaintiff] upon the hearing." This holding was followed on a later appeal in the same matter. Estate of Davis, 1907, 151 Cal. 318, 86 P. 183, 90 P. 711, 121 Am. St.Rep. 105. Constructive service of notice in matters of probate has frequently been held to meet the requirements of due process of law (Security-First Nat. Bank v. Superior Court, supra, 1 Cal.2d 749, 37 P.2d 69; Monk v. Morgan, 1920, 49 Cal. App. 154, 192 P. 1042; Estate of Aldrich, 1905, 147 Cal. 343, 81 P. 1011), although the precise question we are considering has not been decided. The effect of these decisions is that probate proceedings founded upon constructive notice are in accordance with the law of the land and with natural right and justice. We think there can be no doubt as to this. The provisions for constructive service are, in our opinion, far more reasonable than would be procedure which required actual notice to all interested parties in probate matters. Proceedings in probate are for the benefit of all who take, whether as heirs, devisees, or legatees. Administration is necessary before they can come into possession of their interests and their titles are confirmed by orders or decrees of court. They have the right to have administration proceedings conducted expeditiously and the provisions for the giving of notice are designed to avoid unnecessary delay. Constructive service will not always result in actual notice but claimants to an estate have no right to actual notice except when the law expressly gives them that right. There will be occasional cases in which the right to initiate or to defend adversary proceedings will be lost through the failure to receive notice, but these will be few as compared with the vast number of probate proceedings, which, as a rule, are conducted in a routine manner and without contest. The provisions of our probate laws probably strike as fair a balance as is possible between the necessities for prompt and efficient administration, which is desirable in all cases, and the disadvantages which must occasionally be suffered by those who are sought to be reached by constructive service but who fail to receive actual notice of the pendency of the probate administration or of the steps being taken therein. The provisions for constructive service are valid.

[15] We do not agree with respondent's further contention that the code provisions in question were intended to be effective only where there is reasonable probability that the persons sought to be notified will receive actual notice, or, in other words, that the provisions for notice were "nullified" in the instant case by the circumstance that the Russian heirs could not have received actual notice. In view of our holding that the mailing of notice was directory and not jurisdictional, respondent's argument, if valid, means that the published notice was no notice at all because the notoriety given thereby would not result in the communication of the facts to the Russian heirs in any manner. But it is clear that the legislature intended constructive service to be sufficient in any situation. There are innumerable circumstances in which constructive service of notice would not result in actual notice. The rights of minor heirs are usually involved in probate matters, and oftentimes the interests of incompetents. And no one, we think, would undertake to say how many people there are whose addresses are unknown to their relatives or who pull up stakes and leave for parts unknown. Undoubtedly it was known to those who framed the laws that wills would be probated in some or perhaps many cases without actual knowledge of the proceedings having been received by all persons legally entitled to notice, but the legislature has made no exceptions for such cases. We find nothing in the probate laws in the nature of an implied limitation upon the jurisdiction to admit wills to probate in cases where, because of unusual circumstances, published notice cannot result in actual notice to the heirs or other persons interested. No other procedure has been prescribed for cases of that sort. Constructive notice of a proceeding for the appointment of an administrator or the admission of a will to probate was intended to be and is binding upon all persons, equally upon those who do not receive actual notice as upon those who do. The facts of the present case present no exception under the code or the decisions. The Russian heirs were legally before the court when the will was admitted to probate, and the order then made was valid.

[16, 17] It will appear from what we have said that jurisdiction to admit the will to probate did not depend upon the giving of notice to the Alien Property Custodian or his filing an appearance in the proceeding. He is before the court in the pending proceeding and will be entitled hereafter to have mailed to him all statutory notices which would otherwise go directly to the Russian heirs and beneficiaries. We think there is no doubt as to his authority to represent their interests in the proceeding to sell property of the estate.

The Trading With the Enemy Act of October 6, 1917, 40 Stat. 411, as amended, was further amended by the First War Powers Act, December 18, 1941, 55 Stat. 839, § 301, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, §§ 5, 616, so as to give to the President during the time of war the authority, through any agency he might designate, or otherwise, and under such rules and regulations as he might prescribe, to regulate, direct, prevent or prohibit any use, transfer, dealing in or exercising any right, power, or privilege with respect to any property in which any foreign country or a national thereof has any interest or with respect to any property subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. He was given authority by the First War Powers Act, Title III, to vest any property or interest of a foreign country or a national thereof, upon terms directed by him in any agency or person he might designate, the same to be held, administered, liquidated, sold or otherwise dealt with, upon such terms and conditions as he might prescribe in the interest of, and for the benefit of, the United States. And it was further provided in the Act that "Such designated agency or person may perform any and all acts incident to the accomplishment or furtherance of these purposes." By virtue of the authority thus vested in him, the President on March 11, 1942, issued Executive Order No. 9095, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 6 note, Fed. Reg. 1971, establishing the office of Alien Property Custodian, headed by an officer bearing the same title. By the terms of that order all power and authority conferred upon the President by the Trading with the Enemy Act and First War Powers Act, so far as material here, were delegated to, and vested in, the Alien Property Custodian. The President, on July 6, 1942, by Executive Order No. 9193, Fed. Reg. 5205, amended Executive Order No. 9095. By section 4 of the amending order, the Alien Property

Custodian was authorized and empowered to prescribe from time to time regulations, rulings, and instructions, to carry out the purposes of said executive order. The said amending order reads, in part: "5. The Alien Property Custodian is authorized to issue appropriate regulations governing the service of process or notice upon any person within any designated enemy country or any enemy-occupied territory in connection with any court or administrative action or proceeding within the United States. The Alien Property Custodian also is authorized to take such other and further measures in connection with representing any such person in any such action or proceeding as in his judgment and discretion is or may be in the interest of the United States."

We have heretofore referred to General Order No. 6 of the Alien Property Custodian with respect to his appearance after receipt of notice by registered mail. A further provision of that order reads as follows: "This order shall not be construed to limit the authority of the Alien Property Custodian to take any measures in connection with representing any such person (which, as already noted, includes persons in enemy occupied territory) in any action or proceeding as in his judgment and discretion is or may be in the interest of the United States. (d) * * * (3) 'Enemy occupied territory' shall mean any place under the control of any designated enemy country or any place with which, by reason of the existence of a state of war, the United States does not maintain postal communication." The Alien Property Custodian in the exercise of authority vested in him by said acts of Congress and said executive orders could vest in himself the interests of the Russian heirs. With these broad powers, and the discretion delegated to him to act as his judgment dictates in the national interest, the Alien Property Custodian undoubtedly has the right to represent the Russian heirs in any and all proceedings relating to or affecting their interests as heirs of Jacob Kahan, deceased, or as devisees or legatees under his will. His acceptance of service and appearance in the action are sufficient evidence that he considers it to be in the interests of the United States that he represent them. His authority to act for them and to take control of their interests was clearly intended to be ample to meet all of the exigencies affecting the national interest that might result from a state of war.

By the terms of Executive Order No. 9193, the orders and regulations made and the action taken by him are made final and conclusive as to his power to exercise the power and authority conferred upon the President by the Trading With the Enemy Act, as amended. It does not rest with the courts to place restraints upon the exercise of his judgment and discretion under the broad powers which he possesses.

With respect to the pending petition for confirmation of sale of real property, it will follow, from the views hereinbefore expressed, that the court has jurisdiction to act upon the petition. The Russian heirs and beneficiaries are before the court in that proceeding by virtue of the notice of the hearing given in accordance with the provisions of section 1200 of the Probate Code. While it does not appear that notice of the hearing was mailed to the Alien Property Custodian, it does appear from the brief filed herein by his counsel, as amicus curiae, that he has knowledge of the pending proceeding. The proof upon the hearing will no doubt show that he has been properly notified.

Although our decision as to jurisdiction is not based at all upon the fact that the notices were mailed in care of the Alien Property Custodian, we are not intimating that the probate court should not require that notice be mailed to him or in his care in cases where there are persons interested in estate matters whom he could properly represent. Unquestionably, he should receive such notice in order that he may have an opportunity to appear in the proceedings if he so desires. This is true even though there is no law or executive order which requires the mailing of notice to him of the initiation of probate proceedings in which the interests of the United States may be affected, and although acceptance of service is optional with him. Executors are required to report the interests of "designated nationals" and we think the courts should decline to make any determination which might affect the interests of the United States until the Alien Property Custodian has been given notice by registered mail and has had an opportunity to decide in accordance with his procedural orders whether he will make an appearance in the proceedings. However, it is compliance with the Code requirements as to notice, and not service upon the Alien Property Custodian, that gives the court jurisdiction to administer the estates of decedents. He is not the actual representative of persons whom he is authorized to represent, in any matters except those in which he issues written acceptance of service. He has appeared in this proceeding and, as we have already stated, is entitled to notice of all subsequent proceedings in which notice is required by the Probate Code.

The writ is granted.

LANE-WELLS CO. v. SCHLUMBERGER
WELL SURVEYING CORPORATION.

Civ. 14508.

1. Contracts ⇨143

The construction of an unambiguous contract must be derived solely from the language therein and effect must be given to all parts of the writing.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1008(3)

In construing an unambiguous contract, the reviewing court is not bound by the decision of the trial court made either without the aid of evidence or where there is no conflict in the evidence.

3. Patents ⇨212(1)

Where owner of patent for a system of electrical logging of oil wells, operating in several states, granted to a licensee operating in California alone the right to use patented method under a contract authorizing licensor to fix minimum net prices to be charged by licensee and providing for a volume discount, and it was apparent that purpose of contract was to avoid placing either party at a price disadvantage in a competitive field, licensor, after fixing minimum net prices, could not grant to a customer operating in several states volume discounts based on operations in all states and thereby gain an advantage over licensee.

4. Contracts ⇨147(1), 154

Where equality of opportunity is the key word of the contract, the ascertainment of such purpose is paramount, and in achieving that end such construction of the contract is to be preferred as makes it reasonable, fair, and equitable to both parties.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

We have here for decision whether the findings of the court are supported by the evidence; i. e. whether the licensor complied with its agreement whereby it might fix the minimum net prices to be charged by the licensee in using certain patented methods for logging oil wells.

Respondent, as owner of patented "systems and methods" for electrical logging of oil wells, was at all times herein mentioned, and had been, engaged in doing electrical logging by use of its patented methods some years prior to the contract with appellant. By an unambiguous writing dated April 2, 1938, it granted to plaintiff a non-exclusive, non-assignable license to use such patented method, for which license plaintiff agreed to pay the royalties hereinafter mentioned. The contract reserved to licensor the privilege of fixing the prices to be charged for the service by either party so "that neither party would have a price advantage over the others. The licensee was forbidden to make any arrangement or rebate designed to diminish the benefits of the licensor; it was required to keep accurate and faithful records to show in detail the business done by use of the methods, the gross price charged, the rate of discount allowed and all rebates that would tend to reduce the gross price, which records would enable licensor to determine that the accountings had been accurate and complete. The fixed minimum net price was not to be more than that charged by licensor. On or before the 20th of each calendar month licensee must mail to licensor an itemized statement containing the information required to be kept in its records of the work done during the preceding calendar month. As consideration for the license, licensee agreed to pay a royalty of 15 per cent of the gross price fixed by licensor from time to time, less discounts permitted by licensor, the minimum net price, to be determined according to clause 8, as follows:

"8. The Licensor shall fix from time to time the minimum net price to be charged by the Licensee for the doing of the various classes of service, work and jobs in which any process or invention or improvement is used hereunder, in systems or methods for electrical logging, provided, however, that the minimum price so fixed shall not be more than the minimum price charged by the Licensor in the same oil field for the same type of service, work or job during the same period of time, and, after any such minimum price has been so fixed, the same shall continue in force until the Licensor shall give to the Licensee written notice of any change or changes therein, which notice must be given at least thirty days before the same is to become effective, whereafter such changed prices must be charged by the Licensee until and unless any further change is made by the Licensor. The Licensee and the Licensor agree not to reduce, directly or indirectly, by discount, rebate, gift, or concession, such minimum prices so long as the same shall remain in effect, except as shall be determined upon by the Licensor from time to time."

Shortly after the execution of the contract licensor issued and forwarded to licensee a price schedule showing the prices to be charged for electrical logging operations, and included in the same writing a graduated scale of discounts based upon the dollar value and the total volume of business performed for any one customer in any number of fields. The discounts authorized were as follows: On an account for $2500 or less, no discount; on the second $2500, five per cent; on the second $5000, ten per cent; above $10,000, twenty per cent. Such discounts were to be applied to the gross prices named in the schedules, thereby deriving the minimum net prices to be charged. This discount is hereafter referred to as "volume discount." It is the basis of appellant's action, and concerning it a declaration of the court was sought. The second letter of July 30, 1938, contained a price list and advised appellant (1) that "we did not publish this volume discount on our price list," and (2) that, while in the April letter it had grouped companies having a common control, "each company is now considered a separate unit for computing volume discount." The full significance of the volume discount appears not to have been comprehended by appellant prior to its actual commencement of logging operations, which was about April, 1939. By its letter of that month respondent wrote appellant that "all prices are net, meaning payment therefor to be made in thirty days without discount."

In immediately subsequent correspondence appellant remonstrated that under respondent's system of granting volume discounts the contract would be violated in respect to that provision which authorizes the licensor to fix from time to time the minimum net price to be charged by licensee, demanded the fixing of "minimum net prices which shall apply to all fields" and urged that the volume discount when conceded to a customer operating in several states worked an insuperable hardship upon licensee, whose activities were originally confined to California, and have continued in this state but it has not operated in all of the fields in which licensor has at all times transacted business. An additional hardship was that appellant was prevented from quoting a definite price to a customer, because if licensee should operate in many states such price could not be ascertained until all of the work performed for such customer in the United States could be ascertained and the volume discount computed. Licensee contended then, as it does now, that inasmuch as licensor transacted logging business in all of the oil fields in the United States for some operators while licensee did business in only some of the oil fields in which licensor had been and still is doing business, the practice of giving volume discounts based upon work done by a customer in several fields in the oil bearing states operated to the price advantage of licensor in that it did not actually "fix" minimum net prices for the same field and for the same type of work and during the same period of time.

The trial court found that under the contract the licensor has fixed "the minimum net prices" to be charged by licensee; that it has notified licensee of all prices to be charged in all oil fields; that licensor has not reduced prices in any way below those forwarded to licensee, and decided that licensor may properly under the contract include as a part of the minimum net prices a provision for the discounts specified in the letters of licensor to licensee, and that they may be based on "the total volume of business done in the United States." We have to determine whether such findings and decision are sustained by the contract and by the acts of the parties.

[1,2] The contract contains within its terms no ambiguity or uncertainty. Its construction therefore must be derived solely from the language within its borders and effect must be given to all parts of the writing. 6 Cal.Jur. 328, Sec. 193; Bank of America v. Schumacher, 6 Cal.App.2d 651, 653, 45 P.2d 239; Scudder v. Perce, 159 Cal. 429, 114 P. 571; Roesch v. De Mota, Cal.App., 143 P.2d 67. Under that principle the reviewing court is not bound by the decision of the trial court made either without the aid of evidence or where there is no conflict in the evidence. Estate of Platt, 21 Cal.2d 343, 352, 131 P.2d 825. Guided by these principles we now proceed to explore the language of the license agreement and to weigh the acts done thereunder.

[3] A cursory glance at the writing discloses (1) that the parties purposed to avoid placing either of them at a price disadvantage in a competitive field; (2) that licensor's royalty of 15 per cent was to be based upon the gross prices less any allowed discount granted by licensee; (3) that either might grant rebates to its customers so long as they do not reduce the minimum net price; (4) that licensee's books shall truly reflect the gross prices and the discount or rebate allowed. The controversy involves only paragraph 8, supra. It provides that licensor shall wield the whip hand, in that "from time to time" it shall fix the "minimum net price" to be charged by licensee, provided, however, that the "minimum price" so fixed shall not be more than the "minimum price" charged by the licensor in the same oil field for the same type of service; and after such minimum price has been so fixed the same shall continue in force until the licensor gives licensee written notice of change. The parties agree not to reduce by discount or rebate such minimum prices.

From the foregoing abridgement of paragraph 8 and the italicized phrases it appears to have been definitely intended by the parties that the licensor shall fix the minimum net price. It is equally clear that the phrase "minimum price so fixed" could mean nothing else than the "minimum net prices" fixed at first by the licensor. Otherwise the phrase "so fixed" would be meaningless, for there was nothing "so fixed" except the "minimum net price." From this the conclusion is irresistible that the authors of the contract had no intention other than to use the two phrases interchangeably. When they agreed therefore that the minimum price shall not be more than the minimum price charged by licensor in the same oil field for the same type of service, they meant minimum net prices and not gross prices. We find nothing in the phraseology to warrant the court's finding that "defendant has not failed to fix such minimum net price", or to justify the contention of respondent that "the minimum prices can be reduced by discount as determined by licensor from time to time," or that "the minimum prices are the prices before the application of the discount and minimum net prices are the prices after the application of the discount."

If the licensor might "fix the minimum net price to be charged by the licensee" as well as by itself, then no other discount or rebate could be deducted by either party from such net price without violating the contract. But this is exactly what the licensor did by granting volume discounts to patrons who engage in drilling oil wells in the several oil bearing states. Take for illustration the case of the Texas Company. Licensor's bill for logging charges for the month of March 1942 were $13,-083.57, the aggregate of all charges against it in six different states. After subtracting $2,500 on which no deduction is allowed there remained $10,583.57. By making the deductions of five per cent on the second $2,500, ten per cent on the next $5,000 and 20 per cent on the next $3,083.57, that customer of licensor received a total discount on its bill for $13,083.57 in the sum of $1,241.70. This meant a discount on respondent's California contracts of almost 10 per cent, a far greater rate of discount than is possible for appellant to give to its California contractees. In all its operations respondent rendered the same service as that which was rendered by appellant, charged the same prices and thereafter remitted to its customers the rebate based upon the aggregate of business done for any such customer in all the fields of the customer's activities.

Such practice violates that provision of the contract which forbids either to reduce the minimum net prices fixed by licensor. Since appellant is not engaged in logging in all states where oil is developed it cannot grant a discount based upon work in eastern fields and therefore must charge its California customer a greater price than that which respondent may, under the volume discount practice, accept in final settlement of its charges. This gives respondent a distinct price advantage in the very fields in which appellant is a business rival, although it pays a royalty to respondent on all work done. If, however, the discounts provided for in the contract be applied to each field separately, no advantage over appellant would obtain. Each would be able to quote the "minimum net price" with assurance that the other would not underbid him or pay a rebate upon the charges made based on the price schedule. But even though appellant were rendering the logging service in seven states, the practice of granting volume discounts based upon the aggregate of work done for one customer in all the oil fields would make it impossible to quote definite prices to its patrons. This is so because the rebate is made up after the reports are received from all of the different states. Under the contract licensee must on the 20th day of each calendar month forward to licensor a statement of all persons served, with the names and numbers and locations of each well, the work done and the rate of discount allowed which may have the effect of reducing the gross price. If the discounts be applied to the accounts for each field separately, both would then operate upon the same basis with respect to prices. Under such a license contract as that here involved it could not have been intended that a licensee of a patented process for the manufacture of rubber goods, operating only in California in competition with the licensor who sells the product in all 48 states, would be forced to base its discounts upon the sales made in this state while the licensor may grant rebates based upon the volume of sales made in all of North America.

[4] If equality of opportunity is the key word of the contract, the ascertainment of such purpose is paramount. In re City and County of San Francisco, 191 Cal. 172, 177, 215 P. 549; Bradley Co. v. Mulcrevy, 166 Cal. 325, 136 P. 60. In achieving that end such construction is to be preferred as makes a contract reasonable, fair and equitable to both parties. Whitney v. Aronson, 21 Cal.App. 9, 130 P. 700; 17 C.J.S., Contracts, p. 739, § 319; Southern Surety v. Bank of Lassen, 118 Cal.App. 149, 154, 4 P.2d 952. Since respondent has not fixed minimum net prices but has merely furnished appellant with a schedule of prices which must be followed by appellant but below which respondent may go by virtue of its application of the volume discount to the aggregate of the accounts of a patron in any number of fields, the findings that respondent "at all times has fixed such minimum net prices" and "that it is not true that defendant has failed or refused at any time to fix the minimum net prices to be charged by plaintiff and defendant * * *" are not supported by the evidence.

The judgment is reversed.

RANNARD et ux. v. LOCKHEED AIRCRAFT CORPORATION et al.*

Civ. 14227.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

Hearing Granted Aug. 30, 1944.

1. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(4)

Complaint, in malpractice action, alleging surgeon's negligence in diagnosis and operation for double hernia, was insufficient as against demurrer.

2. Pleading ⇨8(1)

A complaint must state facts which constitute plaintiff's cause of action, and mere conclusions which do not give even a clue as to facts which defendant will be called upon to meet are not sufficient.

3. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(4)

A complaint against a surgeon, alleging that he operated on plaintiff carelessly and unskillfully and that as proximate result of the negligence plaintiff has been disabled and has lost ability to work, does not state a cause of action, but there must be a factual statement as to what the defendant did or failed to do and as to connection between the alleged negligence and the alleged result thereof in the pleading as well as in the proof.

4. Pleading ⇨8(17)

Negligence may be charged in general terms in pleading, in that, what was done having been stated, it is sufficient to say that it was negligently done without stating particular omission rendering the act negligent, but it must appear from facts averred that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury.

5. Pleading ⇨8(17)

Though it is permissible to charge negligence in general terms, it is nevertheless necessary to specify the particular act alleged to have been negligently done.

6. Appeal and error ⇨916(1)

Where complaint in malpractice action against surgeon in diagnosis and performing operation for hernia was insufficient in alleging conclusions without stating particulars of alleged negligence and the particulars of the insufficiency were pointed out to plaintiff's attorney during the argument on demurrer thereto, complaint must be deemed to have stated plaintiff's case as strongly as facts would justify in view of his election not to amend in particulars pointed out and as to which lower court stated willingness to give time for amendment.

7. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(4)

In action for alleged malpractice of surgeon, employed by defendant airplane manufacturer for purpose of giving physical examinations to persons applying for employment and to render certain other professional services in which complaint was insufficient as against demurrer, in failing to specify matters in which surgeon was negligent in diagnosing and operating on plaintiff for hernia, amendment of complaint by adding allegations as to negligence of defendant manufacturer in employing defendant's surgeon would not cure the defect because such allegations in each cause of action would in no way tend to supply facts with reference to allegedly negligent surgery of the surgeon and its consequences.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Myron Westover, Judge.

Action by H. H. Rannard and wife against Lockheed Aircraft Corporation and Z. P. King for damages for alleged malpractice by defendant last named while allegedly in employ of defendant first named. From the judgment and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment affirmed and appeal from order dismissed.

A. G. VanDeventer, of Pasadena, for appellants.

George H. Moore, Hugh B. Rotchford, and Harold C. Tallmadge, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Lockheed Aircraft Corporation.

SHINN, Justice.

Plaintiffs, husband and wife, appeal from a judgment on the pleadings in favor of Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, which was ordered at the commencement of the trial. The action is for damages for the alleged malpractice of one Z. P. King, a physician and surgeon who, it is alleged, was in the employ of defendant Lockheed for the purpose of giving physical examinations to persons who applied to Lockheed for employment and to render certain other professional services. It appears that the services of Dr. King were rendered to the husband and not the wife, and he will be referred to as plaintiff.

The complaint contained five separate statements of fact, each designated as a cause of action, which may be summarized as follows:

The first cause of action alleged that Lockheed "retained in its employ, as its agent and employee, the defendant Z. P. King in the normal conduct of, and in the furtherance of its interests in, the business in which said defendant Corporation was at all such times engaged"; that plaintiff applied to Lockheed for employment and was found acceptable, subject to a physical examination "which was required to be, and was actually, made by said defendant Corporation and its agent, defendant Z. P. King"; that at the direction of Lockheed plaintiff was given a physical examination by defendants Lockheed and King, and that said defendants conducted said physical examination negligently, carelessly, and unskillfully; that as a direct and proximate consequence and result of said negligence plaintiffs and each of them have sustained, and will continue to sustain, "losses, damages, injuries, inconveniences, and hardships" consisting of physical pain and inconvenience, the necessity for surgical and medical treatment in the future, expenses of past medical care and treatment, loss of earnings, and loss of earning ability. The amount of the damages alleged to have been suffered by reason of said medical expense, etc., was specified.

The second cause of action incorporated the allegations of the first cause of action but elaborated upon the employee relationship of defendant King by alleging that Lockheed hired and retained King for the purpose of conducting physical examinations of applicants for employment, and in hiring and retaining him negligently failed to select "a medical and surgical attendant physician and surgeon, possessed of or capable of exercising that degree of care, skill, ability or learning possessed and exercised by medical and surgical attendants, physicians and surgeons practicing their profession in the locality of said defendant Lockheed Aircraft Corporation's said principal office, but said defendant Lockheed Aircraft Corporation nevertheless held out said defendant Z. P. King to be so qualified and skilled."

The third cause of action incorporated the allegations of the first cause of action but elaborated upon the allegation as to the negligent physical examination and alleged that plaintiff at the direction of Lockheed submitted to such examination by the defendants and was thereupon negligently "advised by said defendants that as a condition precedent to the proposed employment of said plaintiff, H. H. Rannard, by said defendant, Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, it would be necessary for said plaintiff to undergo and submit to an operation designed to correct a purported 'double hernia' purportedly found in said plaintiff; said plaintiff did thereupon, with the full acquiescence, knowledge and consent of defendant Lockheed Aircraft Corporation consent to the operation so advised, and did, on the 2nd day of November, 1941, at the direction of defendants, submit to, and undergo the said advised operation; that said operation was performed upon said plaintiff by said defendant Z. P. King in a negligent, careless, and unskillful manner" and that in advising said operation and in performing it, "defendant Z. P. King at all times acted as the agent and employee of defendant Lockheed Aircraft Corporation and such acts of defendant Z. P. King were, and each of them was, done in the scope of, and as a routine and regular part of, the usual employment and services rendered by said defendant Z. P. King to defendant Lockheed Aircraft Corporation."

The fourth cause of action was against King only and was held to state a cause of action against him.

The fifth cause of action incorporated the substance of the first cause of action, but it alleged that the diagnosis made in the examination for employment was of a double hernia and that plaintiff was operated on for that condition by defendant King. The allegations of the third cause of action with reference to the operation and Lockheed's connection with it were incorporated by reference. It was further alleged that after the operation defendant King discontinued his employment with Lockheed but that he continued to treat and take care of plaintiff following the operation, that he did so negligently, and "that defendant Lockheed Aircraft Corporation participated in and took an active part in said negligent, careless and unskillful subsequent treatment and care, and thereby ratified and adopted and constituted as the act of said last named defendant and of its agent, defendant Z. P. King, the said negligent, careless and unskillful subsequent treatment and care." The defendants answered separately without demurring to the complaint.

The fifth cause of action was broader than any of the others and is the only one we need to consider. If it was insufficient, no cause of action was stated against Lockheed and the judgment should be affirmed.

[1-3] A transcript of the argument upon the motion has been added to the record on appeal by stipulation. It was furnished for the purpose of resolving a disagreement between counsel as to whether plaintiff had sought leave to amend. We have read it and find that plaintiff did offer to amend in one particular but declined to amend in others in which the complaint was patently inadequate. The insufficiency which we regard as determinative is that no facts were alleged to show what Dr. King did or failed to do in the diagnosis or the operation, or to show a connection between the alleged negligence of the defendants and the injuries which plaintiff claims to have suffered.

It was not alleged that plaintiff did not have a double hernia, or that an operation was not necessary to correct it, or that a hernia condition was not corrected. The court could not assume the existence of such material facts, when no attempt was made to allege them, and the omission was evidently intentional. No facts were alleged as to plaintiff's condition following the operation nor any facts from which it would appear that his condition differed from what it would have been if the operation had been performed with care and skill. There was only the naked allegation that certain damages had been sustained by reason of the alleged negligence of the defendants. No facts were stated as to what Dr. King did or failed to do which caused the undescribed condition from which the alleged damages resulted. A complaint must state the facts which constitute the plaintiff's cause of action; more conclusions which do not give even a clue as to the facts which the defendant will be called upon to meet are not sufficient. A complaint against a surgeon which alleges that he operated upon the plaintiff carelessly and unskillfully, and that as the proximate result of the negligence the plaintiff has been disabled and has lost the ability to work, does not state a cause of action. There must be a factual statement as to what the defendant did or failed to do and as to the connection between the alleged negligence and the alleged results of it in the pleading as well as in the proof. If a man should sue another, alleging that he had been rendered an invalid by the negligent firing of a gun, or the driving of an automobile, the defendant would be entitled to know whether he was charged with having struck the plaintiff or only frightened him.

[4, 5] In Smith v. Buttner, 1891, 90 Cal. 95, 27 P. 29, a complaint was held defective which alleged that the plaintiff fell when she was endeavoring to descend from a house to the ground, "by reason of the negligence and failure of defendant to provide safe, suitable, or proper means of exit from said house." The court said (90 Cal. at pages 99, 100, 27 P. at page 29): "It is well settled that negligence may be charged in general terms; that is, what was done being stated, it is sufficient to say it was negligently done, without stating the particular omission which rendered the act negligent. But it must appear from the facts averred that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury. To illustrate: Suppose a plaintiff injured by the falling of a sign negligently and insecurely fastened by defendant. It would not suffice for him to allege the negligence in hanging the sign; that plaintiff, in lawfully and without negligence passing under it, was thrown down and injured through such negligence. This would be a mere assertion of the cause. It would be necessary to show that the sign fell upon him in consequence of such negligence, thereby causing his injury." In Cary v. Los Angeles R. Co., 1910, 157 Cal. 599, 602, 108 P. 682, 684, 27 L.R.A., N.S., 764, 21 Ann.Cas. 1329, this statement appears: "While it is permissible to charge negligence in general terms, it is nevertheless necessary to specify the particular act or acts alleged to have been negligently done [citing] Stephenson v. Southern Pac. Co. [1894], 102 Cal. 143, 34 P. 618, 36 P. 407; Smith v. Buttner, [supra]." See also Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. Min. Co., 1914, 168 Cal. 500, 505, 143 P. 714. In Rathbun v. White, 1910, 157 Cal. 248, at page 254, 107 P. 309, at page 311, it was said: "It is sufficient, under the rule well settled in this state, to charge negligence by the general averment that the defendant negligently did the particular act which resulted in damage to plaintiff." (Italics added.) See also Grossetti v. Sweasey, 1917, 176 Cal. 793, 795, 169 P. 687. In Lang v. Lilley & Thurston Co., 1912, 20 Cal.App. 264, 265, 128 P. 1031, the complaint alleged that plaintiff was injured by the negligent operation of an elevator by defendant's employee, without the statement of any facts as to the manner in which it was operated. In affirming a judgment after demurrer sustained, the court said (20 Cal.App. at page 266, 128 P. at page 1031): "The ruling was justifiable for the reason that there was a failure to specify the particular act or acts of negligence which proximately caused the accident. It is not sufficient to allege that the elevator was negligently operated and thereby the injury was produced. Defendants should have been informed, by appropriate allegation, in what respect the contrivance was negligently operated, and it should have appeared that the recited facts had a causal connection with the death of plaintiff's intestate. We are left entirely to surmise whether the elevator was moved too suddenly or too rapidly or too far or without warning, or, in other words, what particular act was negligently performed. If the case were tried on the pleadings as it stands it is evident that additional facts to those alleged would have to be proved in order for plaintiff to recover." The insufficiency of the complaint before us is emphasized by comparing it with a good allegation of the particular act which caused injury found in McGehee v. Schiffman, 1906, 4 Cal.App. 50, 51, 53, 87 P. 290, where it was alleged that the defendant, in extracting several of plaintiff's teeth, negligently dropped one of them into plaintiff's lung. This fundamental rule of pleading has been repeatedly adhered to in the later cases. In Dunn v. Dufficy, 1924, 194 Cal. 383, 228 P. 1029, a malpractice case, the complaint contained specific allegations as to the acts and omissions in the surgery which resulted in the loss of use of one of plaintiff's fingers. The discussion in which the Dunn complaint was distinguished from the one in Smith v. Buttner, supra, clearly points out what the court considered to be the essentials of a cause of action for malpractice, with reference to the causes of the condition resulting from the surgery. These essentials are wholly lacking in the present complaint and the trial court properly so ruled. Plaintiff cannot justly complain that he was not given an opportunity to supply them. The deficiencies of the complaint were specified and discussed fully and the argument of the defendants was complete enough to have supported a special demurrer for uncertainty. It was repeatedly pointed out that there were no allegations as to what plaintiff's condition was prior to the accident, or what the doctor did, or failed to do, in the operation, or what condition was produced by the operation.

[6] Plaintiff's attorney stated that he could amend by adding the allegations of the second cause of action to his third and fifth causes of action, so as to charge Lockheed with negligence in the employment of the doctor, but that he could make no further amendment. The court then said: "I have said I would tentatively deny a judgment on the pleadings if you wanted to amend. If you feel that you cannot amend, then I would give a judgment on the pleadings, if you cannot state a case." The court stated a willingness to give "10, 15 or 20 days, whatever time you want," for amendment, with the understanding that if no amendment were presented a ruling would then be made on the motion for judgment on the pleadings. Plaintiff's counsel then said: "I will state that I am not going to amend * * * and I will ask the court at this time to resolve the motion for judgment on the pleadings in favor of the defendants, both defendants." The reporter's transcript shows that the motions of both defendants for judgment on the pleadings were granted. The clerk's minutes show that Lockheed's motion was granted as to all causes of action and that defendant King's motion was granted as to the first, second and third causes of action, but it was denied as to the fourth and fifth with leave to amend these causes of action within ten days. In view of plaintiff's election not to amend in particulars we have pointed out, the complaint must be deemed to have stated plaintiff's case against Lockheed as strongly as the facts would justify.

[7] The further contention is made that plaintiff offered to amend, as we have already stated, and it is apparently claimed that his counsel understood that the complaint was considered as having been amended by adding the allegations of the second cause of action to the third and fifth causes of action. It is difficult to determine this point from the record, but we are inclined to believe that the court considered the complaint as if this amendment had been made. That fact does not bear upon the grounds of our decision that no cause of action was stated. Negligence of Lockheed in the employment of Dr. King, if it had been alleged in each cause of action, would have tended in no way to supply facts with reference to the allegedly negligent surgery of Dr. King and its consequences.

The attempted appeal from the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial is dismissed. The judgment is affirmed.

BALLENTINE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SAN MATEO COUNTY et al.

Civ. 12708.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

July 20, 1944.

Rehearing Granted Aug. 19, 1944.

1. Divorce ☞269(10)

Affidavit showing that defendant was in court when interlocutory divorce decree was entered requiring him to pay alimony, that amount was fixed at his suggestion, that copy of decree was shortly thereafter served upon his attorneys, that after specified date no payments had been made, and that according to affiant's best information and belief defendant was able to make such payments, showed that court had jurisdiction of contempt proceeding for failure to make such payments.

2. Divorce ☞269(10)

Where California interlocutory divorce decree and Nevada final divorce decree provided for same amount of alimony, on contempt proceedings in California for failure to make payments according to California interlocutory decree, in which no attack was made on either decree and only questions raised before court were whether payments had been made as directed, no question of res judicata was involved.

3. Divorce ☞171, 269(2)

Where after entry of California interlocutory divorce decree providing for alimony a final divorce decree between the same parties was entered in Nevada providing for same amount of alimony, there was no merger of the California interlocutory decree as respects jurisdiction of California court of contempt proceedings against former husband for failure to make alimony payments as provided in such court's decree. Civ.Code, § 137.

4. Judgment ☞884

When a judgment is rendered upon the judgment of a court of another state, a payment of either judgment discharges the obligation of the other judgment.

5. Divorce ☞269(9)

That after defendant and cross-complainant wife procured California interlocutory divorce decree she appeared in same capacity in subsequent proceedings instituted by her husband in Nevada and procured a final divorce decree awarding her the same amount of alimony as provided in California interlocutory divorce decree did not bar former wife from enforcing by contempt proceedings the California interlocutory divorce decree for payment of alimony. Civ.Code, § 137.

6. Divorce ☞286

In contempt proceeding for failure to make alimony payments as provided in interlocutory divorce decree, any error in excluding defendant's affidavit was cured by subsequently admitting it in evidence.

Original application by Edward W. Ballentine for a writ of prohibition to restrain the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of San Mateo and Honorable A. R. Cotton, judge thereof, from enforcing an order of contempt against the petitioner, and for a writ of mandamus ordering the respondent court to dismiss a divorce action pending before it.

Application denied.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent court from enforcing an order of contempt against the petitioner and for a writ of mandamus ordering the respondent court to dismiss a divorce action pending before said court. Heretofore the trial court granted a decree of divorce to Mary T. Ballentine, the petitioner's wife, and entered an interlocutory decree. In that decree, among other things, it was provided that the petitioner, the plaintiff and cross-defendant in the divorce action, should pay to Mary T. Ballentine, the defendant and cross-complainant, $150 per month. Such payments were made to and including the 1st day of November, 1943. However, on the 11th day of March, 1944, she filed an affidavit and asked for orders that the plaintiff and cross-defendant appear and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for having failed to make any additional payments. At this time the petitioner contends said affidavit was insufficient to show that the trial court had jurisdiction to make said order. Phillips v. Superior Court, 22 Cal.2d 256, 137 P.2d 838. However, the affidavit recited as follows: "* * * but has not made said payments or any of them since said November 1st, 1943; although in possession of sufficient funds so to do according to the best of the information and belief of affiant; that said plaintiff and cross-defendant was in court at the time of the making of said provisions of said decree, and that the amount of said payments so as aforesaid ordered to be made was fixed at the suggestion of said plaintiff and cross-defendant; that in addition thereto, a copy of said interlocutory decree was shortly after the 10th day of September, 1943 served upon Messrs. Max H. Margolis and Paul A. McCarthy, the attorneys for plaintiff and cross-defendant;

"That to the best of the information and belief of affiant, plaintiff and cross-defendant has been able at all of said times to comply with said order; that said plaintiff and cross-defendant has been employed for the greater portion of said time from November 1, 1943 to the date hereof, and that the failure of said plaintiff and cross-defendant to comply with said decree as hereinabove set forth has been wilful and without just cause; * * *." We think said recitals are such that the petitioner's contention may not be sustained.

[1] On the 10th day of September, 1943, the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of San Mateo entered an interlocutory decree of divorce in favor of Mary T. Ballentine, defendant and cross-complainant, against Edward W. Ballentine, plaintiff and cross-defendant. Thereafter Edward W. Ballentine, as plaintiff, commenced an action against Mary T. Ballentine to recover a judgment of divorce. That action was commenced in the District Court of the State of Nevada in and for Washoe County. The defendant Mary T. Ballentine appeared therein, filed an answer and cross-complaint, and pleaded in haec verba the interlocutory decree so rendered by the said Superior Court in and for San Mateo County. On the 18th day of September, 1943 the District Court of the State of Nevada in and for the County of Washoe entered a final decree in favor of Mary T. Ballentine as defendant and cross-complainant against Edward W. Ballentine as plaintiff and cross-defendant. The decrees were substantially the same on the subject of maintenance. Because the former decree was interlocutory and the latter was a final decree Edward W. Ballentine now contends the Superior Court at San Mateo lost jurisdiction. That is he contends as follows: "Where merely an interlocutory decree of divorce is rendered in California and thereafter, and before a final decree of divorce can be entered in California, the other spouse becomes a bona fide resident of the State of Nevada and there files an action for absolute divorce, in which action the defendant files an answer denying, among other things, that the plaintiff in the latter cause of action is or has been a resident of Nevada where the action is filed, and also files a cross-complaint wherein she seeks affirmative relief including a decree of divorce and alimony, and thereupon, upon a trial such defendant and cross-complainant is awarded a decree of absolute and final divorce on her cross-complaint with provisions for alimony and other relief, and such a decree is rendered, filed and entered prior to any final decree of divorce in California where the first action was commenced, the decree in the State of Nevada is res judicata on all issues in the original action in California, and the California courts and the wife in whose favor a decree was rendered in the State of Nevada are bound by the finality of the Nevada decree. No further proceedings on the California interlocutory decree can be maintained by reason of the final determination of the marital status by the Nevada court; that decree supersedes the interlocutory decree in California and prevents any further proceedings on the interlocutory decree in California, and necessitates a dismissal of the California action because of the prior dissolution of the marriage by the Nevada court pursuant to the cross-complaint of the wife and the decree in her favor in that action in Nevada."

[2] Before we proceed to discuss authorities the exact nature of the contentions of the parties should be carefully noted. In the action commenced in San Mateo County, Mrs. Ballentine was the defendant and she filed an answer and cross-complaint. Later she was awarded a decree on her cross-complaint and was awarded maintenance in the sum of $150 per month, the custody of two minor children and maintenance for them in the sum of $50 per month. The uncontroverted evidence is that after November 1, 1943 no payment was made and, relying on the provisions in the interlocutory decree, Mrs. Ballentine, on the 11th day of March, 1944, filed an affidavit and took out an order to show cause why the plaintiff should not be punished for contempt. In response to that order to show cause Mr. Ballentine appeared and through his counsel moved to quash proceedings on the order to show cause and to dismiss said action. In support of said motion he filed certain affidavits. The hearing of the motion occurred on April 24, 1944. At that time Mr. Ballentine produced the decree of divorce entered in the Second Judicial District Court of the State of Nevada in and for the County of Washoe in an action entitled Edward W. Ballentine v. Mary T. Ballentine. No attack was made on either judgment and no claim was made that either court did not have jurisdiction to render the decree which it rendered. Nor was the Nevada decree pleaded by either party. Mound Water Co. v. Southern Cal. Edison Co., 184 Cal. 602, 611, 194 P. 1014. As to the amount of each installment of maintenance money and the time for the payment thereof the terms of the two decrees were identical. The sole questions before the court were what payments had been made and why had others not been made as directed by the terms of the interlocutory decree of the trial court. Neither decree contained any adjudication on either of those questions and no question of res judicata was involved. 34 C.J. 746.

It follows that the record presents no facts warranting the application of the doctrine of res judicata.

[3] Mr. Ballentine also contends that under the facts hereinabove set forth the Nevada decree superseded the California decree and that the California action should be dismissed. Although he does not use the identical word, the purport of the point is that the California decree was merged in the Nevada decree. That position is not supported by the facts. There was no merger. Lilly-Brackett Co. v. Sonnemann, 163 Cal. 632, 126 P. 483, 42 L.R.A.,N.S., 360, Ann.Cas.1914A, 364. Moore v. Justices of Municipal Court of City of Boston, 291 Mass. 504, 197 N.E. 487, was an application for a writ of prohibition. It involved the following facts. On June 20, 1932 the Merrimac Chemical Company recovered a judgment in the state of Massachusetts. It took out a writ of execution which was still outstanding. In December, 1933 it brought an action in the Superior Court of Maine upon its judgment. Moore entered a general appearance and on May 12, 1934 a personal judgment was rendered against him. On May 28, 1934 the Merrimac Chemical Company instituted supplementary process proceedings against the petitioner in the Municipal Court of the City of Boston. Such proceedings were based upon the original judgment recovered in the commonwealth of Massachusetts. On appeal the question was whether that judgment was merged in the judgment rendered by the Superior Court of Maine in 1934. The court made an exhaustive study of the subject. On page 488 of 197 N.E. the court said: "The underlying principle on which the doctrine of merger rests is that a judgment is an obligation of higher quality than the original cause of action as to defenses, permanence and remedies for collection. The public welfare and the interests of parties require that there be not a repetition of trials of the same issues. The reasoning on which the doctrine of merger rests is not applicable where an action on a judgment rendered in one state is brought in another state and a second judgment there recovered. No obligation of stronger attributes is thus created. Commonly, there is no difference in the quality attaching to the judgments of courts of different states. They stand on the same footing in essential particulars. One has no superiority over the other; one is of as high a nature as another. The great weight of authority supports this view. Griswold v. Hill, Fed.Cas.No.5,836, 2 Paine 492; Wells v. Schuster-Hax National Bank, 23 Colo. 534, 48 P. 809; Lilly-Brackett Co. v. Sonnemann, 163 Cal. 632, 126 P. 483, 42 L.R.A.,N.S., 360, Ann.Cas. 1914A, 364; Bates v. Lyons, 7 Paige, N.Y., 85; In re Williams, 208 N.Y. 32, 36, 101 N.E. 853, 46 L.R.A.,N.S., 719; Weeks v. Pearson, 5 N.H. 324; Springs v. Pharr, 131 N.C. 191, 193, 42 S.E. 590, 92 Am.St.Rep. 775; Van Winkle v. Owen, 54 N.J.Eq. [253], 9 Dick. 253, 258, 259, 34 A. 400. See cases collected in 44 A.L.R. 462-464. To the same effect, see Am. Law Inst. Restatement, Conflict of Laws, § 450f, Merger, note 5; Story on Conflict of Laws (8th Ed.) § 599, note (a); 2 Beale on Conflict of Laws, p. 1427. See to the contrary Gould v. Hayden, 63 Ind. 443." It follows that the California decree was not merged in the Nevada decree.

[5] We are therefore of the opinion that the California decree and the Nevada decree "* * * stand on the same footing in essential particulars. One has no superiority over the other. One is of as high a nature as the other." That the trial court had jurisdiction to entertain contempt proceedings is statutory. (C.C. sec. 137.) Nothing that the defendant and cross-complainant did has deprived her of the right to maintain this proceeding.

[6] On March 11, 1944, Mary T. Ballentine served and filed her affidavit and an order to show cause. On March 23, 1944, Edward W. Ballentine executed an affidavit in reply. Thereafter in open court his attorney tendered said affidavit in defense of said order to show cause. An objection was made and the objection was sustained. However at a subsequent session of the court the objection was withdrawn and said affidavit was received and the trial court read it. This petitioner assigns the first ruling of the trial court as error. However the record as quoted shows the error, if any, was not prejudicial to the said affiant Edward W. Ballentine.

The application for a writ of prohibition is denied and the application for a writ of mandamus is denied.

1. Divorce ☞ 165(5½)

Where on his ex parte application for a final divorce decree the defendant presented a false affidavit that all requirements in interlocutory decree had been complied with, such act was a fraud on the court and was properly heard as on a motion to vacate final decree made within six months from date of its entry.

2. Army and navy ☞ 34

The trial court may refuse to grant continuances under Soldiers' Relief Act when defendant will not be injured. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 521.

3. Army and navy $\S$ 34

Where issue on wife's application to vacate final divorce decree on ground that husband's affidavit in support of his ex parte application for final decree was false was whether husband had paid for medical services rendered to minor daughter as required by interlocutory decree, and it did not appear that husband was a witness on such issue and all the witnesses who could testify thereon were present and no one except the wife was called, overruling husband's application for a continuance under Soldiers' Relief Act was not prejudicial. 4. Divorce $\S$ 165(5)

Where wife served notice on husband that she would make a motion to set aside final divorce decree which had been granted upon husband's ex parte application, and her affidavit attached thereto set forth the acts of fraud on which she relied, trial court was warranted in hearing wife's motion, notwithstanding that the notice did not state the grounds of her motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; A. R. Cotton, Judge.

Action by Marion M. Miller against Loren F. Miller for divorce. From adverse orders, the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Campbell, Hayes & Custer and Robert E. Hayes, all of San Jose, for appellant.

Francis N. Foley and J. A. Branson, both of San Mateo, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

The defendant appeals from four different orders made by the trial court in an action brought by the plaintiff to obtain a divorce. On May 1, 1941, the plaintiff commenced the action. In her complaint she alleged cruelty and asked for the custody of their minor child, a division of the community property, and an award of maintenance in favor of herself and the minor child. The defendant answered denying the allegations as to the community property, the acts of cruelty, and the allegations regarding maintenance. The action was tried before the trial court sitting without a jury. On December 8, 1941, the trial court entered an interlocutory decree in favor of the plaintiff. In that decree it was ordered that the custody of the minor child, Janet Elizabeth Miller, be awarded to the plaintiff. It enumerated the items of community property and provided a division thereof, and it further provided:

"4.—That defendant pay to plaintiff for her support and maintenance, the sum of $40.00 per month, and defendant pay to plaintiff for the support and maintenance of said minor Janet Elizabeth Miller, the sum of $20.00 per month and in addition pay for all reasonable and necessary medical and dental care and treatment of said minor, said payments to continue until modified, changed or terminated by order of Court."

Said decree did not specifically provide the dates on which payments of maintenance should be made. On January 18, 1943, on motion of the defendant, the trial court entered a final judgment. Said motion was supported by an affidavit made by the defendant on the 8th day of January, 1943, which alleged among other things the making of the interlocutory decree and a recital, "All the requirements therein have been fully complied with on the part of the moving party herein and he is not in default in any thereof". Later the plaintiff served a notice that on the 21st day of June, 1943, she would move the court for an order setting aside the final decree. That notice was supported by an affidavit of the plaintiff in which she alleged that on January 18, 1943, the defendant "was in default in the sum of $30 for maintenance and support of plaintiff as prescribed by said interlocutory decree and that at said time there was outstanding and unpaid bills for medical care and treatment of the said minor child of plaintiff and defendant in the sum of $1,298.06. That at said time the said defendant Loren F. Miller was fully aware of the nature and amount of said outstanding bills for medical care and treatment for said minor child and was fully aware of the fact that he was at that time in arrears in the sum of $30 as and for maintenance and support of the plaintiff in accordance with the terms of the aforementioned interlocutory decree of divorce made and entered by the above entitled court on the 8th day of December, 1941, and that said final decree was procured by and through the fraud of the defendant, Loren F. Miller."

The defendant's mother, Emma E. Miller, on the 19th day of June, 1943, filed a verified petition in behalf of the defendant in which she alleged:

"That said defendant is now in the military service of the United States; that he was inducted into such service on or about the 2nd day of November, 1942, and reported for active duty therein on or about the 17th day of November, 1942. That he so entered such service as a private in the United States Army Engineers, that he was thereafter transferred to Officers' Candidate School and is now a 2nd Lieutenant, 295 Engr. Combat Bn., stationed at Camp Shelby, Mississippi." Continuing she inserted a prayer "that all further proceedings herein be stayed as provided in the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 501 et seq."

On the 21st day of June, 1943, Harvey C. Miller prepared, served, and filed an affidavit reciting the induction of the defendant into the army as above set forth and inserted a prayer that the hearing of plaintiff's said motion be continued for three weeks.

On June 21, 1943, all of said motions came on for hearing. The trial court made an order denying the petition of Emma E. Miller. It also made an order denying the motion for a continuance of three weeks. Continuing the trial court took up the hearing of the motion to set aside the final decree and made an order granting said motion.

On July 16, 1943, defendant filed his notice of appeal from each and all of said orders. On July 30, 1943, the trial court heard and granted the application of plaintiff for $50 to pay costs and $350 counsel fees on appeal. The defendant appealed from that order on August 13, 1943. At this time the appeal has been perfected. Stating that the matter has become moot, the plaintiff abandons all rights under the order dated July 30, 1943 and it becomes unnecessary for us to further discuss said order.

[1] In his first point the defendant contends that the trial court erred in vacating the final decree because there was no substantial evidence of fraud. We find no merit in that contention. In the interlocutory decree the trial court had made orders directing defendant to make certain payments as and for the maintenance of the plaintiff and the minor daughter of the parties and for the payment of the expenses of medical and dental bills of said minor.

The evidence showed there was a balance of $30 remaining unpaid on the maintenance order and that although the minor had been sick a considerable portion of the time elapsing between the date of the interlocutory decree and the final decree, and many bills had been incurred for medical expenses, the same had not been paid. There was evidence that the bills came to the plaintiff and that she sent them to the defendant, but the defendant had not paid any of them. Nevertheless on January 8, 1942, the defendant made an affidavit that all the requirements in the interlocutory decree had been complied with. Under the facts that part of said affidavit was false and constituted fraud. When on his ex parte application for a final decree the defendant presented said affidavit to the court, such act was a fraud on the court (Dunlap v. Steere, 92 Cal. 344, 346, 28 P. 563, 16 L.R.A. 361, 27 Am.St.Rep. 143) and was properly heard as on a motion made within six months from the date of the final decree. In re Johnson, 7 Cal.App. 436, 94 P. 592; Estate of Ross, 140 Cal. 282, 286, 73 P. 976; Melde v. Reynolds, 129 Cal. 308, 311, 61 P. 932; Campbell-Kawan-nakos v. Campbell, 152 Cal. 201, 208-211, 92 P. 184.

Mrs. Miller testified that $30 of the maintenance had not been paid January 18, 1943. The defendant asserts that by the terms of the interlocutory decree the maintenance was not payable in advance. But the defendant did not show that the $30 had been paid June 21, 1943, the date of the order appealed from. Mrs. Miller testified bills for medical and dental service incurred between the date of the interlocutory decree and January 18, 1943, the date of the final decree, had been received and forwarded to the defendant. But he made no showing that they were paid in whole or in part.

The defendant complains there was no evidence that the charges for services and care were the necessary and reasonable value for the amounts stated in said bills. But that is to present a false issue. The action was not brought to recover on the claims of the doctors and hospitals. It was a proceeding involving the truth or falsity of the affidavit made by defendant on January 8, 1943. Manifestly it may not be asserted that all bills for all services rendered in the treatment and care of a case of pneumonia and spells of asthma were not reasonable at least in part.

[2] The notice of appeal dated July 13, 1943, as recited above included several orders. By the order dated June 1, and the order dated June 21, 1943, the trial court refused defendant's application to grant him continuances. He complains that he was deprived of rights under "Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act", U.S.C.A. Tit. 50, Appendix, § 521. When an application is made for relief under said statute it has been ruled that considering all of the circumstances before it the trial court does not err in refusing to grant continuances when the defendant will not be injured. Johnson v. Johnson, 59 Cal. App.2d 375, 139 P.2d 33. That rule is specially applicable in the instant case. Mrs. Miller was present in court. Dr. Cohen, Dr. Saier, Dr. Clark, Dr. Eloesser, and also the manager of St. Luke's Hospital and the manager of Palo Alto Hospital were all available as witnesses. They were the only witnesses who presumptively had any knowledge of the bills incurred in the matter of caring for the infant daughter of the plaintiff and defendant. Excepting Mrs. Miller, no one of them was called as a witness.

[3] The issue before the trial court was whether the defendant had knowingly presented a false affidavit in applying for the final decree. As the trial court remarked, if the affidavit was false to the amount of one dollar that was a sufficient showing to set the final decree aside. We need not discuss whether the bills amounted to upwards of $1,200. Included in that sum was the claim of Dr. Cohen for $83, which, according to the testimony of Mrs. Miller, existed at the time the divorce action was tried, was then discussed, and the payment was imposed on the defendant. The claim of the clinic was for $100. The child was ill during the year. Just how long she was confined in the clinic is a fact not shown in the record. However, Mrs. Miller testified that she sent all bills to the defendant. The issue before the court was whether the defendant had complied with all requirements of the interlocutory decree. That is whether he had paid the maintenance awarded to the plaintiff and "all reasonable and necessary medical and dental care and treatment" of Janet Elizabeth Miller. That Janet was sick of asthma and pneumonia during the year preceding the entry of the final decree is not disputed. That she had the services of several doctors is also not disputed. Whether the creditors had been paid was the specific issue before the court. As witnesses on that issue the defendant was not shown to be one, but the persons above mentioned were all available and qualified. It is therefore clear that the defendant was not prejudiced by the fact that the issue was tried in his absence. No claim was made that part payments had been made. The claim at issue was solely whether obligations had been incurred which had not been met.

[4] As we understand the defendant he contends that the affidavit of Mrs. Miller was insufficient to support the order. We think not. She served a notice that on the 21st day of June, 1943, she would make a motion to set aside the final decree. True it is that she did not in that notice state the grounds of her motion. However she did state, "Said motion will be made upon this notice of motion, the affidavit of Marion M. Miller which is attached hereto, and all the records, files and pleadings in the above entitled matter." In her affidavit so attached she set forth the acts of fraud on which she relied. Those papers warranted the trial court in hearing said motion. 18 Cal.Jur. 654; Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525, 527, 137 P. 263, Ann.Cas.1915C, 737; Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 474, 150 P. 353; Hecq v. Conner, 203 Cal. 504, 506, 265 P. 180.

The orders dated June 1, June 21 and June 28, 1943, and appealed from on July 13, 1943, are affirmed.

GASTINE et al. v. EWING et al.
Civ. 3342.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

July 10, 1944.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 8, 1944.

Hearing Denied Sept. 5, 1944.

1. Damages ⇨222

In personal injury action, finding that injuries would permanently disable plaintiff and permanently cause her pain and suffering and disability and that thereby plaintiff had been damaged in the additional sum of $10,000, exclusive of pecuniary damages, was not a finding that plaintiff was permanently and physically disabled from further participating in her work, and from carrying on her work, business, and profession in any manner.

2. Appeal and error ⇨891

Where recitation in court's finding that by reason of injuries plaintiff would be depreciated in her future earning capacity, and for depreciated future earnings court allowed $5,000, indicated that trial court realized that plaintiff might be able to pursue to limited extent her usual vocation, and fair interpretation of allegations of affidavits was not opposed to such instruction, and it could not be said that if additional evidence recited in affidavits were introduced, it would result in reversal of judgment rendered, District Court of Appeal would not take additional testimony. Code Civ. Proc. § 956a.

3. Negligence ⇨32(2)

Where defendant acting through booking agents invited plaintiff to appear and demonstrate her act, plaintiff was a business "invitee" and defendants owed her all duties attendant thereon.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Invitee".

4. Negligence ⇨32(2)

One who enters premises of another upon the latter's invitation, express or implied, for purpose of applying for work, is an "invitee".

5. Negligence ⇨32(3)

The invitation of a proprietor extends not only to all parts of premises which patron is expressly invited to use, but also to such parts as he or she is impliedly invited to enter, and invitation also extends to those portions of premises where invitee, under circumstances and conditions of his invitation, would naturally be likely to go.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1)

Where professional dancer and entertainer had been invited to defendants' cafe and night club to demonstrate her act, question whether she was a trespasser or an invitee as to portion of premises upon which she received her injuries where she went to test floor of stage which had been lowered without her knowledge was question of fact for trial court, whose finding was conclusive.

7. Trial ⇨375

Where trial judge visited premises where injuries occurred and viewed scene of accident, and observed the method of operation of inner stage and the various lighting conditions as explained by witnesses, this in itself was evidence in the case.

8. Negligence ⇨134(3)

In action for injuries to professional dancer and entertainer who was invited to defendants' premises to demonstrate her act, and who fell when she attempted to test floor, not knowing stage had been lowered by previous performers and believing that stage was stationary, evidence supporting finding of negligence on part of defendants.

9. Negligence ⇨52

Plaintiff's booking agent's uncommunicated knowledge of nature of elevator stage could not affect right of recovery of plaintiff who fell into stage elevator shaft after stage floor had been lowered.

10. Negligence ⇨136(26)

Whether plaintiff, who went at defendants' request to defendants' premises to demonstrate dancing and entertaining act and fell when attempting to test floor of stage because stage had been lowered without her knowledge, acted as a reasonable and prudent person, or was guilty of contributory negligence, was question of fact.

11. Damages ⇨43

Injured person was entitled to recover from tortfeasor reasonable value of services rendered by physician whose certificate to practice medicine had not been registered in county where services were rendered at time of such services. St.1937, p. 1272, § 2340.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Robert B. Burch, Judge.

Action by Edith Gastine and husband against John Sidney Ewing and another for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Dempster McKee and Monroe & McInnis, all of San Diego, for appellants.

Edgar B. Hervey, of San Diego, and Henry F. Walker, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment against defendants for damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff wife when she fell into a stage elevator shaft upon the premises of a cafe and night club owned and operated by defendants. Her presence there resulted from an invitation to appear and demonstrate an act looking toward prospective employment by defendants. Trial was had before the court sitting without a jury.

In the center of the building here involved there was a circular elevator stage about 14 feet in diameter which was raised and lowered by electrical machinery. It had a height of 54 inches above the floor. Surrounding it and at the same height, there was a platform in which stage lights of various colors were located. Encircling this platform was a circular bar and surrounding this bar were stools. The stage was not used for public dancing but only by professional entertainers who entered through a door in the basement. When the stage was lowered into the elevator pit it was 14 feet below its extreme height. The elevator pit was circular in form and completely enclosed except for the basement door. The floor of the stage was of hard maple, unpainted, and had two narrow strips of darker wood running across it. The interior of the pit was of rose color. The stage was lowered and raised by means of three buttons on the southerly portion of its floor. By pressing one button it could be raised, and by pressing another button it could be stopped. It could also be raised, but not lowered, by an auxiliary button which was located on the back bar. The cafe was lighted by means of a large ornate chandelier over the approximate center of the stage and by side lights in brackets on the walls surrounding the stage and on the balcony.

The plaintiff Edith Gastine, to whom we will refer as the plaintiff, at the time of the accident was, and for many years had been, a professional dancer and entertainer. For some considerable time she had employed a certain theatrical booking agency, and particularly Evelyn Lening of that agency, to book her professional engagements. Through her agent plaintiff had been notified to be at defendants' cafe on the date of the accident at three o'clock in the afternoon for a rehearsal. The arrangement was that various acts of entertainment were sent down by the agency to rehearse for the approval or disapproval of the defendants. Plaintiff had signed the usual contract in the office of her agent but it had not been signed by the defendants. She was to be engaged only if her act met with their approval.

On the afternoon in question, the cafe was not open for business. When plaintiff arrived in San Diego she entered the cafe through the service entrance on the northeast corner and came around the end of the bar which was located to the south of the hallway leading from this entrance. This was her first visit to the cafe. She was met by defendants' manager who introduced himself and inquired if she was one of the new acts. She replied that she was. He laid her costumes on a table in the hall and told her she would be given a dressing room after the rehearsal. She then went into the main cafe room to rehearse with the orchestra. She saw her booking agent and defendants sitting at the bar and she spoke to her agent. The agent did not introduce plaintiff to the defendants. At that particular time defendants and the booking agent were watching the rehearsal on the stage of another act which had been booked by this agent. The plaintiff, upon her entry, saw this act being rehearsed. Nothing was said to her about the character of the stage or its operation. She proceeded to sort her music after which she noticed that the previous act was not on the stage although the orchestra was still playing.

The only means of entrance to the stage, except for the door in the basement, consisted of four steps which went up to the height of the bar with a ramp five feet long and eighteen inches wide extending across the edge of the platform. One end of this ramp was on the bar and the other on the platform. Plaintiff was desirous of ascertaining whether the stage floor was slippery and if her shoes were appropriate. She took a pair of shoes from the several pairs she had brought with her. She testified that she was unable to see the surface of the stage from the cafe floor; that she observed that no one was on the stage at the time; that it appeared to her that the performer had finished his act and that she took it for granted that he had come down the ramp and steps although she did not see him; that she thought the stage was stationary; that the lighting in the cafe was "dim"; that the footlights threw their lights upward to reflect upon the performer; that she walked up the steps, crossed the back bar on the ramp, to test the floor; that the floor looked like some black composition; that she walked straight forward and stepped into the elevator pit and was seriously injured. The stage had been lowered by the performer who had been rehearsing. These facts are not in dispute. The defendants and their witnesses testified that the main lights and the surrounding bracket lights were fully turned on. The trial court found that the premises were "poorly lighted". Plaintiffs' agent testified that she was aware of and had told plaintiff the nature of the stage.

It is contended by defendants that regardless of whether plaintiff did or did not have actual knowledge, the knowledge which the agent had was imputed to her as a matter of law and that the evidence is without contradiction that the agent had full knowledge of the premises, their condition, and the operation of the elevator stage. The negligence charged, and which was found by the court, was that the defendants negligently caused the stage to be lowered to the basement level; that they negligently maintained the premises in a poorly lighted condition and that they failed to warn plaintiff of the danger.

Under the facts related defendants argue, (1) that they were not guilty of any negligence; (2) that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law; and (3) that the doctor bill of one Dr. West was improperly allowed as an item of damage.

Since the briefs were filed in the present action on appeal, defendants duly moved this court for permission "to produce additional evidence" relative to the present physical condition of plaintiff, which evidence they claim relates to her ability to carry on her business as a professional dancer. We will therefore first dispose of this motion before proceeding with the merits of the appeal.

The affidavit of defendant Agnes Mae Ewing recites generally that the cause was tried in March, 1943; that at the trial opinion evidence was introduced to the effect that in all probability the plaintiff would be unable to thereafter engage in her business and profession as a professional theatrical dancer; that she later heard, since the rendition of the judgment, that plaintiff was again dancing professionally. A further supporting affidavit was filed by one Joseph Faber, reciting that he is the manager of the Biltmore Bowl in Los Angeles; that plaintiff, under her professional name, Edith Davis, was "employed and presented her dancing act at said Biltmore Bowl from July 1, 1943, until August 4, 1943"; that she presented a "finished, competent and pleasing performance"; that "she made her regular appearances daily on the program; that the act given by her was in all respects a high-class theatrical performance and that there was nothing whatever about her performance to indicate disability or any interference with her dancing performance". The affidavit, as originally prepared, contained a further clause, i. e.: "Affiant states that several years previous the said Edith Davis had performed at the Biltmore Bowl, that he was familiar with the performance that she then presented and that her performance in 1943 was fully the equal of her prior performance." This latter portion was apparently stricken by the affiant before the affidavit was verified.

In reply to defendants' affidavits plaintiff recites in her affidavit that prior to February 18, 1942, the date of her injury, she was a professional dancer and was able to and did accept engagements and give dancing performances in the better class theaters and places of entertainment; that she was able to give, and on occasion had given, as high as nine performances in one day; that she was able to and did accept and perform engagements extending over periods of a week, a month, or more, and which called for the giving of at least two or three performances per day; that among the routines performed by her were strenuous and intricate dances involving acrobatics; that since February 18, 1942, affiant has been and still is unable to engage in professional dancing in the manner and to the extent which she theretofore had engaged; that the vast majority of places of entertainment presenting professional dancers, including the Biltmore Bowl, present two or more performances a day; that very few places of entertainment present but one performance a day; that the compensation paid to entertainers for, and in places giving, more than one performance per day is proportionately greater than the compensation paid to entertainers for, and in places giving, but one performance per day; that the demand for entertainers giving but one dancing performance per day is less than the demand for entertainers giving two or more performances per day; that since the conclusion of the trial, affiant has been and remains unable to give more than one performance in any one day; that on one occasion affiant accepted and presented a dancing act at the Biltmore Rendezvous (not the Biltmore Bowl); that she was engaged by Mr. Joseph Faber and that the engagement was for a period of four weeks; that it called for, and affiant presented, but one performance per day; that at the conclusion of said engagement and by reason of her physical condition, affiant was forced to rest and to desist from giving any dancing performances for a period thereafter; that the engagement at the Biltmore Rendezvous was the only engagement accepted by her under which she has given any performances extending over a period of time since the conclusion of the trial; that she has only accepted "casual" engagements; that she has been and remains unable to perform many of the dancing routines theretofore performed by her; that she is unable to perform acrobatics and has been forced to omit them from her routines; that she is now able to do only more simple and less strenuous types of dancing; and that the performance of these simpler and less strenuous types of dancing result in acute discomfort and pain to her back but that they are gradually decreasing in acuteness and severity; that affiant's total compensation for engagements which she is now able to accept is much less than the total compensation she could obtain were she able to present more than one performance a day, and that defendants' allegation that she "has largely, if not entirely recovered from the effects of the injuries received by her" is untrue.

[1,2] It is upon this showing that defendants seek permission of this court to take additional testimony under section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

We will first analyze the written findings of the trial court bearing upon this subject. It found special pecuniary damages by way of doctor bills, medical supplies, hospital care, etc., in the sum of $1,453.14. In another item it found that by reason of defendants' negligence plaintiff suffered a fracture of the right wrist, severely injured and fractured the sacrum; that there was a compression fracture of the second dorsal vertebrae, and injuries to her ribs; that her injuries were of such a character as to be and remain "permanent"; and that said injuries "will permanently disable said plaintiff and permanently cause her pain, suffering and disability"; that thereby plaintiff has been damaged in the additional sum of $10,000, exclusive of pecuniary damages, therefrom. It then found, as another item of damage, that for a long time and immediately prior to the receipt of said injuries, said plaintiff was regularly employed as a dancer and entertainer and in receipt of $50 per week for her services as such; that by reason of said injuries suffered, plaintiff "has and will be forever unable to resume the said occupation and will by reason of said injuries be depreciated in her future earning capacity", to plaintiff's additional damage, of a pecuniary nature, in the sum of $5,000.

In this application defendants do not question or offer evidence contesting the allowance of $1453.14 for medical expenses, etc. Their argument is, as we construe it, that the court found plaintiff was permanently and physically disabled from further participating in such work at all and from carrying on her business and profession in any manner. We do not so construe the finding. $10,000 was allowed for her "pain, suffering, and disability" there set forth, which the court found would permanently disable her. The damage for this pain and suffering was in addition to and exclusive of any pecuniary damage by virtue of her loss of earning power. As a part of the additional pecuniary damage suffered, the court found that she had been "regularly employed as a dancer and entertainer", making $50 per week, but that since the receipt of her injuries she "has been and will be forever unable to resume the said occupation and will, by reason of said injuries be depreciated in her future earning capacity". For her depreciated future earnings it allowed $5,000.

From this recitation it seems clear that the trial court realized that plaintiff might be able to pursue, to a limited extent, her usual vocation, but made allowance for the fact that she might not thereby be able to resume regular employment in the manner she had previously enjoyed. A fair interpretation of the allegations of the several affidavits is not opposed to this construction. At least it cannot be said, under the facts related, that if the additional evidence recited in the affidavit were introduced, it would result in a reversal of the judgment rendered. Under the construction given section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure in recent cases and the limitation of the power of appellate courts to hear and determine such issues, we do not feel justified in granting the relief sought. The motion is therefore denied. Tupman v. Haberkern, 208 Cal. 256, 280 P. 970; Clough v. Allen, 115 Cal.App. 330, 1 P.2d 545; *Monson v. [3-6] We will next consider the merits of defendants' appeal. In point one it is contended that plaintiff was never an invitee on the premises but at most a mere licensee and that she was a trespasser immediately prior to the accident when she went upon the steps and ramp without the knowledge of the defendants. The evidence conclusively shows that defendants desired to secure and employ new acts for presentation to their patrons. Defendants, acting through a booking agency, invited plaintiff to appear and demonstrate her act on the date in question. Defendants, their agents and employees, were present. Upon entering the premises plaintiff was greeted by defendants' manager who learned that she had come to demonstrate an act. Her presence was therefore known to defendants. She was there to transact business of common interest and mutual advantage to them and to herself. She was a business invitee and defendants owed her all duties attendant thereon. Koppelman v. Ambassador Hotel Co., 35 Cal.App. 2d 537, 96 P.2d 196; Stewart v. Lido Cafe, 13 Cal.App.2d 46, 56 P.2d 553; Bush v. Weed Lumber Co., 63 Cal.App. 426, 218 P. 618. It has been held that one who enters the premises of another upon the latter's invitation, express or implied, for the purpose of applying for work, is an invitee. Steiskal v. Marshall, Field & Co., 238 Ill. 92, 87 N.E. 117; McDonough v. James Reilly, etc., Co., 45 Misc. 334, 90 N.Y.S. 358; Warner v. Mier Carriage & Buggy Co., 26 Ind.App. 350, 58 N.E. 554, 59 N.E. 873; Shelby's Adm'r v. Cincinnati, etc., Ry. Co., 85 Ky. 224, 3 S.W. 157; Brigman v. Fiske-Carter Const. Co., 192 N.C. 791, 136 S.E. 125, 49 A.L.R. 773; Crane v. Smith Metropolitan Market Co., 23 Cal.2d 288, 144 P.2d 356. Defendants' argument that plaintiff was a trespasser as to that portion of the premises upon which she received her injuries is without merit. It is true, as contended by them, that one may be an invitee to a certain portion of the premises and a licensee or trespasser as to other portions. The evidence fully supports the conclusion that plaintiff was an invitee at the time of her injury. The question as to whether the invitation, express or implied, included that part of the premises where the injury occurred is generally not one of law. On the contrary, it is usually a question of fact for the determination of the court or jury. Dobbie v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 95 Cal.App. 781, 787, 273 P. 630; State Compensation Ins. Fund v. Allen, 104 Cal.App. 400, 407, 285 P.1053; Bush v. Weed Lumber Co., supra. The invitation of a proprietor extends not only to all parts of the premises which the patron expressly is invited to use, but also to such parts as he or she is impliedly invited to enter, and the invitation also extends to those portions of the premises where the invitee, under circumstances and conditions of his invitation, would naturally be likely to go. Stewart v. Lido Cafe, supra. In this case, the plaintiff was expected to be ready for her performance when the previous act was terminated. She was sorting her music for the orchestra so as to be ready for her performance. It was essential that she wear the type of dancing shoes best fitted to the nature of the stage upon which she was to perform. It was likewise essential that she test this surface for such purpose. Having completed the task of arranging her music, she glanced up and noticed that no performer was occupying the stage. It appeared to be an appropriate opportunity for her to test the stage surface. Defendants' orchestra leader testified that he had observed other dancers testing the stage surface preparatory to demonstrating their acts. In so entering upon the steps and over the ramp to test the stage, she was not engaged in an unexpected or unreasonable activity. Under the facts presented the question of the status of plaintiff was one of fact upon which the determination of the trial court is conclusive. Dobbie v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., supra.

[7] In support of the court's finding as to the lighting conditions, the evidence shows that the trial judge visited the premises during the course of the trial and viewed the scene of the accident. He observed the method of operation of the inner stage and the various lighting conditions as explained by the witnesses. This, in itself, was evidence in the case. Ethel D. Co. v. Indiana Acc. Comm., 219 Cal. 699, 704, 28 P.2d 919; Rickards v. Noonan, 40 Cal.App.2d 266, 274, 104 P.2d 839; McManus v. Otis, 61 Cal.App.2d 432, 143 P.2d 380.

Plaintiff testified that the premises were poorly and dimly lighted and that the center chandelier was not turned on; that as she moved near the end of the ramp she looked upon what appeared to her to be, and which she, due to the faulty lighting conditions, mistook to be a dark colored stage surface. It has been held that under certain circumstances failure to have proper or sufficient lighting conditions alone is sufficient to support a finding of negligence. DeGraf v. Anglo Calif. Nat. Bank, 14 Cal.2d 87, 92 P.2d 899; Sheyer v. Lowell, 134 Cal. 357, 66 P. 307; Moore v. Marshall, 41 Cal.App. 2d 490, 107 P.2d 89; Herold v. P. H. Matthews Paint House, 39 Cal.App. 489, 179 P. 414.

[8] As to the lowering of the inner stage and failure to employ proper precautions and warnings, it is true that the evidence does not definitely show by whom the stage was lowered. Apparently, it was lowered by the performers immediately preceding the accident, who had had the operation of the stage explained to them. This was done under defendants' instructions through their manager. Defendants had the right to control the operation of the stage and to see that it was at the proper level so that it would not create an open, unguarded shaft when plaintiff was to be rightfully using it in a manner to be anticipated by defendants. This fact, when considered in conjunction with the fact that there was no guard, chain or other obstacle of any kind placed across the steps or ramp leading to the stage, the poor lighting condition found by the court to exist, and the failure of defendants to warn plaintiff of such condition, which condition was known by them to exist, would, if true, support a finding of negligence on the part of defendants. Goldberger v. Market Street Ry. Co., 130 Cal.App. 597, 603, 20 P.2d 351; Dobbie v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., supra; Blaylock v. Jensen, 44 Cal.App.2d 850, 852, 113 P.2d 256.

[9, 10] The evidence was conflicting as to whether or not plaintiff had personal knowledge of the dangerous condition. She understood and believed the platform to be stationary. It is defendants' theory that since Miss Lening was plaintiff's agent, to a certain extent, and knew it was an elevator stage, her knowledge was imputed to the plaintiff. Miss Lening's uncommunicated knowledge of the nature of the elevator stage, under the facts here presented, cannot affect plaintiff's right of recovery. Dobbie v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., supra. Whether plaintiff acted as a reasonable and prudent person under the circumstances was for the trial court to determine. The entire question of plaintiff's contributory negligence was one of fact and not of law. Colombo v. Axelrad, 45 Cal.App.2d 439, 114 P.2d 425.

The last question considered is novel, and no authority is cited which is directly in point. The evidence discloses that defendant Mrs. Ewing tried to call a certain doctor to attend plaintiff, but being unable to reach him, called a Dr. Denny. He in turn called upon a Dr. West, orthopedic surgeon, for consultation and aid in treating plaintiff. Defendants do not question but that the treatment and care rendered by these doctors were necessitated by plaintiff's injuries and that their respective charges constituted the reasonable value of their services. The amount of Dr. West's charge was $500. His certificate to practice medicine was issued on August 23, 1933. He came to San Diego County to practice medicine in 1941 but his certificate was not registered in the county clerk's office of this county until February 9, 1943, which registration was about one year after the rendition of the doctor's services. It is contended that plaintiff cannot recover for the reasonable value of the services performed by Dr. West because he had not complied with section 2340 of the Business and Professions Code St. 1937, p. 1272. Citing 48 C.J. 1159 and 7 C.J.S., Attorney and Client, § 165, p. 1022.

As to the claim here involved, Dr. West, an admitted specialist in the field of orthopedic surgery, testified that the amount of his charges ($500) made to plaintiff for services performed was reasonable and fair.

The record is silent as to whether plaintiff paid that bill prior to the trial of the action.

The form of the question presented, as set forth in defendants' opening brief, clearly indicates that plaintiff had paid it. The question reads: "Is an injured person entitled to recover money paid for professional services to an unlicensed doctor?" In answering this question we will assume that the bill was paid.

In 128 A.L.R. 686, the right of an injured party to recover the value of services gratuitously rendered is discussed. It was there said that: "In a majority of the cases the position is taken that the services were rendered for the benefit of the injured plaintiff, that the defendant, the wrongdoer, should not be permitted to profit by any gratuity extended to his victim, and that consequently the reasonable value of such services may be recovered."

In the annotations found in 18 A.L.R. 678, and 95 A.L.R. 575, the rule governing the right of an injured plaintiff to recover damages, although plaintiff had received compensation from some other source, is discussed. See also, Brosman v. Sweetser, 127 Ind. 1, 26 N.E. 555 and Wells v. Minneapolis Baseball, etc. Ass'n, 122 Minn. 327, 142 N. W. 706, 46 L.R.A., N.S., 606, Ann.Cas.1914D, 922.

[11] In the present action, in answer to the propounded question, we adopt the reasoning and holding expressed in Miller

v. City of Eldon, 185 Iowa 307, 170 N.W. 377, which was an action against a city for personal injuries where plaintiff had employed a chiropractor and paid her for services rendered in good faith. It was found that the chiropractor was not authorized to practice medicine within the state. The court there concluded, as we must here, that plaintiff, notwithstanding, was entitled to recover the reasonable value of such services. Many cases are cited in support of that conclusion. The award here made properly included the reasonable value of the services performed by the doctor, which amount we assume was paid by or on behalf of the plaintiff.

This disposes of the questions here presented.

The judgment is affirmed.

KNIGHT, Justice.

This is an action for malpractice growing out of the treatment by defendant of the fractured terminal phalanx or end joint of plaintiff's right ring finger. The action was based on allegations to the effect that the defendant did not exercise proper care and skill in ascertaining the true condition of the fracture and in the treatment thereof, and that because of such failure the end joint of the finger became permanently crooked, which greatly interfered with plaintiff's ability to follow her usual employment as a waitress. The main ground upon which plaintiff bases her claim of negligence was that defendant failed to have X-rays taken of the finger. After plaintiff had testified concerning the manner in which the finger had been treated and as to the conversations she claimed took place between herself and the defendant on the several visits she made to his office, the defendant was called as a witness under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and the only other witness produced by plaintiff was her husband, who related one of the conversations had between his wife and the defendant. Plaintiff then rested her case, whereupon defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that plaintiff had produced no expert testimony to show that defendant's treatment of the finger was not in accordance with the usual practice or that the failure to have an X-ray taken in treating an injury of this kind constituted negligence. After hearing the arguments on the motion the court expressed the opinion that in the absence of expert testimony a case of negligence legally sufficient to go to the jury had not been made out, adding that if plaintiff desired to supply such testimony she would be permitted to do so, otherwise the court would have to grant the motion. Counsel for plaintiff replied that he had no expert testimony, whereupon the motion for nonsuit was granted. From the judgment entered thereon plaintiff appeals. We are of the opinion that no ground for reversal has been shown.

The finger was injured on August 30, 1941, while plaintiff was adjusting a folding bed. It was the Saturday before Labor Day, and plaintiff was unable to get in touch with the defendant until the following Tuesday morning, September 2nd. In the meantime, pursuant to advice given by the person answering the defendant's telephone, plaintiff soaked the finger in hot epsom salts. On Monday, the day before she saw the defendant, she went to the Highland Hospital and was told that she was doing all she could for the finger until she saw her doctor. On Tuesday morning she met the defendant at his office, and he diagnosed the injury as a fracture, but her hand was so swollen he could do nothing with it that day, and he told her to continue soaking it until Thursday, and that he believed it would then be possible to put it in splints. Plaintiff testified that during that visit she asked defendant if he did not want an X-ray taken and he replied that it would not be necessary; and that when she went back Thursday the finger was still so swollen and crooked that it could not be manipulated and that while it was in that condition defendant put it in splints. The defendant testified that before placing the finger in splints he put the finger in as full extension as possible; and that for splints he used several applicator sticks bound together with adhesive tape. The defendant changed the splints every few days, and plaintiff testified that on several of those visits to his office she asked him if he did not want to X-ray the finger and he said it was not necessary. Continuing, she testified that after some weeks the finger was still swollen and crooked and that on October 25th, of her own volition, she called on Dr. Stein in Albany and had the finger X-rayed; that the next month she went back to defendant and told him about the X-ray, but did not show it to him. She stated that at that time they discussed an operation but that defendant said it would not do any good to "rush the operation," that later on he would operate if she had an X-ray taken and at that time he believed the operation was advisable. On January 2, 1942, she again called on the defendant. She was accompanied by her husband; and she testified that on that visit they discussed the matter of the operation, but that defendant then told them that before he could operate it would be necessary for him to have another X-ray; and that he gave her the address of the place to have it taken. She had the X-ray taken, and it was sent to defendant. Two days later plaintiff returned to defendant's office and she testified that at that time the defendant told her that according to the X-ray he could not operate on the finger, that he would rather have an orthopedic specialist see it, and he requested her to take the X-ray to a Dr. Barnard. Dr. Barnard did not operate, but put tape on the finger, and later she returned to see the defendant. According to defendant, when she returned to him she had taken off the tape put on by Dr. Barnard because she said it was uncomfortable; whereupon he told her if she was not going to follow the treatment ordered for her there was nothing further he could do for her.

The report accompanying the X-ray taken in January stated that it showed a fracture of the base of the terminal phalanx whose shaft is markedly displaced in the volar direction. In this connection defendant explained that a chip of the bone to which a tendon was attached, had been broken off, and that the tendon had pulled the chip out of position; and that arthritis in the joint had prevented the chip from uniting to the bone. He further testified that if an X-ray had been taken when plaintiff was first injured it would only have confirmed his diagnosis; that it was not necessary to take an X-ray because he knew from the clinical examination that she had fractured the terminal phalanx. Continuing he testified that if an X-ray had been taken at any time up to the first of October "The treatment would have been the same. X-ray is simply a form of diagnosis, it is not a treatment in itself. I knew there was a chip fracture at the base of that phalanx. I knew the finger had to be splinted in full extension, and simply having taken an X-ray would have perhaps added some slight confirmation to what I did but it would not have changed what I did in the slightest, nor would it have changed the eventual result." He also testified that he suspected she had a tendency toward arthritis, and that the X-ray taken in January showed arthritis present, but that even if an X-ray had shown acute arthritis the treatment would not have been any different. He also testified that the treatment given her was such as is generally given by physicians and surgeons of good repute in that community, and that seven out of eight doctors with whom he had discussed the matter said it was not their practice to always demand an X-ray in treating fractures.

[1-5] The general rule, as stated in Engelking v. Carlson, 13 Cal.2d 216, 88 P.2d 695, 697, is as follows: "The law has never held a physician or surgeon liable for every untoward result which may occur in medical practice. It requires only that he shall have the degree of learning and skill ordinarily possessed by physicians of good standing practicing in the same locality and that he shall use ordinary care and diligence in applying that learning and skill to the treatment of his patient. Hesler v. California Hospital Co., 178 Cal. 764, 174 P. 654. Whether he has done so in a particular case is a question for experts and can be established only by their testimony. Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 181 P. 642; Patterson v. Marcus, 203 Cal. 550, 265 P. 222. And when the matter in issue is one within the knowledge of experts only and is not within the common knowledge of laymen, the expert evidence is conclusive. Wm. Simpson C. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 74 Cal.App. 239, 240 P. 58; Johnson v. Clarke, 98 Cal.App. 358, 276 P. 1052. Negligence on the part of a physician or surgeon will not be presumed; it must be affirmatively proved. On the contrary, in the absence of expert evidence, it will be presumed that a physician or surgeon exercised the ordinary care and skill required of him in treating his patient.

Donahoo v. Lovas, 105 Cal.App. 705, 288 P. 698. It is true that in a restricted class of cases the courts have applied the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur in malpractice cases. But it has only been invoked where a layman is able to say as a matter of common knowledge and observation that the consequences of professional treatment were not such as ordinarily would have followed if due care had been exercised."

[6, 7] In the present case the only testimony given upon the subject shows that the injury was correctly diagnosed, and that plaintiff had no expert testimony to offer to show that the doctor had been negligent in his treatment of her finger, or that the failure to take an X-ray in a case of this kind constituted negligence. She contends, however, that "The use of X-ray to determine the location of fractures and the progress of their healing is within the realm of judicial knowledge" and that therefore it was not necessary to produce expert testimony to the effect that the defendant should have taken an X-ray of her finger. The authorities do not support this view. As said in Bickford v. Lawson, 27 Cal.App.2d 416, 81 P.2d 216, 219, where a fractured leg failed to heal properly due to a lack of callus formation, and the plaintiff sought to hold the doctor because he did not take X-rays nor use traction in reducing the fracture: "It may not be said, as a matter of law, that the failure to use an X-ray machine in the reducing of a fractured limb constitutes negligence under all circumstances. The necessity of employing an X-ray apparatus in reducing a fractured limb depends entirely upon the circumstances of the particular case. The question as to whether the reduction and treatment of a fractured limb without the use of an X-ray machine constitutes negligence, depends upon what an ordinarily skilled physician practicing in that vicinity, in the exercise of due care and professional judgment, would be required to do under like circumstances. The determination of those questions depends upon expert testimony. (Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 443, 181 P. 642; Arais v. Kalensnikoff [10 Cal.2d 428], 74 P.2d 1043 [115 A.L.R. 163].)"

The cases cited by plaintiff in support of her contention are not in point. In each instance plaintiff had introduced expert testimony. Furthermore, the factual situation presented in each case is entirely different from that here involved. In Wires v. Little, 27 Cal.App.2d 240, 80 P.2d 1010, 82 P.2d 388, the doctor attempted without success to remove a needle embedded in the plaintiff's finger, without having procured a clear X-ray to determine its position, and as a result of leaving the needle in the finger an infection developed which made it necessary later to amputate the finger. And in that case, it is to be noted that the Supreme Court in denying a petition for hearing expressly withheld approval of that portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal which comprised a "discussion concerning matters of common knowledge which, it is said, a jury may properly consider in an action for malpractice," the discussion referred to being that the jury can consider without expert testimony matters which are within the common knowledge of laymen; that a needle left in a finger will cause an infection, and that a clear X-ray picture would be of assistance to the surgeon in removing it. In each of the other cases, a mistake was made in diagnosis, due either to not taking X-rays or to faulty X-rays. In Rankin v. Mills, 207 Cal. 438, 278 P. 1044, the doctor diagnosed without the aid of X-rays that the plaintiff had a dislocated hip and treated her accordingly, when she had a fracture of the hip bone. In Reynolds v. Struble, 128 Cal.App. 716, 18 P.2d 690, X-rays were taken, but the physician failed to discover the badly fractured shoulder shown by the X-ray, and gave no treatment therefor. In McBride v. Saylin, 6 Cal.2d 134, 56 P.2d 941, the physician failed to take an X-ray of an injured eye, and therefore did not suspect the presence of a foreign body in the eye, which resulted in the loss of the sight in that eye.

[8] No such situation was presented here. The evidence shows without conflict that the doctor did know the nature of plaintiff's injury, and there is no evidence that his treatment would or should have been any different if X-rays had been taken. To the contrary, his own testimony showed that the treatment would not have been any different, and that an X-ray would only have confirmed his diagnosis. Nor is there any showing that his treatment in any way caused the deformation of the finger of which plaintiff now complains. The only medical testimony in the case was given by the defendant, and he testified that the present condition of the finger was caused by arthritis. Even assuming that defendant might have discovered the arthritis sooner if he had taken an X-ray sooner, the failure to do so would constitute a mere error in judgment, not actionable negligence. As said in Bickford v. Lawson, supra: "From a careful reading of the entire record we are convinced that the only omission of which the plaintiff may reasonably complain is a failure to use X-ray pictures after the reducing of the fracture, at an earlier date, with the possibility that the defendant might have thus discovered the lack of callus and that he would then have advised his patient to consult a bone specialist. But the defendant testified that he had no intimation of that lack of callus until the X-ray picture was taken December 20th [two months after the injury]. That omission, if it may be said to have contributed to the injury of the patient, was a mere error in judgment which does not constitute actionable malpractice."

[9] Plaintiff contends that the defendant's own testimony was sufficient to establish negligence on his part; that there is a material variance between the treatment outlined by him as being in accord with good practice, and that actually administered by him as described by plaintiff. However, the record does not show any substantial conflict of testimony in this regard. The defendant described in detail his method of applying splints to the injured finger, stating that "the finger was splinted in as full extension as possible, that is, with the finger sticking out straight"; "with two of these splints applied and tape wrapped around them tightly, the finger must be extended straight out, or as near so as it was humanly possible to get it." He further testified, with reference to his first use of a splint, that "at the time this finger was splinted it was still slightly swollen and inflamed from the crushing force of her injury. The finger was brought up in as full extension as possible, and that is all that anybody can do to reduce that type of fracture." (Italics added.) These statements are not inconsistent with plaintiff's assertion that "the finger was not straightened out when the splint was put on"; that "he did put splints on it and left it crooked the way it was at that time, with the splints on, he didn't straighten it out with the splints on." She herself testified that on that occasion "the finger was so swollen still and so crooked that he could not manipulate the finger even yet," from which statement it is manifest that the attainment of full extension was not then possible.

[10, 11] Finally plaintiff contends that she was entitled to have her case submitted to the jury because of the testimony of herself and her husband that in the course of a conversation between them and defendant some time subsequent to the termination of his services the latter admitted that he should have had an X-ray taken at the beginning of his treatment of her finger. According to her testimony, she said to him, "I have asked you over and over for X-rays," and he replied, "I know you have, Mrs. Lashley, and it is not your fault"; and her husband testified: "He told her to go down to a certain address in Oakland and have an X-ray taken, stating that he should have done it in the beginning, and my wife said, 'Yes, I know, Doctor, I insisted on that to start with.' Dr. Koerber stated, 'Yes,' he said, 'I know it is not your fault, Mrs. Lashley, it is all my own.'"

The general rule is, however, that an admission to be sufficient must be an admission of negligence or lack of the skill ordinarily required for the performance of the work undertaken. Markart v. Zeimer, 67 Cal.App. 363, 227 P. 683. Where the admission does not amount to an admission of negligence, it is held that the doctor is not responsible. Phillips v. Powell, 210 Cal. 39, 290 P. 441, 443. In that case a blade used in making an incision broke and became imbedded in the flesh, and testimony was introduced that the defendant had said, "It is my fault in using that kind of blade in that kind of an operation." The court held: "We are of the opinion that these statements or otherwise did not constitute admissions that the defendants 'did not possess and use that reasonable degree of learning and skill which was ordinarily possessed by the members of their profession in good standing practicing in their vicinity,' which is the only standard by which the liability of the defendants may be determined. See Markart v. Zeimer, 67 Cal.App. 363, 371, 227 P. 683; Hessler v. California Hospital Co., 178 Cal. 764, 174 P. 654; Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 181 P. 642." And even where a doctor admits that he was in error in the treatment administered (Donahoo v. Lovas, 105 Cal.App. 705, 288 P. 698) or that he performed the wrong operation (Markart v. Zeimer, supra), it is held that such admissions are not sufficient to establish liability, where the admissions are not of negligence. As said in the latter case [67 Cal. App. 363, 227 P. 686]: "These admissions, therefore, are not admissions that the operation complained of was not performed with reasonable care, or that the defendants did not possess and use that reasonable degree of learning and skill which was ordinarily possessed by the members of their profession in good standing practicing in their vicinity. As a consequence, while they were competent as evidence of such facts as they admitted, they did not supply the absence of expert testimony in such particulars as expert testimony was otherwise required." Here the alleged admission pertained only to the failure of the defendant to obtain X-rays of the broken finger; and at most, the uncontradicted evidence shows that X-rays would merely have enabled him to obtain more positive evidence of the nature of the injury sustained, in confirmation of facts with which he was already familiar by observation and palpation. They would not have affected his method of treatment in the least; nor is there any evidence to show that the result would have been any different.

Plaintiff in support of her contention cites Scott v. Sciaroni, 66 Cal.App. 577, 226 P. 827, and Walter v. England, 133 Cal. App. 676, 24 P.2d 930. In both of these cases the admissions were of negligence, not of mere mistake, and therefore those cases are not controlling here. In Scott v. Sciaroni, supra, the defendant was reported to have said that he left the radium on too long, that it was his fault that the plaintiff was in her present condition. In distinguishing that case it was said in Donahoo v. Lovas, supra [105 Cal.App. 705, 288 P. 701]: "In that case the physician admitted that the condition of the plaintiff was due to his negligence." In Walter v. England [133 Cal.App. 676, 24 P.2d 934], the defendant stated that he had made a mistake in inserting a hypodermic needle, and it was held: "We are satisfied that, as used by the defendant, the word 'mistake' was synonymous with the word 'negligence.'"

[12] In the foregoing state of the evidence, and under the law as declared by the cases cited, we are of the opinion that the trial court properly held that plaintiff failed to establish a case of negligence legally sufficient to justify the submission thereof to the jury. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

VON GOERLITZ v. TURNER et al.

Civ. 7050.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

1. Licenses ⇨44(2)

The test in determining whether an agreement for the use of real estate is a "license" or a "lease" is whether the contract gives exclusive possession of premises as against all the world, including the owner, in which case it is a lease, or whether it merely confers a privilege to occupy under the owner, in which case it is a license.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Lease" and "License".

2. Mines and minerals ⇨56

Where contract to operate a mine did not give operators exclusive right to the use thereof for any fixed term nor give them any interest in the mine or the ore, the contract was not a "lease" but merely a "license" which was revocable at will of owner.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨1

To create relationship of landlord and tenant by a contract there must be an intention evidenced by the instrument to establish such relationship.

4. Mines and minerals ⇨83

Where operators' right to take ore from mine under contract was merely a license the right to the ore could arise only if and when it had been removed by operators and if removed by another, operators could have no complaint.

5. Mines and minerals ⇨59

Where agreement for operation of a mine was but a license, it was revocable at will of owner, which was accomplished by written notice of termination.

6. Replevin ⇨8(5)

Where agreement for operation of mine was merely a license revocable at will of mine owners and licensees had never been in possession of the mine at any time prior to revocation of license, licensees' action in claim and delivery was not the proper form of action for recovery of ore taken by another licensee under subsequent agreement.

7. Mines and minerals ⇨51(1)

There can be no recovery of ore in specie, or of its value, in an action of trover when it has been taken from land in possession of defendant under claim and color of title asserted in good faith.

8. Pleading ⇨387

The rule that the allegations of complaint and the proof must be in agreement is based on the fundamental proposition that a party must recover if at all according to his pleadings, rather than upon some other cause which may be developed by the proof.

9. Trial ⇨159

Where plaintiff's pleading and proof are not in agreement a material variance is presented and the defendant is entitled to a nonsuit even though the objection might have been obviated by amendment.

10. Appeal and error ⇨1050(3)

Mines and minerals ⇨59

Where agreement for the operation of a mine was merely a license, as distinguished from a lease, and had been terminated by owners, operators could not recover value of ore mined by other operators under later agreement and the contention that evidence varying the terms of first agreement was erroneously admitted was immaterial to disposition of case.

11. Costs ⇨207

A verified cost bill was prima facie evidence that the items therein set forth were necessarily incurred, and by motion attacking cost bill plaintiff assumed burden of showing wherein an item was not properly chargeable.

12. Appeal and error ⇐984(1)

A determination of the items allowable as cost is largely a question for the trial court in its discretion, and where record is devoid of any showing of improper exercise of that discretion such determination will not be disturbed on appeal.

PEEK, Justice.

The plaintiff herein appeals from an order granting defendants' motion for nonsuit, and from a decree quieting defendants' title to the property in controversy.

Plaintiff by his action entitled "Complaint in Claim and Delivery" alleged the conversion by defendants of approximately 200 tons of chrome ore of the value of $4000, and prayed for judgment against defendants for the possession of the ore or the value thereof. The action was originally filed in the County of Siskiyou but was subsequently transferred to the County of Shasta for trial. Defendant Turner filed his answer denying the ownership and right of possession by plaintiff to the ore, alleged title and possession in himself, and filed a cross-complaint to quiet his title to the ore. The answer of the defendant Brown likewise denied ownership in the plaintiff. At the conclusion of the trial the court gave judgment as previously mentioned.

From the facts as disclosed by the record it appears that F. Brown and Dee Thomas were the owners of the Elk Chrome Mine situated in Siskiyou County.

On May 1, 1941, they entered into an agreement with one L. J. Campbell, which agreement is as follows:

"East Fork Chrome Mine
& Red Rock " "
Elk Creek

Buyer
L. J. Campbell

Happy Camp Mining District.

The Undersigned owners of the chrome mine have agreed to let this chrome mine out on Ten per cent 10 per cent royalty payable at the nearest rail road point. To be weighed on public scales.

This mine is to be worked continuous as price prevails until mine is worked out.

Dated May 1st 1941

Dee Thomas
Arnold Thomas

Fred W. Brown (Endorsed)

Witness L. J. Campbell
H. F. Brown "

It is admitted that nothing was done under the May agreement. Thereafter Campbell and a new associate, Karl F. Autenreith, renewed negotiations with the owners, and a second instrument was executed on July 22, 1941, as follows:

" 7-22-41

Happy Camp Mining Dist.

Elk Chrome Mine

Located in elk creek drain

We the parties or miners to operate said chrome mine Less J. Campbell & Karl F. Autenreith will start road as soon as bulldozer can get on property.

We will start operation as soon as road is completed.

Will pay 10% at railroad price. Each car to be paid for at loading point.

This mine will be operated as long as ore can be found and price stays up.

Mine Owners	Operators
Dee Thomas	L. J. Campbell
F. W. Brown	Karl F. Autenreith"

The plaintiff is the assignee of Campbell by an instrument dated September 11, 1941, and the assignee of Autenreith by an instrument dated November 15, 1941.

According to the testimony of the defendant Thomas, the agreement of July 22, 1941, was terminated on or about August 9, 1941, for failure of Campbell and Autenreith to perform any of the terms of that agreement.

Shortly after the termination of said agreement the defendants Brown and Thomas executed a new agreement with the defendant Turner. He immediately took possession of the property, and during the early part of September 1941, commenced movement of the ore from the property and continued so to do until approximately 200 tons had been taken and placed in the U. S. Government stockpile in the City of Yreka.

By virtue of the testimony of plaintiff that he knew the instrument of May 1st had been superseded by the instrument of July 22d we may dismiss the first agreement from further consideration and direct our attention to the second agreement.

In reply to plaintiff's first contention that the agreement of July 22, 1941, was a lease, the respondents maintain that the instrument did not create a leasehold or other interest in the mine but was one of operation only.

[1,2] The test, as this court stated in Shaw v. Caldwell, 16 Cal.App. 1, 115 P. 941, 943, "whether an agreement for the use of real estate is a license or a lease is whether the contract gives exclusive possession of the premises against all the world, including the owner, in which case it is a lease, or whether it merely confers a privilege to occupy under the owner, in which case it is a license, and this is a question of law arising out of the construction of the instrument." It is readily apparent from the wording of the second instrument that it did not create a right in the plaintiff's assignors to the exclusive use of the mine for a fixed term nor did it create an interest in the mine or the ore. Thus, as the trial court found, it "was merely an agreement to operate said mine by said Karl Autenreith or L. J. Campbell, and/or Less Campbell, for and on behalf of F. Brown and Dee Thomas."

[3-5] That there must be an intention evidenced by the instrument to establish the relationship of the landlord and tenant, is likewise well established. Beckett v. City of Paris Dry Goods Co., 14 Cal.2d 633, 96 P.2d 122; 15 Cal.Jur. 615. No such intention can be found in the instrument under consideration. It merely provides for the operation of the mine on shares with provision as regards the compensation of the parties. In effect it is but a contract of employment. Hudepohl v. Liberty Hill Con. Mining & Water Co., 80 Cal. 553, 22

P. 339; 17 Cal.Jur. 431; Michalek v. New Almaden Co., Inc., 42 Cal.App. 736, 184 P. 56. The agreement created no personal interest or right of exclusive possession, either in the mine or the ore, in plaintiff or his assignors. Being merely a license to take ore from the mine, plaintiff's right thereto could arise only if and when it had been removed by him or his assignors. Wheeler v. West, 71 Cal. 126, 11 P. 871. If another removed the ore, plaintiff could have no complaint, as his right of severance and removal was not exclusive "against all the world, including the owner." Shaw v. Caldwell, supra. Inasmuch as the agreement was but a license to operate the mine it was revocable at the will of the defendants (Wheeler v. West, supra), and, as the trial court found, was revoked by a written notice of termination mailed by the defendants Brown and Thomas to plaintiff's assignors on or about August 9, 1941.

[6] Appellant's second contention, that "Claim and Delivery", was a proper form of action for the recovery of the ore, is also untenable. It is true, that under our Code system of pleading, the distinction between forms in civil actions has been abolished; but the distinction between causes of actions, at least for some purposes, still remains, and on essential allegations of a complaint, remains the same as at common law.

By paragraph I of his complaint plaintiff alleged that at all times therein mentioned he was the "owner of and entitled to the possession of that certain personal property * * * described as follows: Two Hundred (200 Tons, * * * of Chrome Ore * * *)." Paragraph II alleged that defendants, without right and without the consent of plaintiff, had taken possession of such personal property and detained it without plaintiff's consent, to his damage in the sum of $4000. Paragraph III contains the customary allegations and prayer relative to fictitious defendants. He then prays for a judgment against defendants for the possession of the property, or, in case delivery cannot be had, for the value thereof, the sum of $4000.

The evidence in support of such allegations conclusively shows that neither plaintiff nor his assignors were ever in possession of the mine, nor had any actual work been done thereon; that the defendant Turner, immediately upon the execution of his agreement with the owners, went into possession of the mine; that he was in possession thereof at and prior to the time the action was filed by plaintiff, and that prior to the time he removed the ore it was in its natural state.

Under such circumstances both the complaint and the evidence in support thereof were fatally defective.

[7] It was essential to plaintiff's case to first establish his title to and possession of the property involved, as "there can be no recovery of wood or ore or hay in specie, or of its value, in an action of trover when it has been taken from land in possession of the defendant under claim and color of title asserted in good faith." Ophir Silver Min. Co. v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 467, 477, 82 P. 70, 74, 3 Ann.Cas. 34D; 17 Cal.Jur. 511, 512.

[8, 9] It is the well-established rule that the allegations of a complaint and the proof thereof must be in agreement. This rule is based upon the fundamental proposition that a party must recover, if at all, according to his pleadings, rather than upon some other or different cause which may have been developed by the proof. When such is the case there is presented a material variance, and the defendant is properly entitled to a nonsuit even though the objection might have been obviated by amendment. Bailey v. Brown, 4 Cal.App. 515, 88 P. 518; Elmore v. Elmore, 114 Cal. 516, 46 P. 458; 9 Cal.Jur. 561; 21 Cal.Jur. 267.

[10] Plaintiff's third charge is directed against what is alleged to have been the erroneous admission of evidence by defendants which plaintiff alleges varied the terms of the agreement of July 21, 1941.

If, as we have concluded, the agreement was not a lease but a license to operate the mine, and therefore revocable at any time, then in view of the facts and circumstances as disclosed by the pleadings and the record, the plaintiff was precluded from maintaining an action for the ore or for its value, and therefore such contention by plaintiff becomes wholly immaterial to a disposition of this case.

Plaintiff's final contention is that the court erred in denying his motion to strike one item from defendant's cost bill. The motion, which was not verified, or supported by affidavits, or other evidence, attacks an item relating to the mileage traveled by one witness, on the ground that it was "not properly chargeable as a cost in said action."

[11, 12] The defendants' verified cost bill was prima facie evidence that the items therein set forth were necessarily incurred. Plaintiff, by his motion, assumed the burden of showing wherein the item was "not properly chargeable" or was otherwise improper for the reasons stated in said motion. Fay v. Fay, 165 Cal. 469, 132 P. 1040. The record discloses no showing whatever was made by plaintiff beyond the filing of his motion with the clerk of the court. The determination of the items allowable as costs is largely a question for the trial court in its discretion, and when the record is devoid of any showing of an improper exercise of such discretion this court will not disturb such determination on appeal. Puppo v. Larosa, 194 Cal. 721, 230 P. 440; Murphy v. F. D. Cornell Co., 110 Cal.App. 452, 294 P. 490.

The judgments and order are affirmed.

MEGEE v. FASULIS.
Civ. 7013.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

June 27, 1944.

Hearing Denied Aug. 24, 1944.

1. Trial $\Rightarrow$ 234(7), 296(7)

In personal injury action, instruction that it was for jury to determine from evidence that if plaintiff fully understood contents of release when he signed it and whether it was fairly made without fraud or misrepresentation or undue influence on part of defendant, and unless jury did so determine, such release would not release defendant from liability if defendants were otherwise liable, was not erroneous as placing upon defendant burden of proving release was obtained without fraud, misrepresentation, or undue influence, especially in view of further instructions on burden of proof.

2. Trial ⇨228(1)

Each instruction need not embody every fact or element essential to sustain or defeat an action and it need not cover the entire case.

3. Trial ⇨295(2)

If instructions as a whole substantially and correctly cover the law applicable to issues, and the law has been fairly and correctly presented, judgment will not be reversed on appeal even though the instruction is otherwise open to criticism.

4. Theaters and shows ⇨6

In action for injuries to one falling while descending stairway in place of amusement, instruction in substance that if jury found plaintiff to be intoxicated then they should determine whether condition contributed to accident, and, if they found it did not, then any evidence of intoxication was immaterial, was proper under the evidence.

5. Appeal and error ⇨882(3)

Defendant cannot complain of an issue which he assisted in placing in evidence.

6. Trial ⇨109

In personal injury action where defendant in opening statement to jury referred to intoxication of plaintiff and intoxication was later alluded to by both parties, defendant made it a part of his defense of contributory negligence.

7. Trial ⇨251(8)

In personal injury action, it was not necessary to specifically plead intoxication of plaintiff as a defense to warrant an instruction on such question, since it was duty of court to give instructions expounding law upon every reasonable theory finding support in evidence.

8. Trial ⇨285

Instruction should be reasonably construed to uphold judgment without straining at overly nice construction, and, on review, the courts will give instructions a fair and reasonable construction with view to ascertaining the meaning which jury must have ascribed thereto.

9. Trial ⇨339(3)

Where jury returned verdict of $5,000 for plaintiff including $1,735.44, special damages, and there was no sufficient evidence as to special damages, and court sent jury back with instructions to bring in one verdict without division as to special or general damages, and jury then returned verdict of one sum of $5,000, court did not err in permitting jury to return a second verdict; there being no ground for new trial. Code Civ.Proc. § 619.

10. Theaters and shows ⇨6

Where plaintiff was on defendant's premises used for amusement devices as an invitee, defendant owed plaintiff duty of ordinary care in keeping stairway to basement in reasonably safe condition so as not to unnecessarily expose plaintiff to danger.

11. Negligence ⇨125

In action for injuries sustained by plaintiff who while descending stairway fell on empty cartridge case, evidence that plaintiff's witness between 7 and 7:30 P.M. on the same day fell on cartridge case was not inadmissible as too remote or speculative because defendant's testimony indicated plaintiff fell between 11 and 12:00 P.M., where plaintiff testified that accident occurred not very long after 5 P.M., since such evidence was sufficient to warrant jury in finding that plaintiff fell before plaintiff's witness fell.

12. Theaters and shows ⇨6

In action for injuries sustained by one falling while descending stairway in place of amusement, whether defendants had permitted discharged empty cartridge case to fall upon floor adjacent to stairway and to be upon stairway, and whether such condition existed at time plaintiff slipped and fell was question for jury under the evidence.

13. Appeal and error ⇨1001(1)Theaters and shows ⇨6

In action for injuries sustained when plaintiff fell while descending stairway in place of amusement, defendant's negligence was for jury, and its verdict will not be disturbed on appeal unless there was an entire lack of evidence, or reasonable inferences to be drawn from evidence to support its conclusion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Warren Steel, Judge.

Action by Robert L. Megee against John Fasulis, individually and as an individual doing business under the name and style of Star Rendezvous, for damages for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Van Dyke & Harris, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Manwell & Manwell, of Marysville, for respondent.

PEEK, Justice.

This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment awarding plaintiff damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by him by reason of defendant's negligence. Upon the return of the verdict by the jury defendant moved for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, which motion was granted. Plaintiff then appealed from such judgment and this court reversed the same with instructions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff in accordance with the verdict of the jury. Megee v. Fasulis, 57 Cal.App.2d 275, 134 P.2d 815. The defendant now appeals from the judgment so entered.

The pertinent facts are that defendant owned and operated the Star Rendezvous, a tavern, together with certain amusement devices, in the city of Marysville. The premises consisted of a bar and dance floor on the street level. Certain other rooms including a lavatory were located in the basement. Access to such rooms on the lower level was had by means of a flight of stairs. Immediately adjacent to the stairway was a contraption consisting of a conical shaped tube into which automatic .22 caliber rifles were discharged at small targets. The large end of the tube, that is, the end into which the rifles were discharged, was very close to the entrance to the stairway. The guns, when fired, automatically discharged the used cartridge cases downward causing them to strike a board and bounce or roll either into the tube or out upon the floor immediately adjacent to the head of the stairway.

The plaintiff, while descending this stairway sometime after 5 o'clock P.M. on January 13, 1940, for the purpose of going to the lavatory, slipped and fell. As a result of the fall he sustained certain injuries. His complaint for damages alleged that the defendant operated and conducted such device and stairway in a careless and negligent manner, allowing and permitting discharged .22 caliber cartridge cases ejected from rifles used in the shooting device to lie scattered upon the floor surrounding such device and also upon the stairway, and that as a result of such negligence plaintiff fell and sustained certain injuries.

Defendant, by his answer, admitted ownership and operation of the premises; that plaintiff was an invitee, and that plaintiff fell on said stairway, but denied any negligence on his part, and alleged contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. As a further affirmative defense defendant alleged that February 9, 1940, plaintiff and defendant compromised and settled their differences, and that in consideration of the sum of $300 paid to plaintiff by defendant the plaintiff executed and delivered to defendant in writing, a full "release of all claims" resulting from his accident.

The plaintiff did not file an affidavit denying the release in accordance with the provisions of section 448 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but chose to rebut the presumption of full payment and satisfaction by attacking the release on the grounds of fraud, misrepresentation and undue influence.

As grounds for a reversal of the judgment defendant contends that (1) prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in the giving of an alleged erroneous instruction concerning the release given by plaintiff to defendant; (2) that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury on the issue of contributory negligence; (3) that prejudicial error was committed at the time the jury returned its verdict, and (4) that further prejudicial error resulted from evidentiary rulings of the court.

[1] In defendant's first contention of error, the following instruction is attacked:

"You are instructed that it is for you to determine, from all the evidence and circumstances of this case, whether the plaintiff fully understood the contents of the release at the time the same was signed by him, and whether the same was fairly made with him, without fraud, misrepresentation or undue influence on the part of the defendants or their agents, and unless you do so determine, you are instructed that such release would not release the defendants from liability, if you further find from the evidence that the defendants are otherwise liable."

A reading of the three instructions given by the court upon the issue of the release, including the one attacked, discloses (1) that the first instruction informed the jury that one of the defenses was that the plaintiff, in consideration of the sum of $300, executed an agreement releasing the defendant of any further liability; (2) that the second instruction informed the jury that if they found from a preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff voluntarily accepted the sum in full settlement and in full knowledge of the significance of his acts, and with full knowledge of the nature and extent of his injuries, then it was their duty to find for defendant, and (3) that the third (the one above quoted) qualified the terms of the second, in effect saying that it was for them to determine first, if the plaintiff fully understood the contents of the release; second, whether such release was entered into by him without fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the defendants or their agents, and third, if the jury so found, then such instrument would release the defendant from all liability. On the other hand, if they did not determine that the release was free from fraud or misrepresentation the instrument would not serve to release the defendant from liability.

The defendant strenuously contends that the quoted instruction "not only misstates the law with respect to the burden of proof but misdirects the jury with respect to its quest", in that the effect of such instruction was to place upon the defendant the burden of proving that the release was obtained without fraud, misrepresentation or undue influence. We do not so understand the instruction.

[2,3] After reading all of the instructions in the light of a fair and reasonable construction without straining at any particular portion of the language, it cannot be said that the jury was not fairly and impartially instructed upon the law relating to the question of the release. By prior instructions the jury was properly informed concerning the assumption by the plaintiff of the burden of proving his case by a preponderance of the evidence. It is not necessary that each instruction embody every fact or element essential to sustain or defeat an action or that it cover the entire case. It is sufficient if the instructions, as a whole, substantially and correctly cover the law applicable to the issues. If, under such construction, the law has been fairly and correctly presented, a judgment will not be reversed on appeal even though the instruction is otherwise open to criticism. Nichols v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 630, 174 P. 319; Henderson v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 150 Cal. 689, 89 P. 976.

It is quite possible that the instruction so attacked by the defendant might have been worded differently so as to have met his objections. However, even framed as it is, it did not, as defendant contends, place the burden of proof upon him to show that the release was obtained without fraud.

[4-6] In regard to the second question raised by defendant it is contended that as his answer merely charged that the plaintiff was negligent in descending the stairway: that his falling and the resultant injury sustained was caused "solely, proximately and entirely by plaintiff's own carelessness and negligence", and that nothing was alleged in such defense relative to the question of intoxication of the plaintiff, that therefore plaintiff's instruction Number 17, which is as follows, was entirely improper:

"You are instructed that it is a question of fact for the decision of the jury, whether or not the plaintiff was intoxicated at the time this accident occurred, and if you should find from the evidence that the plaintiff was intoxicated at said time, then it is a question of fact for your decision whether under all the circumstances surrounding the case, such intoxication constituted negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was negligent then it is a question of fact for your decision whether or not, under all the circumstances, such negligence in any way contributed to the accident or the injuries received."

In amplification of defendant's contention in this regard it is argued that such instruction increased his burden of proof and completely wiped out the defense of contributory negligence unless he assumed and satisfied the burden of also proving intoxication.

Under such instruction the jury could have found that plaintiff was intoxicated and that such condition contributed to the accident, and therefore denied liability, or they could have found that although he was intoxicated, such condition did not contribute to his injuries, or lastly, that though he had consumed intoxicating liquor, he was not intoxicated, and therefore this element was not involved. In other words, such instruction merely informed them that if they found him to be intoxicated, then they should determine whether such condition contributed to the accident, and if they found that it did not, then any evidence of intoxication would be immaterial. Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Paraffine Paint Co., 188 Cal. 184, 204 P. 1076.

Under the evidence as introduced the jury was properly instructed upon the question of the intoxication, if any, of the plaintiff. This element of the case was placed in issue first by counsel for the defendant in his opening statement to the jury, and later was again alluded to by both parties. Defendant cannot complain of an issue which he assisted in placing in evidence. By so doing he made it a part of his defense of contributory negligence. Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 20, 204 P. 393.

[7] It was not necessary to have specifically pleaded intoxication as a defense to have warranted an instruction on such question. It is the duty of the court to "give instructions expounding the law upon every reasonable theory of the case finding support in the evidence." Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 143 P. 743, 746. It cannot be said that the question of the plaintiff's intoxication was not a part of the case as presented to the jury for determination. The evidence introduced was sufficient to raise such question, and it cannot be denied that it was of such force that fair minded men might well have debated its effect upon plaintiff.

[8] Instructions should be reasonably construed to uphold the judgment without straining at overly nice construction, and on review, the courts will give to them a fair and reasonable construction and interpretation with a view to ascertaining the meaning which the jury must have ascribed thereto. Reuter v. Hill, 136 Cal.App. 67, 28 P.2d 390.

The third issue raised by defendant relates to alleged error committed by the trial court at the time the jury returned its verdict.

At the conclusion of the trial the jury retired and shortly thereafter returned, asking that the plaintiff's complaint be read to them. After some discussion they again retired to the jury room, and without objection of counsel took the complaint with them. However, they were admonished by the court that although they might take the complaint and read it over, yet they were to understand that they were not to be wholly governed by what the complaint alleged—that it was only upon the evidence which they heard in the court room that they were to predicate their judgment. Thereafter the jury returned to the court room and informed the court that a verdict had been reached. Upon the reading of the verdict it was disclosed that they had found in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $5000, "divided as follows: $1,735.44 special damages and $3,264.56 general damages."

The special damages granted were for the full sum as prayed in the complaint. Counsel for defendant strenuously argued before the trial court that there was no evidence whatsoever to support the verdict for such damages, while it was contended by plaintiff that the evidence relating to the loss of wages was sufficient. After further discussion the court stated that it felt there was not sufficient evidence to sustain the award as to the special damages, but, as the jury in the first instance had found in favor of the plaintiff in the total sum of $5000, the subsequent division of the $5000 did not appear to the court to vitiate the general finding; however, if any question existed, the jury would be sent back. As a result of the discussion the court sent the jury back with the instruction to retire for further deliberation, and bring in such a verdict as they felt was proper in the case, and if they found for the plaintiff, to bring in one verdict without division as to special or general damage or otherwise; that the verdict was not one which the court could accept under the evidence. Another form of verdict was prepared, and after retiring once more the jury again returned, this time with a verdict of one sum of $5000.

[9] Defendant now contends on appeal that where a jury returns a verdict which does not conform to the evidence, the proper method of correction is not by having the jury rewrite the verdict until it does conform, but by granting a new trial at the request of the injured party: That although the original verdict was without support in so far as the award of special damages was concerned, yet it was none the less the verdict of the jury; that it was prejudicial error for the court to permit the jury, after having been polled, to return a second and different verdict; that the second verdict was a nullity, and that the judgment herein is based upon no verdict at all.

We know of no rule which demands that a case be retried under such circumstances. To do so would be to deny the very purpose and intent of Section 619 of the Code of Civil Procedure, wherein it is provided that when the verdict is announced, if it is informal or insufficient, in not covering the issues submitted, it may be corrected by the jury under the advice of the court, or the jury may be again sent out. In this regard it was held by the Supreme Court in Sparks v. Berntsen, 19 Cal.2d 308, page 313, 121 P.2d 497, at page 500, that "the trial court retains control over such proceedings with power to procure correction of informal or insufficient verdicts until the verdict is recorded and the jury finally discharged." Citing Brown v. Regan, 10 Cal.2d 519, 524, 75 P.2d 1063; Redo y Cia v. First National Bank, 200 Cal. 161, 166, 252 P. 587. It also was held in Pray v. Trower Lumber Co., 101 Cal.App. 482, 281 P. 1036, 1039, that when objections have been raised as regards the uncertainty of a verdict "the court properly should have advised the jury to correct it."

We turn then to the final contention of defendant that the trial court erred in the admission of certain evidence which defendant charges was not confined or limited to the condition of the stairway at the time plaintiff fell.

[10] By his answer defendant admitted that plaintiff was on the premises as an invitee. Under such circumstances the law imposes upon him the duty of ordinary care in keeping the stairway in a reasonably safe condition, so as not to unnecessarily expose patrons to danger. Schmidt v. Bauer, 80 Cal. 565, 22 P. 256, 5 L.R.A. 580; Means v. Southern California Ry. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 P. 1001, 1 Ann.Cas. 206; Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 206, 201 P. 462; Brinkworth v. Sam Seelig Co., 51 Cal.App. 668, 197 P. 427. Stated differently but to the same effect, negligence in the protection of guests from personal injury has been defined to imply a "lack of due care." Adams v. Dow Hotel, 25 Cal. App.2d 51, 76 P.2d 210, 211.

descending the stairway sometime between 7 and 7:30 o'clock P.M. on the same day, he slipped and fell on an empty cartridge case.

It is contended by defendant that Bright's testimony was incompetent, immaterial and irrelevant in that the defendant's testimony that plaintiff fell between the hour of 11 and 12 o'clock, P.M. was the only direct evidence as to the time of plaintiff's fall, and therefore Bright's testimony was too remote, as well as being speculative. Obviously such contention completely ignores the testimony of plaintiff that his fall occurred sometime after 5 o'clock P.M. It is true that plaintiff was not exact as to the time of his fall, but he did testify that he went to the Star Rendezvous "somewhere in the neighborhood of 5:00 o'clock," and that at the time the accident occurred he "hadn't been there very long." It cannot be said that such testimony was not sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the plaintiff fell prior to the time Bright slipped and fell. In fact the jury was as free to reject the testimony of the defendant as it was to accept the testimony of the plaintiff.

[12] Likewise this court cannot say that the jury, as the sole judge of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence, had not a right to conclude from such testimony that the defendant had permitted discharged empty cartridge cases to fall upon the floor adjacent to the stairway and to be upon the stairway, and that such condition existed at the time plaintiff slipped and fell.

[13] A decision upon a question such as is herein presented—the negligence of the defendant—was one solely within the province of the jury and its verdict will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is an entire lack of evidence or reasonable inferences to be drawn from the evidence to support its conclusions. Adams v. Dow Hotel, supra.

Our conclusion in this regard must be the same as in the previous hearing (Megee v. Fasulis, supra), that there is sufficient evidence in the record to sustain the verdict of the jury that the plaintiff's injuries were the proximate result of the negligence of defendant, and that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

The judgment is affirmed.

MILLER et al. v. HALL et al.
Civil 3311.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

July 12, 1944.

Hearing Denied Sept. 5, 1944.

1. Partnership ⇨310

Where value of good will of partnership business exists and it is appropriated by one of former partners for his own use and benefit, he may be required to account to the other partner for his interest in such value.

2. Partnership ⇨310

Where one of two partners in brokerage business suffered a paralytic stroke which permanently incapacitated him from engaging in business, partner who continued the business was under a duty to account for value of good will.

3. Partnership ⇨310

In action for accounting brought by partner who was incapacitated from continuing in business against the partner who continued the business, evidence sustained court's finding that good will of stockbrokerage business was valued at $15,000.

4. Partnership ⇨67

Agreement between two members of partnership who had each insured his life that, upon death of either, amount of insurance on his life should be immediately collected by survivor and paid to widow of deceased partner in full payment of her share, did not apply where partnership was dissolved because one partner sustained a paralytic stroke.

5. Partnership ⇨67

Premiums having been paid on policies insuring lives of partners by the partnership, interest of the partners in the policies constituted a partnership asset.

6. Partnership ⇨344

Where policies insuring first partner's life, on which partnership had paid premiums, had higher cash value than the policies insuring the other partner because first partner was older, court properly divided such assets on dissolution of partnership on basis of present value, the surrender value of the policies, with an adjustment of the difference therein based upon the respective costs, and by allocating to each party the policies on his own life, thus sharing the future obligations and values.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Jacob Weinberger, Judge.

Action by Merrill T. Miller and another against G. Wesley Hall and others, for declaratory relief and for an accounting. From the judgment, defendants C. Wesley Hall and Lucy Hall appeal.

Affirmed.

Hillyer & Hillyer and Gray, Cary, Ames & Driscoll, all of San Diego, for appellants.

Monroe & McInnis, of San Diego, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action for declaratory relief and for an accounting. In September, 1931, Mr. Miller and Mr. Hall entered into a partnership known as Miller, Hall & Co. for the purpose of conducting a brokerage business dealing in stocks, bonds and securities.

On April 11, 1934, they signed a written agreement which recited that the death of either partner would result in financial loss to the survivor, and that each partner had taken out two policies in the New England Life Insurance Company for $20,000 and $10,000, respectively. It was then agreed that all premiums on these four policies should be paid from partnership funds, and that upon the death of either the amount of insurance on his life should be immediately collected by the survivor and paid over to the widow of the deceased partner in full payment for her share of the partnership property and assets, including prospect lists, good will, etc., with one exception which is not material here.

Four such policies of insurance were taken out, two on the life of each partner. One policy on the life of each was made payable to his wife, respectively, while the other policy was made payable to the other partner. This conformed to another provision in the contract which provided that the policies might be made payable "to the widow of the deceased direct", but with the same effect as described. The premiums on all four policies were paid out of the assets of the partnership until its dissolution.

Each of the partners had previously been in the same business. The partnership occupied quarters in San Diego which had theretofore been occupied by a well-known brokerage firm of which Miller had been the manager. The business of the partnership prospered and it enjoyed an excellent reputation and built up a valuable good will. In addition to the list of investors brought into the firm by both partners and thereafter increased, the firm possessed several sets of records showing a complete history of certain bond issues, including one of municipal bonds originally brought into the firm by Miller and one of Canadian bonds built up by the firm, all being cross-indexed and of considerable value to anyone engaged in that business.

On August 8, 1941, Mr. Miller sustained a paralytic stroke, which has permanently incapacitated him from engaging in business. In a few months it became apparent that he could never return to the business and Hall sought a dissolution of the partnership to which Miller agreed. Before the affairs of the partnership were wound up Hall took possession of the quarters occupied by the firm, together with all records and fixtures, and had the lock on the door changed. He sent out a circular to the customers of the firm announcing a change in the name of "our firm" from Miller, Hall & Co. to Wesley Hall & Co., with the same address. This circular referred to one distributed seven years before by Miller, Hall & Co., announced that "our principles and policies haven't changed a bit," and clearly represented that the business of Miller, Hall & Co. was being continued under the new name.

Negotiations over the division of the assets of the firm continued over some months. Cash and securities and certain other things were divided equally between the former partners, but they were unable to reach an agreement with respect to the furniture and fixtures, the good will, including the lists and records, and the life insurance policies.

In this action which followed the court found the value of the furniture and fixtures and ordered the defendant Hall to account to the plaintiffs for one-half thereof. This item is not questioned on this appeal. The court also found that Hall had appropriated to himself the business, records and good will of the partnership and had held himself out as having succeeded to the same, and that he should account therefor as a part of the assets of the partnership. It was found that in view of all the facts and circumstances surrounding the dissolution this good will was of the reasonable value of $15,000, and Hall was ordered to account to the plaintiffs for one-half of that value. It was further found that the contract between the partners made no express provision for the disposition of the four policies of life insurance in case of a dissolution; that it was the intent and purpose of the parties that said policies should be carried for the mutual protection of the partners and their families; that it was not intended that either partner should retain insurance upon the life of the other, but that ultimately the proceeds of said policies should go to the family of each insured, respectively; that said policies are and in equity should be the property in each instance of the partner upon whose life they are written, respectively, and of his wife; and that by reason of the prior payment of the premiums by the partnership there should in equity be an adjustment of the difference in the surrender values of the policies, those upon the life of Miller being at a higher premium rate and having a higher surrender value. Miller was, therefore, ordered to account to Hall for this difference. A judgment was entered in accordance with the findings awarding the plaintiffs $7584.74, after making the other adjustments referred to, decreeing that Hall is the owner of the business formerly conducted by the firm including the furniture, fixtures, records, prospect lists and good will; and that the insurance policies are the property of the parties on whose lives they were issued and their wives, respectively. From this judgment the defendants Hall have appealed.

It is first urged that the court erred in holding that the good will of this business had any value, and in requiring Hall to account to Miller for anything in that regard. It is conceded that under some circumstances the good will of a business may be of a considerable value. But it is argued that upon the dissolution of a partnership each of the partners has a right to continue in the same line of business. It is then argued that in view of that right to compete it must be held, as a matter of law, that upon such a dissolution the good will of the business is valueless and neither partner may be required to account to the other with respect thereto, and that this is true whether or not one of the partners does or can reengage in the same line of business since both have an equal right to do so. Cases from this state are cited in support of the rule that in case of a dissolution each partner has a right to re-engage in the same line of business in the absence of an agreement to the contrary. This rule may be conceded but it is not controlling here. The appellants also cite In re Brown's Will, 242 N.Y. 1, 150 N.E. 581, 44 A.L.R. 510; Von Bremen v. MacMonnies, 200 N.Y. 41, 93 N.E. 186, 32 L.R.A., N.S., 293, 21 Ann.Cas. 423; Hutchinson v. Nay, 187 Mass. 262, 72 N.E. 974, 68 L.R.A. 186, 105 Am.St.Rep. 390; Hutchins v. Page, 204 Mass. 284, 90 N.E. 565, 134 Am.St.Rep. 656; Williams v. Farrand, 88 Mich. 473, 50 N.W. 446, 14 L.R.A. 161; and Dyer v. Shove, 20 R.I. 259, 38 A. 498. All of these recognize the fact that the good will of a business may have a value and that this value may be considerably less if one or all of the former owners are to continue in the same line of business. None of them, however, support the proposition, as a matter of law, that in the case of a dissolution of a partnership the theoretical right of each partner to continue in business will necessarily destroy all value of the good will as an asset of the partnership.

In Moore v. Rawson, 185 Mass. 264, 70 N.E. 64, 66, the question was presented as to whether a retiring partner was entitled to an accounting with respect to his interest in the good will of the business. The court there said:

"While no rule can be laid down by which the good will of a trading partnership in all cases can be ascertained and its value fixed with mathematical precision and accuracy, yet, if it be assumed that a firm has been in existence for a time long enough to establish a business sufficiently permanent in character to include not only its customers, but the incidents of locality, and a distinctive name, these advantages constitute a going business enterprise; and it may then be said that the name and what is done under it go together, and a good will exists which forms an asset of commercial value in a winding up between partners. The fact that such an asset may be difficult of appraisal is no legal reason for denying to the retiring partner an appraisal, if it be proved that he is entitled to it."

In Griffith v. Kirley, 189 Mass. 522, 76 N.E. 201, 202, where a similar question was involved, the court said:

"In the case before us, the defendant, as before stated, has taken exclusive possession of the firm property to which the good will is attached, and is carrying on the business exactly as though he were the purchaser of it. Under these circumstances the court may regard the defendant, so far as respects the good will, as though he had purchased under an order of the court for the sale of the property and good will, and therefore that he should be charged with the value of the good will."

In Hutchins v. Page, 204 Mass. 284, 90 N.E. 565, 566, 134 Am.St.Rep. 656, involving similar circumstances, the court said:

"Neither party had any right to avail himself of the good will of the business, after the termination of the partnership, without paying for it."

In Ruppe v. Utter, 76 Cal.App. 19, 243 P. 715, 717, the court said:

"Good will is property recognized and protected by the law as such, and capable of sale and transfer from one owner to another. It is an asset which may be sold in connection with a business. How far its value might be affected by the competition of the retiring partner is an element, of course, to be taken into consideration in fixing of such value. * * *"

[1] From all of these cases, and many others, it appears to be well recognized that the good will of a business may have a considerable value, that while this value may be seriously affected by the competition of a retiring partner the question of such value is one to be determined in the light of all the facts of a particular case, and that where such a value exists and is appropriated by one of the former partners for his own use and benefit he may be required to account to the other partner for his interest in any such value as may appear under the circumstances.

[2] In the instant case, beyond question, the good will of this business would have had a considerable value had the business been sold to a third party. Regardless of his theoretical right to continue in the same line of business it fully appears that the physical disqualification of Miller effectively eliminated the possibility of any such competition. At the time of the trial Miller had been unable to engage in business for a period of a year and eight months. His physician testified that his condition would never get any better. Under these circumstances, which were properly considered by the court, this good will had an actual value which was appropriated by Hall. In this situation, we are unable to hold, as a matter of law, that Hall was under no duty to account to Miller for the value of this good will.

[3] It is next contended that the evidence does not sustain the value of $15,000 placed thereon by the court. It is argued that most or all of the witnesses testified to the general effect that they would not care to buy this business or allow much of anything for the good will on the basis and understanding that Miller would immediately enter into competition in the same line of business. Not only was this not the situation here but this was merely a matter to be taken into consideration in fixing the value. There was ample evidence that the value of this good will was from $15,000 to $25,000. The court fixed it at $15,000 and ordered Hall to account for one-half of that, or $7500. This was considerably less than the profits drawn by each partner during each of several years preceding the dissolution. There was much evidence of the value of the records and files as a part of the good will and the value fixed by the court is not only supported by the evidence but seems reasonable.

Appellants' final contention is that the court erred in awarding to each partner the insurance policies on his own life with an adjustment of the surrender values. It is argued that as partnership assets all four policies should have been divided equally, that is, that one-half of each of the policies should have been set aside to each of the partners. It is suggested that because of the state of Miller's health the policies on his life may be expected to mature at an earlier date than those on Hall's life, and that Hall should be entitled to any benefit resulting from this.

[4] The contract between the parties regarding this insurance makes no provision for what shall be done in case of a dissolution. It does indicate an intention that neither party should ever collect and retain any proceeds of the insurance on the life of the other. It was designed to apply in the event of an interruption of the partnership business due to the death of one of the partners. Its provisions are inapplicable now since the partnership has been dissolved. Moreover, no one can now collect the insurance money, and the parties have distributed most of the assets of the firm, which the proceeds of the policies were to cover.

[5] The premiums having been paid by the partnership the interests of the parties in these policies at the time of the dissolution constituted a partnership asset. In an accounting between the partners, which is a matter of equity, that asset should be divided in a manner that is fair and equitable to both parties. Neither party then had an insurable interest in the life of the other and it would hardly seem equitable to force the parties to, in practical effect, continue the partnership with respect to this matter after all other elements had been fully settled and adjusted. The policies would lose any value beyond their surrender value if the premiums were not kept up, and the rights of one might be defeated by the failure of the other to pay his share of the premiums. One might desire to drop certain policies while the other wished to drop different policies. Any additional value from now on will be largely the result of subsequent payment of premiums rather than of payments made by the partnership. While the policies have potential values those values are not only dependent upon future conditions but they may be best preserved by continuing conditions which are favorable to keeping them in force.

[6] Under these circumstances, the most equitable way to divide this asset is on the basis of its present value, the surrender value of the policies, with an adjustment of the difference therein based upon the respective costs, and by allocating to each party the policies on his own life, thus sharing the future obligations and values. This is not only a fair division of both the present and future value, but it enables each to preserve and develop the potential value of his own policies free from any possibility of its being destroyed by any act of the other. In this way each receives a like share of the entire existing asset, and in a very real sense there is being returned to each partner that which he contributed to the partnership business. We find no error in the court's award with respect to this insurance.

1. Judgment ☞585(4)

Where a prior declaratory relief action embraced same issues sought to be raised by lessor in action to recover royalties alleged to be due under oil and gas lease and was decided against lessor who was the defendant in that action, judgment in prior action was res judicata, so as to preclude bringing of present action.

Where community oil and gas lease contained provision that a majority of lessors should at all times prevail concerning any matters in connection therewith, and a subsequent agreement was entered into by lessee with consent of majority of lessors including an additional lot in area to be covered by lease in order to obtain permit to drill, a lessor was bound by the subsequent agreement though he did not sign it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Gee Clark, Judge.

Action by Andrew Nielson against Allied Petroleum Corporation to recover royalties alleged to be due under the terms of an oil and gas lease. From an adverse judgment, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

D. A. Boone and James T. Satchell, both of Long Beach, for appellant.

Wahlfred Jacobson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DORAN, Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from an adverse judgment in an action to recover royalties alleged to be due under the terms of an oil and gas lease wherein plaintiff is lessor and defendant is lessee.

The oil well, in connection with which the dispute herein arose, is located in the harbor area of the City of Long Beach, California. Drilling for oil was prohibited in the area in question until June 15, 1937, when by special election it was permitted, subject to certain restrictions. Plaintiff and appellant, with others, executed a community lease which provided by its terms for the payment to the lessors by lessee, respondent herein, of certain royalties in the proportion that the area of each bore to the total area. The lease was dated June 12, 1937. The restrictions contained in the ordinance adopted three days later limited a drill site to one acre or more. Accordingly, two additional land owners were later included. An application by respondent for a permit to drill was refused because the area designated lacked 180 square feet of containing one acre. The respondent, in connection with the refusal, was notified by the Board of Harbor Commissioners that a certain lot owned by one Morrison must be included. This was to prevent the exclusion of the Morrison lot from participation in the benefits of oil production from adjoining land. Thereafter, by the terms of a memorandum dated September 19, 1938, Morrison's lot was included. The last mentioned memorandum was not signed by appellant but was signed by a majority of the signers and lessors of the original lease dated June 12, 1937. A well was drilled; and completed September 8, 1938. Royalties have been paid continuously by respondent according to the terms of the lease in question, as interpreted by respondent.

Plaintiff alleged two causes of action; the first in trespass and the second on the community lease contract. It was contended by plaintiff at the trial, and the contention is renewed on appeal, that the so called second contract, which includes the Morrison lot, can not be made the basis of computing the royalties except as to the lessors who signed the same. As above noted, plaintiff did not sign it. Respondent, to the contrary, contends that appellant is a party to the contract in question. Defendant's answer also set up the defense of estoppel and res judicata.

There is no dispute as to the pertinent facts. The evidence was presented at the trial by a series of stipulations.

The trial court found against plaintiff on all of the issues. The sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and the conclusions of law as well, are attacked on appeal.

[1] There is no merit to the appeal. The evidence supports the findings and there can be no criticism of the court's conclusions as to the law. The record reveals that respondent's defense of res judicata was established beyond question. Without burdening the record with details, it is sufficient to note that respondent sought to, and did, in a former action for declaratory relief, effectively settle the identical dispute that appellant herein has sought to continue in the within action. It is idle to argue to the contrary. The declaratory relief action embraced the same issues and was decided against appellant herein, defendant in that action, on all of said issues. Incidentally, since the entry of the judgment in the action for declaratory relief, entered on March 8, 1940, appellant has accepted the royalties calculated according to said judgment.

[2] In connection with the contention that the so called second contract was not signed by appellant, reference need only be made to certain provisions of the original contract which appellant did in fact sign, viz., the one dated June 12, 1937. There it is provided that: "5. If lessee cannot legally drill on these demised premises alone, after drilling for oil is legally permitted in the Long Beach Industrial District, Lessors, or Lessee, at their respective options, may start legal proceedings within thirty days after such fact is determined by ordinance of said City of Long Beach, to get the right to permit drilling on these demised premises alone. If such right is denied after such litigation, then within ninety days after such final determination by law, Lessee must assemble sufficient area for drilling, when combined with these premises, to comply with the then existing law as to drilling, on the basis of the total royalty and rental for these demised premises as hereinafter provided, or this lease shall terminate at Lessors' option."

And paragraph 41 of said contract reads as follows: "It is understood and agreed that a majority in interest and number of the Lessors hereunder shall at all times prevail concerning any matters in connection herewith, and that Lessee hereunder shall at all times during the term hereof deal with such majority in number and persons owning a majority acreage or square footage hereunder. The decision in writing of such majority, filed with the Lessee, shall be as to all matters in connection herewith, binding upon all the Lessors hereunder." Thus appellant duly and legally empowered such majority of the signers of the community lease to act in behalf of the others. The so called second lease was executed accordingly, by virtue of which appellant is bound thereby. As a matter of fact and as a matter of law, there was but one agreement; to describe a particular phase of the transaction as the "second lease" is misleading.

There are no errors in the record; wherefore the judgment, from which this appeal has been taken, is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George W. Schonfeld, Judge.

Suit by Carol F. Culver against Elmer J. Culver, also known as E. Jack Culver, also known as Jack Culver, also known as E. J. Culver, for divorce. An interlocutory decree awarded plaintiff a divorce and approved a property settlement, wherein defendant was obligated to deliver to plaintiff certain personal property and effects. In contempt proceeding because of defendant's failure to deliver certain effects, defendant was found not guilty on ground that delivery was impossible and directed to pay value thereof in cash. Plaintiff who refused to accept payment was directed to enter a satisfaction of the terms of the interlocutory decree relating to personal property, and order granting counsel fees to plaintiff was vacated and later court denied plaintiff's motion for additional counsel fees to prosecute appeal from above order. From all such orders, plaintiff appeals.

Appeal dismissed. See also 150 P.2d 295.

William Berger, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John J. Goldberg, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

In a suit for divorce plaintiff had an interlocutory decree awarding her a divorce and approving a property settlement wherein defendant was obligated to deliver to plaintiff certain personal property and effects. The decree did not settle the dispute between the parties and sometime later the plaintiff cited defendant for contempt for failure to deliver some of the personal property. Upon the hearing the court found that it was impossible for defendant to make certain deliveries and directed him to pay the value of the articles in cash. It also awarded plaintiff additional counsel fees. The property was appraised and payment was tendered but refused by the plaintiff. The court directed plaintiff to enter a satisfaction of the terms of the interlocutory decree relating to the personal property, and vacated the order relating to counsel fees. Later the court denied plaintiff's motion for additional counsel fees to prosecute her appeals from these orders. The appeal is taken from all these orders.

[1] The respondent has moved for a dismissal of the appeal upon the ground that the record is insufficient. Since the appeal was taken prior to July 1, 1943, the effective date of the new Rules on Appeal, a record prepared in accordance with the statutes and rules then in effect is a prerequisite to a consideration of the appeal. Rule 53(b) of the Rules on Appeal provides that they shall govern the procedure "in all appeals taken on and after their effective date" but that "pending appeals" shall be governed by the statutes and rules theretofore in force "so far as pertains to the preparation and filing of the record on appeal. * * *". Hence, the preparation of the record on the instant appeal is governed by section 953a et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, and such of the old rules of court as were applicable at the time the appeal was taken.

App.2d 61, 132 P.2d 34, which was heard on a motion to dismiss an appeal from an order denying a motion to vacate a judgment, the court said: "The only certificate attached to the record is that of the county clerk, who certifies that the copies in the transcript are true and correct copies of the originals in his office. There is no certificate by the trial judge and nothing to show that the documents appearing in the clerk's transcript were used or considered on the hearing, or that the court's decision was not based upon others which are not in the record. There is, therefore, no record upon which the appeal could be considered or decided. Under these circumstances the motion must be granted. Kwon v. Kwon, 39 Cal.App.2d 232, 102 P.2d 808; Bartholomew v. Cross, 42 Cal.App.2d 28, 108 P.2d 49; Svoboda v. Lambert, 43 Cal. App.2d 378, 110 P.2d 1022."

[3, 4] Here the certificate of the clerk merely recites that the papers appearing in the transcript are true and correct copies of those on file in his office, but there is no certificate of the trial judge attached, and hence no authentication of documents used upon the several hearings. For this reason the appeal from these several orders presents no debatable question. If we might treat the appeal as one on the judgment roll alone, the presumption that the record is complete found in rule 52 of the Rules on Appeal is not applicable because of the exception found in rule 53(b). Affidavits filed on this motion by the trial judge and the court reporter recite that, pursuant to instructions by appellant, the clerk's transcript was not prepared by the court reporter, and that it includes documents not on file in the office of the clerk. From the same source it appears that appellant instructed the court reporter to include in the reporter's transcript "only the testimony of witnesses sworn at the hearings and to exclude all other statements and proceedings."

[5] In Wynecoop v. Superior Court, supra, 17 Cal.2d 658, 111 P.2d 333, the supreme court said: "In an appeal from an order, it is possible to bring up a complete record under the alternative method, Code Civ.Proc. § 953a et seq., only in cases where all of the evidence was documentary or where a transcription of oral evidence may be secured."

[6, 7] There seems to be no case expressly defining the composition of a judgment roll upon an appeal from an order made after final judgment. But if we may accept the definition of section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure it would on this appeal consist of the pleadings, the findings, and the judgment. Here the first order appealed from was one adjudging defendant not guilty of contempt made after hearing of an order to show cause for that purpose; the second directed a satisfaction of the terms of the interlocutory decree and called for payments by defendant in cash in lieu of personal property which the court found it was impossible for defendant to deliver in kind. This order, as well as the third order appealed from, also related to counsel fees requested by the defendant for services rendered on the order to show cause, and to be rendered on appeal from foregoing orders. Manifestly, all these orders were within the court's jurisdiction and discretion, and can be attacked here only upon a showing that they were not supported by competent proof. They cannot be attacked by the aid of any of the documents or testimony upon which the appellant relies. The case is controlled by Borenstein v. Borenstein, 20 Cal. 2d 379, 381, 125 P.2d 465, 466, where the supreme court said: "Inasmuch as the papers relied on by appellant as assertedly disclosing the invalidity of the decrees form no part of the judgment roll, they can not be used on this attack. It will be presumed that appropriate proof was introduced satisfying the trial court of the fact of respondent's residence in the state and county for the necessary period prior to institution of the divorce action and of the continued existence of the marital status at that time. But even if we could go beyond the face of the judgment roll, it would still be necessary for the appellant to bring up a properly authenticated record, either a reporter's transcript or bill of exceptions, showing that the documents relied on by appellant were actually submitted to the court upon the motion to vacate. Sutcliffe v. Sutcliffe, 220 Cal. 398, 401, 31 P.2d 195; Stern & Goodman Inv. Co. v. Danziger, 206 Cal. 456, 458, 274 P. 748."

For these reasons the appeal is dismissed.

1. Divorce ☞183

Where plaintiff, who appealed from order denying her motion to set aside final decree of divorce, relied on matters not appearing on judgment roll, such record was insufficient to support appeal.

2. Divorce ☞184(6)

Since trial court had power and jurisdiction to deny motion to set aside final decree of divorce upon ground of fraud in procuring its entry, question before reviewing court was whether order was supported by competent and substantial evidence.

3. Divorce ☞183

Although by stipulation and order of District Court of Appeal plaintiff's appeals from different orders in same divorce case have been consolidated for hearing, each rested on its own transcript.

4. Appeal and error ☞568, 607(1)

Appeal proceedings under rules 4 and 7 are initiated by service upon respondent and filing with clerk of notice of appellant's election to proceed under such rules and are terminated by certification of trial court that record is correct. Rules on Appeal, rules 4, 7.

5. Divorce ☞183

Where plaintiff who appealed from final divorce decree did not rely upon partial transcript or agreed on settled statement, appeal could be heard only upon judgment roll alone. Rules on Appeal, Rules 4, 6, 7.

6. Divorce ☞183

Where appeal was heard upon judgment roll alone, single question presented was whether, under any state of facts, trial court had jurisdiction to deny plaintiff's motion to vacate final decree of divorce, and since plaintiff did not argue such issue, but merely prayed that order should be reversed because some evidence was offered which would have supported order granting her motion, appeal presented no debatable issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George W. Schonfeld, Judge.

Suit by Carol F. Culver against Elmer J. Culver, also known as E. Jack Culver, also known as Jack Culver, also known as E. J. Culver, for divorce. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to set aside final decree of divorce, plaintiff appeals.

Appeal dismissed.

William Berger, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John J. Goldberg, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

This is a companion case to Culver v. Culver, 150 P.2d 292. The appeal is taken from an order denying plaintiff's motion to set aside the final decree of divorce. The order appealed from was entered July 16, 1943, and the notice of appeal was entered August 14, 1943. The proceedings are accordingly governed by the Rules on Appeal effective July 1, 1943. See Rule 53(b). The respondent has moved to dismiss the appeal upon the grounds that the clerk's transcript was not certified by the trial judge, and that the record does not contain a reporter's transcript, nor a bill of exceptions.

[1, 2] It is clear from what is said in the other opinion upon the authority of Wyncoop v. Superior Court, 17 Cal.2d 657, 111 P.2d 332, and Borenstein v. Borenstein, 20 Cal.2d 379, 125 P.2d 465, that the record is insufficient to support a review of any matters not appearing upon the judgment roll. As the trial court has power and jurisdiction to grant or deny a motion to set aside a final decree of divorce upon the ground of fraud in procuring its entry, the question before the reviewing court is whether the order appealed from is supported by competent and substantial evidence.

[3-5] Though by stipulation and order of this court the two appeals have been consolidated for hearing each rests upon its own transcript, and since the second appeal was taken after the effective date of the new rules, the appellant was entitled to proceed upon a partial transcript (Rule 4) or an agreed statement (Rule 6) or a settled statement (Rule 7). He did not follow any one of these modes. The proceedings under Rules 4 and 7 are initiated by the service upon the respondent and the filing with the clerk of a notice of appellant's election to proceed under such rules and are terminated by the certification of the trial court that the record is correct. The record does not show that any notice required by Rules 6 or 7 was served upon respondent and, upon the hearing of this motion to dismiss the appeal, it appeared by affidavit that such notice was not served. It is not contended that an agreed statement was made under Rule 6.

[6] Hence, the appeal can be heard upon the judgment roll alone and this presents the single question whether, under any state of facts, the trial court has jurisdiction to deny a motion to vacate a final decree of divorce. By consent the appellant was permitted to file one brief to cover both cases. She does not argue this issue, but merely prays that we reverse the order because some evidence was offered which would have supported an order granting her motion. What this evidence is we do not know and cannot consider on this appeal. For these reasons it is apparent that the appeal is frivolous and presents no debatable issue.

The appeal is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. RALPH et al. (two cases).

An indeterminate sentence for certain purposes under a law which fixes no maximum term, prior to action by the authorized board, is in effect a "life sentence".

It was the purpose of the Legislature in enacting the Youth Authority Act that as to youthful offenders within the limits prescribed, the indeterminate sentence law and the Youth Authority Act should be construed and applied to work together as complementary parts of a more enlightened penal system. 4. Infants ⇨69

Commitment to Youth Correction Authority is a "pronouncement of a sentence" for the offense, namely, commitment to the Authority for the term prescribed by law so the fact that literally no sentence has been imposed would not be material in determining right to be committed to Youth Correction Authority. Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Crum, Judge.

Edsel Gray Ralph, Clyde Dempsey Chandler, and Raymond James Cantlon were convicted of robbery in the first degree and their motions to be committed to the Youth Correction Authority were denied, and they appeal.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Prior opinion, 143 P.2d 758.

Frederic H. Vercoe, Public Defender, William B. Neeley and H. R. Thomas, Deputy Public Defenders, and Gladys Towles Root, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and T. G. Negrich, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SCHAUER, Justice.

Each of the three defendants in these consolidated cases pleaded guilty to charges of committing robbery while armed with a deadly weapon. The court thereupon "Upon a statement of facts and by stipulation of counsel" found the crimes to be robbery of the first degree, granted the requests of defendants for leave to file applications for probation, and set a time (later postponed) for hearings upon such applications and for the pronouncement of judgments and sentences. The record shows that defendant Cantlon was then 18 years of age and defendants Ralph and Chandler were each 20. On March 31, 1943, the day to which such hearings were continued, each defendant moved, under the provisions of the Youth Authority Act (Welfare & Institutions Code, §§ 1700-1783, St.1941, pp. 2522-2533), to be certified to the Youth Correction Authority (now known as the Youth Authority) pursuant to the terms of section 1731.5 of the act. The court denied the motions for such certification, as well as the applications for probation, and sentenced each defendant to the state prison for the term prescribed by law. Pen.Code, § 1168. From the judgment and sentence against him each defendant appeals.

The sole contention advanced is that the trial court erred in refusing to commit the defendants to the Youth Authority. We have concluded that a liberal interpretation of the Youth Authority Act, as intended by the Legislature (Welf. & Inst. Code, § 1700), requires that such contention be sustained.

Although section 1731.5 of the act has been amended in certain respects since these defendants were convicted, the amendments are not of such nature as to alter the construction or effect to be given the section on these appeals. Therefore, we are here quoting the section as it now reads, but with insertions indicating the amendments: "After certification to the Governor as provided in this article and until January 1, 1946 [formerly 1944], a court shall commit to the Authority any person convicted of a public offense whom the Authority believes can be materially benefited by the procedure herein provided for, and for whose care and maintenance there exists, in the opinion of the Authority, proper and adequate facilities, and who (a) Is found to be less than 21 [formerly 23] years of age at the time of apprehension. (b) Is not sentenced to death, imprisonment for life, imprisonment for not more than 90 days, or the payment of a fine. (c) [Added in 1944] Is not granted probation."

At the time defendants were convicted the Youth Authority had certified in writing to the Governor that it was prepared to properly discharge its duties and functions. See Welf. & Inst. Code, § 1730. Defendants contend that therefore the court had no alternative but to commit them to the Youth Authority pursuant to the provision of section 1731.5 that a court "shall" so commit all persons falling within the specifications of the section. The state's position, however and its sole contention, is that by the provisions of subdivision (b) of the section defendants are barred from coming within such specifications, for the reason that although the minimum punishment for the crime of which they were convicted—first-degree robbery—is five years' imprisonment in the state prison, the maximum term is not prescribed by statute (see Pen.Code, § 213), and therefore the sentence for the crime is imprisonment for life until such time as a lesser term may be fixed by the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles. See Pen.Code, §§ 3000, 3020.

[1] That this court has held that for certain purposes an indeterminate sentence under a law which fixes no maximum term, prior to action by the authorized board, is in effect a "life sentence," is indisputable. In People v. McNabb (1935), 3 Cal.2d 441, 444, 445, 456, 457, 45 P.2d 334, 335, we said, "The penalty prescribed for robbery in the first degree is 'not less than five years.' Pen.Code, § 213. The maximum therefore is a life sentence, subject to be shortened by the action of the state board of prison terms and paroles, as provided by the provisions of section 1168, Penal Code. Until action is taken by said board fixing a shorter duration of imprisonment than life, it is uniformly held 'that the indeterminate sentence is in legal effect a sentence for the maximum term. It is on this basis that such sentences have been held to be certain and definite and therefore not void for uncertainty.' In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 P. 958, 959, citing many supporting cases. * * * The authorities of this and many sister states which have an indeterminate sentence law similar to ours hold that a statute which prescribes a minimum sentence of not less than five years and with no maximum is in law a life sentence until and unless a court or executive board charged with the duty of fixing prison terms remits a portion of the life term. This question was definitely settled by In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 P. 958, in 1918 and has been the pronounced law of the state since." See, also, People v. Jones (1936), 6 Cal.2d 554, 556, 59 P.2d 89; In re Daniels (1930), 106 Cal.App.

For their side of the controversy defendants point to the line of cases, commencing with People v. Clough (1881), 59 Cal. 438, 441, and including People v. Riley (1884), 65 Cal. 107, 108, 109, 3 P. 413; People v. Fultz (1895), 109 Cal. 258, 259, 260, 41 P. 1040; People v. Logan (1899), 123 Cal. 414, 416, 417, 56 P. 56; People v. Sullivan (1901), 132 Cal. 93, 94, 64 P. 90, and People v. Purio (1920), 49 Cal.App. 685, 687, 194 P. 74, which have established and uninterruptedly held that although section 1070 of the Penal Code provides that a defendant charged with an offense "punishable with death, or with imprisonment in the state prison for life * * * is entitled to twenty * * * peremptory challenges" to jurors, and that "On a trial for any other offense, the defendant is entitled to ten * * * peremptory challenges," nevertheless it is "only in capital cases, or cases in which a life sentence is in terms affixed by the Legislature as the punishment of the crime, that the defendant is entitled to twenty peremptory challenges." People v. Clough (1881), supra. It may be noted that in People v. Purio (1920), supra, in which the trial court's action in allowing defendants accused of robbery (punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one year, Pen.Code, § 213) only ten peremptory challenges was approved on appeal, the further statement is made (at page 687 of 49 Cal. App., at page 76 of 194 P.) that "the recent [in 1917] change in the law providing for an indeterminate sentence has not affected the rule in reference to the number of peremptory challenges."

Defendants urge that the phrase "*punishable with * * * imprisonment * * * for life*" (italics added) as contained in section 1070 of the Penal Code is patently "broader in its inclusive effect" than the phrase "*sentenced to * * * imprisonment for life*" (italics added) which appears in subdivision (b) of section 1731.5 of the Youth Authority Act, and that if it is reasonable to construe the language of the Penal Code section as limiting a defendant to ten peremptory challenges excepting only when the crime of which he is accused carries a minimum punishment of life imprisonment, then the case is manifestly stronger for these defendants who seek commitment to the Youth Authority. That is to say, we cannot consistently hold that the phrase "sentenced to * * * imprisonment for life" is more inclusive than the phrase "punishable with * * * imprisonment * * * for life" when exactly the opposite would appear to be the more reasonable interpretation. And if we indulge that more reasonable interpretation it would seem that a defendant, for the purposes of the Youth Authority Act, could not be held to have been "sentenced to * * * imprisonment for life" unless the sentence prescribed by law carried a minimum or fixed punishment of life imprisonment.

The two lines of decisions hereinabove discussed are obviously conflicting insofar as their analogous application to the question involved in the cases of these appealing defendants is concerned. This, however, does not mean that either line need be overruled in order to dispose of the pending cases. Each line has become established over a long period of years as defining the law in the particular matters to which it respectively relates. The question before us is not one which is necessarily concluded by either of the two series of holdings. It is proper, therefore, in reaching a conclusion, to consider the purpose of the particular statute and certain fundamental rules governing the construction of criminal laws generally.

[2] In the statute itself the Legislature has declared (Welf. & Inst. Code, § 1700) that "The purpose of this [act] is to protect society more effectively by substituting for retributive punishment methods of training and treatment directed toward the correction and rehabilitation of young persons found guilty of public offenses. To this end it is the intent of the Legislature that the [act] be liberally interpreted in conformity with its declared purpose." A similar purpose motivated the adoption of the Indeterminate Sentence Law (Pen. Code, § 1168) under which defendants were sentenced. It apparently is the purpose of the Legislature that, as to youthful offenders within the limits prescribed (whatever they may be), the Indeterminate Sentence Law and the Youth Authority Act shall be construed and applied to work together as complementary parts of a more enlightened penal system. Apropos of the purpose of the Indeterminate Sentence Law (in Re Lee (1918), 177 Cal. 690, 692, 693, 171 P. 958, 959) this court stated, "It is generally recognized by the courts and by modern penologists that the purpose of the indeterminate sentence law, like other modern laws in relation to the administration of the criminal law, is to mitigate the punishment which would otherwise be imposed upon the offender. These laws place emphasis upon the reformation of the offender. They seek to make the punishment fit the criminal rather than the crime. They endeavor to put before the prisoner great incentive to well-doing in order that his will to do well should be strengthened and confirmed by the habit of well-doing. Instead of trying to break the will of the offender and make him submissive, the purpose is to strengthen his will to do right and lessen his temptation to do wrong." From the foregoing discussion and quotations it appears that adoption of the construction of the Youth Authority Act sought by defendants would be consistent with the declared and recognized ideals of both that act and the indeterminate sentence law.

[3] When language which is reasonably susceptible of two constructions is used in a penal law ordinarily that construction which is more favorable to the offender will be adopted. In other words, criminal statutes will not be built up "by judicial grafting upon legislation. * * * [I]t is also true that the defendant is entitled to the benefit of every reasonable doubt, whether it arises out of a question of fact, or as to the true interpretation of words, or the construction of language used in a statute." Ex parte Rosenheim (1890), 83 Cal. 388, 391, 23 P. 372, 373; People v. Sayre (1937), 26 Cal.App.2d Supp. 757, 761, 70 P.2d 546.

[4] We have noted that the motion of each defendant to be committed to the Youth Authority was made prior to the actual imposition of any sentence upon him, and that therefore, strictly speaking none of the defendants had been "sentenced to * * * imprisonment for life" (§ 1731.5, subd. (b) of the act) or to any other term at the time he moved to be so committed. However, we have recently held that commitment to the Authority is "a pronouncement of the sentence for the offense, namely, commitment to the Authority for the term prescribed by law." In re Herrera (1943), 23 Cal.2d 206, 214, 143 P.2d 345,

349. Therefore, in reaching our conclusion herein, we do not rely in any degree upon the fact that literally no sentence had been pronounced against any of the defendants at the time they moved to be committed to the Youth Authority.

[5] Assuming, however, that the sentences had been pronounced at the time defendants moved for certification to the Authority it is still true that in literal actuality these defendants had not been sentenced to life imprisonment. As stated in the persuasive argument of Deputy Public Defender William B. Neeley, "They are sentenced to the term prescribed by law and the legal effect of such a sentence is to place them under the control of the Parole Board for the possible maximum term, to wit, life imprisonment. There has, however, been no sentence to life imprisonment and sentence is an essential element of the exception stated in Section 1732 [and Section 1731.5]." We are not disposed to hold that the fact that the legal effect of the sentences for some purposes is equivalent to that of sentences to life imprisonment, operates to deprive the defendants of a right to which they may be entitled if they have not been "sentenced to * * * imprisonment for life."

There is a cognizable difference between a sentence to imprisonment for "the term prescribed by law" which it is the duty of the authorized board to resolve into a sentence to imprisonment for a term of five years or more, and a sentence to imprisonment for life. The difference is similar to that which has been recognized in a long line of decisions beginning with Ex parte Rosenheim (1890), supra, 83 Cal. 388, 23 P. 372, and including In re Collins (Cal.Sup. 1890), 23 P. 374; People v. Hamberg (1890), 84 Cal. 468, 475, 24 P. 298; Lowrey v. Hogue (1890), 85 Cal. 600, 602, 24 P. 995; People v. Brown (1896), 113 Cal. 35, 36, 45 P. 181; Roberts v. Howells (1900), 22 Utah 389, 62 P. 892; People v. Kerr (1911), 15 Cal.App. 273, 276, 114 P. 584; Reese v. Olsen (1914), 44 Utah 318, 139 P. 941, 942; People v. Pera (1918), 36 Cal.App. 292, 307, 171 P. 1091; People v. Velarde (1920), 45 Cal.App. 520, 530, 188 P. 59; People v. Sayre (1937), supra, 26 Cal.App.2d Supp. 757, 766, 70 P.2d 546.

section 1205 of the Penal Code providing that "A judgment that the defendant pay a fine may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine is satisfied * * *," and held that (page 390 of 83 Cal., page 373 of 23 P.) "section 1205 is inapplicable to cases in which the court has imposed a term of imprisonment and also a fine. [Italics added.] * * * There is nothing in the letter of this statute, we think, which indicates an intention to make it applicable to cases in which the court itself fixes a term of imprisonment absolute, and then imposes a fine. * * * If those who framed and adopted section 1205 had intended it to apply to judgments that the defendant be imprisoned for a certain term fixed by the court, and pay a fine, it would have been easy to have so declared." It may be said with equal verity that if those who framed and adopted the Youth Authority Act had intended that all youths subject to indeterminate sentences for terms without fixed maximums should be excluded from the procedures of the act it would have been easy to have so declared. In the absence of such express legislative exclusion we shall not read it into the statute.

[7] The conclusion that these defendants are entitled to be certified to the Authority obviously does not mean that the Authority must accept them or that they are entitled to remain under it. Those are questions which the administrators of the act must determine, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and unless they are satisfied as to each defendant that he "can be materially benefited" by the procedure and that for his "care and maintenance there exists * * * proper and adequate facilities" (Welf. & Inst. Code, § 1731.5), it will be their duty to return such defendant to the superior court or to take such other action as under the circumstances may be proper, to the end that he shall be committed to the proper penal institution.

The judgments of commitment to the state prison are reversed and the causes are remanded to the trial court, with directions to grant the respective motions of the defendants for certification to the Youth Authority.

1. Judgment ☞5

Where trial court expressly found that part of one of defendant's parcels was in a different water shed from the underground stream in question and not riparian, but reserved for future adjudication the character of the remainder of such parcel, the case was partially undecided and an essential element to support judgment for plaintiffs was lacking.

2. Waters and water courses ☞49, 87

Where litigants own all land bordering on stream, court may not apportion water and award damages for diversion without considering all the lands and determining the riparian or nonriparian character of each parcel.

3. Waters and water courses ☞107(3)

Where court reserved jurisdiction to determine essential issue of whether part of one of defendant's parcels was riparian to underground stream, subsequent refusal to receive additional evidence on the issue to complete the record was an abuse of discretion.

4. Waters and water courses ☞101

If one of defendant's lots and other lot or major portion thereof are both riparian to underground stream, defendant is entitled to make reasonable and beneficial use of diverted water on both areas.

5. Waters and water courses ☞107(3)

Where part at least of defendant's land is riparian to underground stream, damages for excessive diversion from such stream cannot be adjudicated without first determining to what extent the diversion and use of water was wrongful, as affected by extent of defendant's riparian right.

6. Waters and water courses ☞49, 107(3)

In action for apportionment of water rights among riparian owners and damages for diversion from underground stream, trial court was not warranted in cutting defendant's water supply to one-fifth on basis of finding that one-fifth of dependable supply was reasonable for use on one of defendant's lots, where question of defendant's right to apportionment for another lot or part thereof was also in issue and not decided.

7. Waters and water courses ☞107(3)

Allotting 6,000 gallons a day from underground stream to defendant who needed and had been diverting 50,000 gallons a day, out of estimated dependable supply at defendant's diversion point of 30,000 gallons per day, was disproportionately small where 371,520 gallons per day were available to plaintiffs, without adding 73 gallons a minute allowed for six months' pumping.

8. Waters and water courses ☞49, 107(3)

In action for apportionment of water rights among riparian owners and damages for diversion from underground stream, judgment limiting defendant to specified amount per day and in effect allowing plaintiffs all water over that amount irrespective of the available supply, without providing for seasonal fluctuation in quantity available to both parties, was improper.

9. Waters and water courses ☞49

As between riparian owners it is preferable, whenever possible, to decree apportionment of water in terms of percentage or proportion.

10. Waters and water courses ☞42

A riparian owner has no right to any mathematical or specific amount of water of a stream as against other like owners, but only a right in common to take a proportional share.

11. Waters and water courses ☞42

Reasonable amount of water which riparian owner may take from stream may not be determined by mathematical rule but varies with circumstances of each case, and also from year to year and season to season.

12. Waters and water courses ☞49

Apportionment of water rights among riparian owners should be measured in the manner best calculated to a reasonable result, and court may adopt any standard that is reasonable on the facts to secure equality.

13. Waters and water courses ☞49, 107(3)

In action for apportionment of water rights among riparian owners and damages for diversion from underground stream, consideration of greater past commercial use by plaintiffs than by defendant would be immaterial, since the present reasonable beneficial uses, giving consideration to preferential uses, determine apportionment.

14. Waters and water courses ☞49

In apportioning water rights among riparian owners, consideration of comparative acreage was improper in absence of determination of what part of defendant's acreage in particular parcel was riparian, on what part of it the water might rightly be used, what portion was under or susceptible of present cultivation, and what portion was devoted to resort purposes.

15. Waters and water courses ☞49

In apportioning water rights among riparian owners, preference should be given to use for "domestic purposes", which includes consumption for sustenance of human beings, not necessarily excluding occupants of hotels, apartment houses, boarding houses, auto camps or resorts, household conveniences, and care of livestock.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Domestic Purpose".

16. Waters and water courses ☞42

The commercial character of upper riparian proprietor's business in serving guests may be so extensive that a lower riparian whose domestic use, whether or not commercialized, would be prejudiced by business activities of upper riparian so as to require interposition of equity to safeguard his rights, especially where swimming pools, ornamental pools, boating, and the like are part of service to guests.

17. Waters and water courses ☞49

In apportioning water rights among riparian owners, as between domestic and commercial uses, question is whether under all circumstances the use of water by one is reasonable and consistent with corresponding enjoyment of the right by the other.

18. Appeal and error ☞1008(1)

What constitutes reasonable use of water, as basis for apportioning rights among riparian owners, is for the trier of facts in the first instance.

19. Waters and water courses ☞49, 107(3)

In action for apportionment of water rights among riparian owners and damages for diversion from underground stream, judgment should not leave defendant unable to use diverted water upon particular parcel unless or until court should exercise its reserved jurisdiction to determine what portion of that parcel was riparian.

SHENK, Justice.

This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment apportioning certain waters between himself and plaintiffs as riparian owners, awarding damages to plaintiffs for wrongful diversion from an underground stream, and enjoining defendant from using any of the water upon a certain parcel of his property until such time as its riparian character may be determined. The questions argued before this court concern in the main the sufficiency of the relief accorded by the decree.

The plaintiffs and the defendant maintain respective summer resorts on adjoining properties located in the Boggs Mountain district of Lake County. Defendant's land located at the higher elevation, consists of three parcels, Lot One of 17 acres on which the resort is largely located, Parcel Two to the south containing 160 acres designated as Lots 2, 3 and 4, on which his resort is partly located, and Parcel Three to the west, which is not involved in this litigation. Plaintiff's own two northerly contiguous tracts. Tract One consisting of 160 acres known as the Price Ranch, and Tract Two, consisting of about 200 acres, upon which their resort is located.

On the Price Ranch, about 100 feet north of its common boundary with defendant's Lot One, is located a perennial spring known as Prather Spring, which is fed by an underground stream. This underground stream, the trial court found, flows beneath plaintiffs' property and also beneath defendant's Lot One, but the court reserved for future adjudication the question whether it flows beneath defendant's Parcel Two. At Prather Spring the water emerges above the surface of the ground, and a small stream called Big Canyon Creek flows down a well-defined channel through a swale or gulch on a portion of the Price Ranch, and thence northeasterly over plaintiffs' Tract Two to an angle from which it continues southeasterly across that tract. Both of the plaintiffs' tracts of land border on both sides of the creek, and for many years plaintiffs had sufficient water for the purposes of their resort and for the irrigation of about 15 acres of the Price Ranch. For more than 40 years prior to this litigation their resort had been patronized annually by hundreds of guests.

In 1921, at a point near the common boundary, or northerly line of defendant's Lot One, and about 200 feet south of Prather Spring, defendant started to construct, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiffs, a tunnel which extended for some distance into Boggs Mountain and tapped the water supply in the underground stream. By means of this tunnel, which was completed in 1924, the defendant diverted what the trial court found to be "unreasonably large portions of water" and used it exclusively to supply the needs of his resort, both the portion located on Lot One and that located on Parcel Two.

Prior to the time of this diversion defendant's resort had not had a patronage of guests approximating the number which annually visited plaintiffs' resort. But after the diversion, the supply of water in Prather Spring and Big Canyon Creek increasingly diminished from year to year, so that plaintiffs were finally obliged to abandon the cultivation of acreage on the Price Ranch and to discontinue the maintenance of a small dairy and garden on their other tract, and they were also faced with an insufficient supply of water for maintenance of their resort. The result was that the number of transient guests at defendant's resort in subsequent years approximated those at plaintiffs' resort, and this growth, the trial court found, had to a material extent been made possible by defendant's "diversion of the water supply to his whole resort and not alone Lot One (1) to plaintiff's substantial injury."

Plaintiffs first discovered the diversion in 1929, and brought this action in August, 1930, seeking to quiet their title to the waters of the stream, to restrain defendant from diminishing the flow, and for damages and general relief. Issues were joined by answer, cross-complaint and answer to cross-complaint.

A prolonged hearing was had commencing in the year 1933. Extensive tests were conducted for the purpose of determining whether there was any relation between defendant's diversion at the tunnel from the underground stream and the diminishing flow in Prather Spring and Big Canyon Creek, or whether said diminishing flow was due to natural causes resulting from the dry cycle which Lake County and the rest of the state had experienced for some years. Defendant asserted that when water was first struck at the end of the tunnel he had investigated the effect on the Prather Spring and found that the flow had not been affected. Plaintiffs introduced evidence to the contrary indicating that there was a substantial connection between the supply in the tunnel and the supply in the Prather Spring. The result of the tests was not conclusive. Finally, in July, 1936, the trial judge rendered a preliminary opinion wherein he expressed himself as "abundantly satisfied that a substantial and relatively direct connection exists between the two points" of water supply, and declared the case to be "a very proper one for the application of the doctrine of apportionment."

Before the case was concluded the dry cycle was broken by the wet winter of 1937-1938. In August, 1938, the trial judge rendered a second memorandum opinion announcing his views on the matter of apportionment, and his intention to award plaintiffs $2,500 damages. In October, 1938, defendant sought to have the case reopened for the purpose of introducing evidence of the effect of the preceding heavy winter rains on the water sources involved, of requiring continuous pumping tests under court order, of showing the results of the drilling of many new wells upon defendant's property, and for a reference of issues of fact required to be determined as a result of this new evidence to a court expert or to the State Water Commission. In November, 1938, the trial court denied the motion to reopen; in February, 1939, it denied a similar motion to reopen or for an interlocutory judgment; in April, 1939, findings of fact and conclusions of law were made and filed and judgment was rendered in plaintiffs' favor; and in May, 1939, a motion for new trial was denied. Defendant appealed.

One of the main points urged by defendant on the appeal is that of abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in refusing to reopen the case for further and determinative evidence upon disputed issues and issues reserved for future adjudication, and in refusing to grant a new trial. Insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, inconsistencies in the findings and judgment, error in failing to determine whether defendant's Parcel Two is or is not riparian to the underground stream, and improprieties in the type of relief accorded are other grounds urged for reversal.

For present purposes it may be assumed, without determining the issue, that the record contains sufficient evidence to support the findings to the effect that the underground stream is a source of supply both for defendant's diversion at the tunnel and for Prather Spring, and that there is a direct connection between the two so that any taking at the tunnel is reflected in a proportionately diminished flow at the spring and down Big Canyon Creek.

In addition to the foregoing, the record shows and the court found and concluded:

1. That plaintiffs' lands are traversed by the underground stream; that defendant's Lot One is riparian to it, but that the question whether defendant's Parcel Two is also riparian is reserved for future adjudication. More specifically the court found that all water diverted by defendant prior to the commencement of this action in excess of the amount apportioned to him, as hereinafter set forth, was in excess of the amount required for reasonable and beneficial use on Lot One; and that "the evidence is insufficient to enable the court to specifically determine whether or not any part of Parcel Two * * * is riparian to the said underground stream, and therefore jurisdiction is hereby reserved for future determination and adjudication by the court as to whether there are any other underground stream or streams or sources of water supply on said Lot One (1) other than stated in these findings. The court reserves jurisdiction to adjudge and determine the quantity of water said defendant may be entitled to divert from said underground stream on Parcel Two."

2. That plaintiffs have a much greater need for irrigation for agricultural purposes based upon acreage and considerations of past and possible future use than defendant; that there is no substantial agricultural use on defendant's Lot One. That nevertheless defendant, by means of his tunnel and pumping system, diverted "an unreasonably large portion" of the flow of the underground stream, amounting in some instances to approximately 50,000 gallons of water a day. That the more recent growth of defendant's resort has been made possible by his diversion of the water supply "to his whole resort and not alone Lot One (1) to plaintiff's substantial injury."

3. That the water diverted by defendant was used upon all of his property, "including portions of said Parcel Two * * * not situated within the same watershed as Parcel One (1) and the Prather Spring but being situated in Kelsey Creek watershed; that said defendant so diverted waters from said tunnel for use upon lands which are not riparian to said stream." That defendant diverted more water than could be applied to a beneficial use on Lot One, "substantial portions thereof having been diverted to and used upon lands not in the watershed of the said underground stream."

4. That the amount of water required by plaintiffs "for natural and domestic use" and the use of the resort is a flow of 258 gallons per minute; and the reasonable quantity required by plaintiffs for irrigation of 15 acres of the Price Ranch "is not less than two acre feet per acre per annum"; that prior to defendant's diversion this amount of supply was, under normal conditions, available to plaintiffs, but since the diversion there has not been enough water to supply plaintiffs' reasonable and actual needs.

5. That the tunnel is not the sole source of defendant's water supply as defendant has, since the filing of this action, developed a supply from wells situated on his land, but not on Lot One and not within the watershed of Big Canyon Creek. That "the quantity of water reasonably required and which can be applied to a beneficial use" on Lot One by defendant is "one-fifth ($\frac{1}{5}$) of the dependable supply at Hoberg tunnel without change of the physical condition of the tunnel or the present method of making such diversion, or its capacity, which, until further order of the court, is fixed at six thousand (6000) gallons per day pumped by the said defendant at the rate of sixteen (16) gallons per minute."

6. That as against defendant, plaintiffs are entitled to use all of the water flowing into Prather Spring and Big Canyon Creek except the quantity so apportioned to defendant, being the amount he requires for a reasonable or beneficial use on Lot One, "and such waters, if any as the Court may hereafter determine the said defendant may divert [for] Parcel Two"; that the water which defendant "is entitled to is equal to one-fifth ($\frac{1}{5}$) of the dependable daily supply" at the tunnel "pumped at the time and manner hereinbefore fixed."

7. That "by reason of the acts of the said defendant, the said plaintiff has been and is damaged in the sum" of $2,500.

8. That defendant's Lot One is riparian; that defendant "has no right to divert water from the said underground stream described in the findings, except as apportioned to the said defendant for use on said Lot One (1) mentioned in the findings and this judgment, and upon such portions of Parcel Two (2) mentioned in the findings as may hereafter be determined to be riparian."

[1] By comparing the findings described in Item 1 with those described in Item 3 and the provision of the judgment mentioned in Item 8, it is seen that although the trial court more than once specifically reserved for future adjudication the question whether defendant's Parcel Two is riparian to the underground stream (Item 1), yet it also more than once expressly declared that portions of Parcel Two were not situated within the same watershed as Parcel One and Prather Spring, but were situated in Kelsey Creek watershed, and that part of the water diverted was being used upon said lands "which are not riparian to said stream" (Item 3). By thus expressly finding that part of Parcel Two is in a different watershed and not riparian, and leaving the question open as to the character of the remainder of that parcel the case is left in part undecided and thus one of the essential foundation elements to support the judgment is lacking.

Plaintiffs argue that the burden was upon defendant to show that Parcel Two or some part thereof is riparian and, having failed to sustain this burden, he was benefited and not injured by the court's reservation of jurisdiction, for if the court had made any determination on the evidence, it would have been, necessarily, that the land was nonriparian.

[2,3] Whether under the pleadings in this case the burden was upon the defendant to prove that Parcel Two or some part thereof is riparian need not be decided for the reason that the defendant offered to assume that burden and was denied the right to sustain it. Furthermore, the defendant received no benefit from the reservation of jurisdiction. In fact he sought to avoid it by his successive motions to reopen the case and for an interlocutory judgment. He asserts that if he had been permitted to introduce additional evidence establishing at least a portion of Parcel Two as riparian, he would have been entitled not only to a greater apportionment of water, but also to a reduction in the damages, if any, to be awarded. In a case such as this, where the parties litigant own all of the land bordering on the stream, there being no other riparian owners, a trial court may not properly make an apportionment of water and award of damages without taking all of the lands into consideration and determining the riparian or nonriparian character of each parcel. The hiatus in the evidence may well have been anticipated by the defendant when he offered to produce additional evidence to supply any deficiencies or uncertainties in the proof. To reserve jurisdiction to determine an issue so essential to a just and equitable determination of the case was in effect to fail to decide the case in a very substantial respect. Then to refuse to receive additional evidence to complete the record on this material issue amounted to an abuse of discretion. In other words, until the court had determined what part of defendant's land is riparian to the water supply, no proper basis was established for determining either the portion of the water to which defendant is entitled, the land upon which the water may rightfully be used, or the damage, if any, caused by defendant's wrongful use.

[4,5] The findings do not show the precise basis for the award of damages to plaintiff in the sum of $2,500. The judgment appears to rest upon the general finding of damage "by reason of the acts of said defendant." Just what those acts were is uncertain. If they consisted in taking the water diverted at the tunnel out of the watershed and using it upon the nonriparian portion of Parcel Two located in a different watershed, actionable damage would result. If, however, they included the use by defendant of the diverted water upon portions of Parcel Two which are riparian, then the remedy as to the riparian use is not in damages but for apportionment. The uncertainty in the findings on this point emphasizes the error of the trial court in failing to fix the character of Parcel Two. If Lot One and Parcel Two or a major portion of the latter parcel are both riparian, then defendant is entitled to make reasonable and beneficial use of the diverted water on both areas. The extent of his riparian right necessarily affects directly the amount of damages, if any, to which the plaintiffs may be entitled. It is impossible to adjudicate the amount of damage without first determining to what extent the diversion and use of the water was wrongful.

[6] A like problem arises with reference to the issue of apportionment. The court found that all water diverted by defendant prior to the filing of this action in excess of the amount apportioned was in excess of the amount required for reasonable and beneficial use on Lot One; that other sources of water supply were available on portions of Parcel Two located without the watershed; and that the quantity reasonably required for beneficial use on Lot One was one-fifth of the dependable supply at the tunnel. But if Parcel Two or any part of it is riparian, the apportionment should include the amount of water reasonably required for beneficial use on so much of that parcel as is riparian. The trial court was not warranted in cutting defendant's supply to one-fifth, thus endangering the life of his resort unless other water sources could be developed, when there was also placed in issue the question whether defendant was entitled to an apportionment for Parcel Two, or some part of it.

The trial court described the apportionment to defendant as "one fifth ($\frac{1}{5}$) of the dependable supply at Hoberg tunnel without change of the physical condition of the tunnel or the present method of making such diversion, or its capacity, which, until further order of the court, is fixed at six thousand (6000) gallons per day pumped by the said defendant at the rate of sixteen (16) gallons per minute."

It is to be noted that 6,000 gallons per day would be $4\frac{1}{6}$ gallons per minute for a twenty-four hour day, whereas 16 gallons per minute would be 23,040 gallons for such a day. What is meant, we assume, is that defendant could pump daily at the rate of 16 gallons per minute until 6,000 gallons had been taken.

[7] Defendant's unreasonable diversion at the tunnel, and hence impliedly his need, was found to have approximated 50,000 gallons a day, or $34\frac{1}{18}$ gallons per minute. Assuming, as the trial court found, that the entire water supply from Prather Spring and Big Canyon Creek was sufficient, prior to any diversion at the tunnel, to meet plaintiffs' requirement of an estimated 258 gallons per minute or 371,520 gallons a day, plus two acre feet per acre per annum to irrigate 15 acres of the Price Ranch, which according to counsel's computation is the equivalent of 73 gallons per minute for six months' continuous pumping, it is seen how disproportionately small is the allotment to defendant of but 6,000 gallons a day. While that is one-fifth of the estimated dependable supply at the tunnel of 30,000 gallons per day, it is less than one-sixtieth of the supply normally available to the plaintiffs of 371,520 gallons per day, without adding the estimated 73 gallons per minute allowed for six months' pumping for the Price Ranch. Under this calculation it is difficult to see how defendant's diversion of approximately 50,000 gallons per day could have appreciably affected the supply of water to plaintiffs' damage.

[8-12] Then, too, the judgment fails to make provision for seasonal fluctuation in the quantity of water available to both parties. By limiting defendant to 6,000 gallons a day it in effect allows plaintiffs all of the water over that amount irrespective of the available supply. As between riparian owners it is preferable, whenever possible, to have an apportionment decreed in terms of a percentage or proportional allotment. The reason is obvious. A riparian owner has no right to any mathematical or specific amount of the water of a stream as against other like owners. He has only a right in common with the owners to take a proportional share from the stream—a correlative right which he shares reciprocally with the other riparian owners. No mathematical rule has been formulated to determine such a right, for what is a reasonable amount varies not only with the circumstances of each case but also varies from year to year and season to season.

Pabst v. Finmand, 190 Cal. 124, 211 P. 11; 25 Cal.Jur. pp. 1135-1146, and cases cited. Although problems of measurement and pumping engendered by reason of the underground character of the flow may have impelled the specific allotment in this case, it may be possible upon the retrial to decree an apportionment in a proportional or some other more equitable form. The apportionment should be measured in the "manner best calculated to a reasonable result," and the court may adopt any standard of measurement "that is reasonable on the facts to secure equality." Wiel on Water Rights, 3d Ed., p. 820, § 751.

In another respect the findings and judgment are uncertain in specifying the basis of the apportionment. The trial judge expressed the view that in an apportionment between riparian owners a "natural" as distinguished from an "artificial" use was entitled to preference; that a use for resort purposes was an artificial commercial use contributing to the land owner's profit in a business enterprise, a use not within the purview of a "natural use" by a riparian owner arising out of the necessities of life on the riparian land, such as a household and drinking use and the watering of stock, and that here, so far as any purely domestic need or natural use is concerned, the issue may be eliminated as each party has a sufficient water supply for such purpose distinct from the supply in controversy.

In the findings, however, the court declared, apparently as the basis for the apportionment, that there is no substantial agricultural use for any of the water on defendant's Lot One of 17 acres; that "the plaintiffs have a much greater need for irrigation for agricultural purposes based upon acreage and considerations of past and possible future use than the said defendant; that the resort * * * of plaintiffs has for a long time been larger than defendant's, and from the standpoint of existing permanent improvements as well as area of riparian land to be capable of greater expansion and under a heavier necessity for the use of the said water supply from the said underground stream supplying the said Hoberg tunnel and Prather Spring, than defendant herein; that only recently has the number even of transient guests at defendant's resort approximated those at plaintiffs', and the more recent growth of the said defendant's resort has, to a material extent been made possible by the defendant's diversion of the water supply to his whole resort and not alone Lot One (1) to plaintiff's substantial injury."

[13] The consideration of the element of a greater past commercial use by plaintiffs than by defendant would seem to be immaterial, for it is the present reasonable beneficial uses to which the water may properly be put by the riparian owners, consideration being given of course to preferential uses, that determines an apportionment.

[14] So far as acreage is concerned, plaintiffs possess 200 acres in Tract Two, upon which their resort and former garden and dairy are located, and 160 acres in Tract One or the Price Ranch, only 15 acres of which were formerly cultivated, or 360 acres in all. Defendant's Lot One contains 17 acres, uncultivated, and Parcel Two contains 160 acres, or a total of 177 acres involved in this controversy. Assuming that in reaching a basis for computation of its apportionment the trial court compared the respective acreage which it considered to be entitled to preferential agricultural use, and then the water requirements of the respective competing resorts, which are now of about equal size, it would appear that the acreage was not properly considered as an element in the absence of a determination as to what part of defendant's acreage in Parcel Two is riparian, upon what part of it the water might rightly be used, what portion is under or susceptible of present cultivation, and what portion is devoted to resort purposes.

The question to what extent the use of water by paying guests residing on riparian land is a domestic use, sometimes called a natural use, as distinguished from a commercial use, often referred to as an artificial use, is one on which no authority directly in point is cited. The distinction between so-called natural and artificial uses of water and the elements to be considered in making an apportionment are discussed in Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 406-409, 4 P. 919, 10 P. 674; Charnock v. Higuerra, 111 Cal. 473, 478-481, 44 P. 171, 32 L.R.A. 190, 52 Am.St.Rep. 195; 25 Cal.Jur., pp. 1116-1119, 1139-1146; 1 Wiel on Water Rights, 3d Ed., pp. 795-831; and Kinney on Irrigation and Water Rights, 2d Ed., pp. 831 et seq.

[15-18] Without question the authorities approve the use of water for domestic purposes as first entitled to preference. That use includes consumption for the sustenance of human beings, for household conveniences, and for the care of livestock. The fact that human beings are occupants of hotels, apartment houses, boarding houses, auto camps, or resorts such as those conducted by the parties to this action does not necessarily exclude them from the preferential class. Frederick v. Bognor Water Co., 78 L.J. Ch. 40; 21 Mews' Digest of English Case Law, p. 738. But it may well be that the commercial character of the proprietor's business in serving his guests may be so extensive that a lower riparian whose domestic use, whether or not commercialized, would be prejudiced by the business activities of the upper riparian and to such an extent as to require the interposition of a court of equity to safeguard his rights. This would especially be true where swimming pools, ornamental pools, boating, and the like are furnished as a part of the service to the guests (see Wiel, supra, pp. 803-807), which uses, in themselves, have been held to be not domestic. Bernard Castle Urban Council v. Wilson, 71 L.J. Ch. 825, 21 Mews' Digest of English Case Law, p. 742. The question is whether under all the circumstances of the case the use of water by the one is reasonable and consistent with the corresponding enjoyment of the right by the other. Dumont v. Kellogg, 1874, 2 Mich. 420, 18 Am.Rep. 102. What constitutes reasonable use is, in the first instance, a question for the trier of facts.

[19] It will be noted that here the judgment places defendant in the position of being unable to use the diverted water upon Parcel Two unless or until the court exercises its reserved jurisdiction to determine what portion, if any, of that parcel is riparian. If any portion of Parcel Two is riparian defendant should not be restrained from using the water upon it or be required to suspend operations thereon.

Complaint is made of other provisions of the judgment, such as that which permits plaintiffs to develop a further water supply by pumping on condition that they deliver 6,000 gallons a day to defendant, but restrains defendant from augmenting his sources of supply by any pumping whatsoever upon Parcel One. As the questioned provisions will probably not be incorporated in a judgment to be entered on a retrial, they need not be here discussed.

The judgment is reversed.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Samuel R. Blake, Judge.

Action by Culver E. Thomson against John R. Bayless and others for damages resulting from an automobile accident. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Prior opinion 144 P.2d 86.

Reginald I. Bauder, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Arthur C. Miller and Lee A. Solomon, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

Plaintiff was injured when the automobile in which he was riding ran into a parked truck and trailer in charge of the defendant Bayless and owned by his employers, the defendants Johnson. Defendants appeal from a judgment upon a jury verdict in favor of plaintiff.

Bayless was proceeding from Los Angeles to Richmond, California, driving the truck and trailer. Before the accident he had made approximately 100 round trips over this route and was familiar with the road where the accident occurred. It was his custom on the trip north to stop for a nap beyond San Fernando. At about 10:00 p. m. on the night of the accident, he stopped the truck and trailer about five miles north of San Fernando and about 600 feet south of an intersection, parking on San Fernando Road within 12 inches of the curb in the right northbound lane. This is a four-lane highway, marked by white lines, with a double line in the center. The outside right lane is 14 feet eight inches wide; the inner lanes are ten feet four inches wide, and the outside left lane is 19 feet wide. There was a clearance of 16 or 17 feet between the truck and the center line. There is a curb on the right edge eight inches high, and adjacent thereto is a railroad right of way. On the left side of the highway there is a gravel shoulder ten feet wide and no curb. For several thousand feet south of the point of the accident the highway is straight. Bayless testified that after he parked the truck he checked the equipment and found that both the clearance lights and the tail lights were burning, and there is testimony that they were still burning after the accident.

The automobile in which plaintiff was riding as a guest was traveling north on San Fernando Road in the "extreme righthand lane" at a speed of about 35 miles an hour. Plaintiff testified that traffic on the highway was not heavy but that as the automobile approached the point of the accident another car with "unusually bright lights" passed, traveling in the opposite direction. After the car passed, plaintiff observed the parked truck about 40 feet ahead. At the same instant the automobile in which he was riding swerved to the left, but nevertheless the right side thereof hit the left rear portion of the parked truck and trailer. Prior to the accident, plaintiff did not observe any lights or reflectors on the truck and trailer, but after the accident he noticed clearance lights on the left side of the truck, but did not look to see if the tail lights were burning. He testified that the lights on the automobile were strong and should have disclosed an object as large as the truck at a distance of 200 feet.

Defendants contend that as a matter of law they were not guilty of negligence and that the negligence of the driver of the automobile was the sole proximate cause of the accident.

[1] Accepting defendants' assertion that the parked truck and trailer were appropriately lighted, that they were parked within 18 inches of the curb on the right of the highway (Vehicle Code, § 588, St. 1939, p. 1504), and that there was more than 20 feet of unobstructed paved highway to the left (Vehicle Code, § 583, St. 1941, p. 2724), the question of defendants' negligence depends upon whether the evidence is sufficient to show that the truck and trailer were improperly parked in violation of section 582 of the Vehicle Code, St. 1935, p. 190, which provides: "Upon any highway outside of a business or residence district no person shall stop, park or leave standing any vehicle, whether attended or unattended, upon the paved or improved or main traveled portion of the highway when it is practicable to stop, park or so leave such vehicle off such part or portion of said highway." A violation of this section, designed to protect persons traveling on the highway, constitutes negligence by the operator of the vehicle. See Inai v. Ede, 42 Cal.App. 2d 521, 523, 109 P.2d 400; Thompson v. Steveson, 52 Cal.App.2d 250, 253, 126 P. 2d 127; cf. Fennessey v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 20 Cal.2d 141, 124 P.2d 51. The evidence shows that the truck and trailer were parked "outside of a business or residence district * * * upon the paved or improved or main traveled portion of the highway" within the meaning of section 582, and defendants do not dispute this fact. It follows, therefore, insofar as defendants' negligence is concerned, the only question to be determined is whether or not it was "practicable" for Bayless to park off the highway.

[2] Although it may be inconsistent with general rules of statutory construction (see Thompson v. San Francisco Gas, etc., Co., 20 Cal.App. 142, 145, 128 P. 347; 130 A.L.R. 440, 441, 475; cf. 23 Cal.Jur. 665-667; 21 Cal.Jur. 60), the courts in this state have uniformly held for the past 12 years that a prima facie case of negligence is established under section 582 by proof that the vehicle was left on the paved portion of the highway outside of a business or residential district and that the burden to show that it was not practicable to drive off the main traveled portion of the highway rests upon the operator of such vehicle. See Callison v. Dondero, 51 Cal.App.2d 403, 408, 124 P.2d 852; Woods v. Walker, 51 Cal.App.2d 307, 310, 124 P.2d 844; Hunton v. California Portland Cement Co., 50 Cal.App.2d 684, 695, 696, 123 P.2d 947; Scoville v. Keglör, 27 Cal.App.2d 17, 32, 33, 80 P.2d 162; Breaux v. Soares, 18 Cal.App.2d 489, 493, 494, 64 P.2d 146; Casey v. Gritsch, 1 Cal.App.2d 206, 212, 36 P.2d 696; Smarda v. Fruit Growers' Supply Co., 1 Cal.App.2d 265, 272, 36 P.2d 701; Silvey v. Harm, 120 Cal.App. 561, 576, 8 P.2d 570. Defendants have conceded that the burden of proof with respect to this issue is upon them. They contend, however, that they have sustained this burden and that the evidence shows conclusively that it was not practicable to park off such portion of the highway. This contention is based entirely upon the presence of the eight-inch curb and the railroad to the right of the truck and trailer. It does not appear how far along the highway the curb extended. The evidence does show that there was an intersection about 600 feet north of the truck and trailer and that approximately 125 yards north of the scene of the accident, at or near the intersection, were a service station and restaurant. A gravel shoulder ten feet wide, with no intervening curb, was at the edge of the highway to the left of the truck. Testimony was offered by plaintiff concerning parking facilities at the service station and restaurant, but this was excluded upon defendants' objection.

[3,4] The evidence, contrary to defendants' contention, does not show that it was impracticable to park off the highway. Rather, if anything, it tends to show that the truck could have been parked at some other point along the highway without crossing the curb. If a vehicle is not disabled the question of whether or not it is "practicable" to park it off the main portion of the highway requires a consideration not only of the physical conditions immediately to the right but also of any other possible parking spaces to which the vehicle might reasonably be taken, no matter in what direction. As said in Wilson v. Droege, 110 Cal.App. 578, 586, 294 P. 726, 730 (speaking of contributory negligence): "It appears from the evidence that at the place where [the driver] drove partially off of the highway it was impossible for her to get farther off of the highway, but it may have been that * * * it would have been possible for her to proceed in safety a short distance and come to a place where she could have driven her machine entirely off of the highway. *If such was the case, the statute imposed upon her the duty of so doing * * " (Italics added.) See, also, Doane v. Smith, 63 Cal.App.2d 691, 147 P.2d 650, 651, where the court relied in part upon the fact that "with slight additional effort the truck could have been taken to a nearby point where the solid shoulder was much wider." In this case, other than showing the existence of a curb to the right of the truck, defendants made no attempt to prove any lack of suitable parking spaces within a reasonable distance. In fact, the only testimony relating to near-by parking facilities was excluded at defendants' own objection. Further, it is clear that the truck and trailer were not disabled and could have been moved to any such near-by parking space, because, as defendants state in their closing brief: "It is admitted that defendant driver in the case at bar stopped or parked for his personal convenience. Neither disability of his truck nor any other necessity compelled him to interrupt his journey." Under these circumstances, we cannot hold that as a matter of law defendants sustained their burden of showing it was impracticable to park the truck and trailer off the paved portion of the highway. The record supports the implied finding of the jury that defendant Bayless violated section 582 of the Vehicle Code, thus establishing defendants' negligence for the purposes of this action.

[5-7] Defendants next contend that any negligence on their part was not the proximate cause of the accident but that the sole proximate cause was the negligence of the driver of the automobile in which plaintiff was riding. The violation of a parking regulation may be the proximate cause of an accident where the unlawfully parked vehicle is struck by another vehicle. Doane v. Smith, 63 Cal.App.2d 691, 147 P.2d 650; Thompson v. Steveson, 52 Cal.App.2d 250, 126 P.2d 127; Mason v. Crawford, 17 Cal.App.2d 529, 62 P.2d 420. It is conceded that the driver's negligence, if any, may not be imputed to plaintiff. Accepting defendants' contention that the driver of the automobile in which plaintiff was riding was negligent, we nevertheless cannot on the record before us say, as a matter of law, that the negligence of defendants was not also a proximate cause of the accident. It has recently been held that whether or not parking on the highway in violation of section 582 of the Vehicle Code constitutes a proximate cause of the accident where the driver of the car in motion might also have been negligent, is a question of fact for the jury if reasonable men can differ thereon. Inai v. Ede, 59 Cal.App.2d 549, 555, 139 P.2d 76; see, also, opinion on prior appeal, 42 Cal. App.2d 521, 526, 527, 109 P.2d 400; cf. Fennessey v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 20 Cal.2d 141, 124 P.2d 51; Mason v. Crawford, supra. The evidence here is sufficient to support a finding that the violation of the statute was a proximate cause of the accident.

The judgment is affirmed.

BENNETT v. FORREST et al.
S. F. 16885.

Supreme Court of California.
July 10, 1944.

1. Executors and administrators ☞314(2)

Probate court, as ancillary to its jurisdiction, had power to determine effect of a property settlement agreement on husband's existing will, and to whom deceased husband's property was to be distributed.

2. Wills ☞63

An agreement to make a will or devise property to a designated person can have no effect upon a will or right to legacies, since agreement involves making of a will after agreement's execution.

3. Executors and administrators ☞314(2)

A probate court has power to determine whether a right under an existing will or legacy or devise was relinquished, or revoked under statute, by a property settlement agreement, since direct question presented to court is effectiveness of will and who may take thereunder. Probate Code, § 73.

4. Executors and administrators ☞314(2)

Where, after husband devised property to wife, wife, under a property settlement agreement, relinquished her right as an heir in favor of husband's heirs and legatees, in action by husband's sister to impress a trust on the property, sister was claiming as an heir, and not under the settlement agreement adversely to husband's estate, and probate court in distribution proceedings had jurisdiction to determine sister's claim.

5. Executors and administrators ☞315(6)

Where effect of a property settlement agreement on husband's existing will of property to wife was fully litigated in distribution proceeding in probate court, and husband's sister as a party took no appeal, the decree was res judicata in sister's action to impress a trust on the property whether right or wrong.

6. Appeal and error ☞907(3)

Where appeal was taken on the judgment roll alone and findings authorized conclusion that issue of legatee's right was determined in probate distribution proceeding pending when action was instituted, it would be assumed that any objection to defect in pleading defense of res judicata in not filing a supplemental pleading after distribution decree was made, was waived impliedly or by stipulation.

7. Appeal and error ☞842(2)

In action to impress a trust on a legacy, where factors necessary to make a prior probate court decree of distribution available as a bar were found, a statement by the court in the trust actions that the court did not find that its finding as to the distribution decree was res judicata, was a legal conclusion from facts found, upon which the Supreme Court could draw the correct conclusion to support the judgment for legatee, since ultimate conclusion of whether decree was res judicata was one of law.

8. Trusts ☞91

Where one unlawfully comes into possession of property of a decedent, the constructive trust is one imposed by law.

9. Trusts ☞371(5)

In action to impress a trust on a legacy, plaintiff's allegation that defendant's claim under a will was a violation of a property settlement agreement and constituted a fraud upon plaintiff, was insufficient where no specific acts of fraud were alleged.

In Bank.

Appeal from a Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank T. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Helen F. Bennett against Georgina E. Forrest, individually and as executrix of the will of Francis G. Forrest, deceased, and others, to impress a trust on the property received from decedent's estate, and for injunctive relief. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Prior opinion, 141 P.2d 20.

Fletcher A. Cutler, Duncan A. McLeod, and Clarence M. Oddie, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Marcel E. Cerf and Robinson & Leland, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CARTER, Justice.

Plaintiff commenced this action against defendant Georgina E. Forrest individually and as executrix of the last will of Francis G. Forrest, her deceased husband, to impress a trust on properties received from his estate by defendant, as legatee.

In 1937, defendant commenced an action against her husband for separate maintenance. Finally, after various proceedings were taken in that action, and on February 28, 1938, the parties entered into a property settlement agreement adjusting all of their property rights. The complaint in the separate maintenance action was amended to state a cause of action for divorce. Defendant was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce in March, 1938. No final decree was ever entered. Defendant's husband died about 14 months after the interlocutory decree was granted.

The will of Mr. Forrest dated August 6, 1921, together with a codicil dated August 14, 1933, was admitted to probate, and defendant, being named therein as such, was appointed executrix. The will left all of decedent's property, with the exception of one legacy, to defendant. Plaintiff is a sister, and an heir at law of deceased, and she seeks by this action to have it determined that by the property settlement agreement defendant forfeited all right to inherit from the deceased, or take under his will, and that the will was revoked as to defendant, leaving plaintiff as sole heir of deceased.

The property settlement agreement, after disposing of the property, provides:

"Each party shall have the right to dispose of his or her property, by last will and testament, or otherwise, and each party agrees that all the estate of the other party shall, subject to the within agreement and to his or her debts and engagements, go and belong to the person, or persons, who would have become entitled thereto if the parties had never been married; and it is further covenanted and agreed that each party will permit any will of the other to be probated, and will allow administration upon his or her estate to be taken out by the persons or person who would have been entitled thereto, if the parties had never been married. * * *

"This agreement is intended to be, and is, a full, complete, entire and final settlement of all property rights between the parties and all rights, duties and obligations arising out of the marital relation now existing, and such rights, duties and obligations as might hereafter accrue but for this agreement; and each of the parties hereto does mutually agree to and does by these presents forever release and discharge the other party from all obligations, either in law, or in equity arising out of the marital relation, or otherwise, for support, maintenance, alimony, court costs or counsel fees, and shall thenceforth entertain no claim upon the other, either conjugal, or otherwise, except as set forth in this agreement. Each party hereto further agrees to, and by these presents does waive, relinquish, quitclaim and release all right, title, claim or demand of every nature in and to any property, either real, personal or mixed, to be held or owned at any time in the future by the other party hereto, whether acquired by purchase, gift, bequest, descent, devise, or in any other manner, and wheresoever such property may be situate. And the parties hereto, and each of them, do hereby expressly waive, relinquish and surrender any and all claims and rights to inherit or claim dower in, or family allowance or homestead from, or otherwise secure an interest in, any property whatsoever by, through or from the other party hereto, which claim and right said parties, and each of them, respectively do hereby relinquish and surrender in favor of all of the heirs, legatees, devisees and assigns of such party so dying, and to the exclusion of either and each of said first and second parties hereto, respectively, including the right to administer upon the estate of the other party."

It is alleged in the complaint that decedent's will was admitted to probate and defendant duly qualified as executrix thereof. Defendant, in her answer, denies the legal effect given to the property settlement agreement in the complaint and alleges in paragraph II of her first answer, "that heretofore in the probate proceedings (in decedent's estate) * * * in proceedings wherein plaintiff herein and defendants herein were parties and were on opposite sides, an order was duly made and entered in said proceedings wherein it was adjudicated that plaintiff was not the sole heir at law of said Francis G. Forrest, deceased; that plaintiff herein appealed from said order, and said order was affirmed on appeal, and remittitur filed in said proceedings." And in paragraph III of her first answer, that defendant "claims to be entitled to distribution of a portion of the property of said estate pursuant to the terms of said will referred to in said complaint; that Georgina E. Forrest, as such executrix, has filed in said probate proceedings a petition for distribution of said estate to Georgina E. Forrest, individually, and to Jane B. Forrest, pursuant to the terms of said will; that plaintiff herein has filed objections to said petition and has petitioned for distribution of said estate to herself; that said petition and the objections thereto have been heard and submitted to the court for decision, and decision thereon is now pending; that said objections seek distribution of said estate to plaintiff upon the same grounds asserted in the complaint herein." In her second separate answer she alleges "that the issues, if any, presented by the complaint have been determined in said probate proceedings." The court found that all of the foregoing allegations in defendant's answer are true, except in reference to the allegation in paragraph III of the first answer in which it found "that in said probate proceedings a decree of distribution was heretofore made and entered directing distribution of said estate as prayed in the petition for distribution therein, that no appeal was taken therefrom, and that said decree has become final." Upon plaintiff's motion for a new trial the court amended its finding that the allegations as to the second answer were true by stating that the decree of distribution contained a finding "that prior to the death of said Francis G. Forrest, and after the execution of said agreement, said decedent and Georgina E. Forrest effected and consummated a reconciliation and resumed marital relations; that said agreement dated February 28th, 1938, including the provisions thereof set forth in the opposition of Helen F. Bennett to petition for final discharge, was not in force or effect at the time of the death of said decedent;

"That said decree of distribution was made and entered in said probate proceedings on December 18, 1941, and that no appeal has been taken from said decree of distribution, and that the time for appeal therefrom has expired.

"This court does not find that this finding is res adjudicata."

The allegation in paragraph II of the first answer of defendant, quoted above, referring to an order in the probate proceedings as having been affirmed on appeal, apparently refers to the order appointing defendant as executrix of the estate over the objection of plaintiff who there asserted that by the property settlement agreement defendant had waived her right to serve as executrix. See Estate of Forrest, 43 Cal.App.2d 347, 110 P.2d 1023. There the court affirmed the order of appointment, but stated that no issue was involved in regard to the right to take as a legatee under the will. Estate of Forrest, supra, 43 Cal.App.2d at page 350, 110 P.2d at page 1024.

The findings of the trial court above mentioned present the question of whether the decree of distribution was res judicata in the probate proceedings on the cause of action stated by plaintiff. The issues presented were whether or not decedent's will was revoked as to defendant by the property settlement agreement, who was entitled to take under the will, and the matters incidental thereto such as the validity and effect of the agreement.

[1] Ancillary to and as an incident of the probate court's jurisdiction it had power to determine, as it did, the effect of the agreement on the will and to whom the property of the estate was to be distributed. It has been held generally that "Under various circumstances the probate court may determine the validity and effect of contracts when ancillary to a proper judgment by it." Dobbins v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 22 Cal.2d 64, 68, 136 P.2d 572, 574. It has been held particularly, that in a proceeding to remove a wife as administratrix of the husband's estate, on the ground that she has ceased to be an heir by virtue of a marriage settlement agreement, the probate court has jurisdiction to adjudicate the validity and effect of the agreement (Estate of Cover, 188 Cal. 133, 204 P. 583; See In re Estate of Warner, 6 Cal.App. 361, 92 P. 191; In re Estate of Dobbins, 36 Cal.App.2d 536, 97 P.2d 1051; In re Estate of McNutt, 36 Cal.App.2d 542, 98 P.2d 253); that in passing upon a petition by a widow for family allowance from her deceased husband's estate the validity and effect of a property settlement agreement may be determined (In re Estate of Yoell, 164 Cal. 540, 129 P. 999; In re Estate of Hamalian, 57 Cal.App. 169, 206 P. 1011); that the validity and effect of a property settlement agreement could be considered in a will contest on the issue of sufficiency of the husband's interest to contest the will (In re Estate of Edelman, 148 Cal. 233, 82 P. 962, 113 Am.St.Rep. 231); that an agreement did or did not constitute a renunciation of heirship in proceedings to determine heirship, and the validity thereof (In re Estate of McClelland, 181 Cal. 227, 183 P. 798); and that a probate court in distribution proceedings may pass upon the question of whether or not one claiming to be an heir held such status by reason of an agreement between the deceased and another in which the former agreed to adopt the claimant. Johnson v. Superior Court, 102 Cal.App. 178, 283 P. 331. It is of some significance, although the particular point was not discussed, that in the following cases the issue of the effect of a property settlement agreement upon the right to take by will or succession was adjudicated by the probate court. In re Estate of Crane, 6 Cal.2d 218, 57 P.2d 476, 104 A.L.R. 1101; In re Estate of Boeson, 201 Cal. 36, 41, 255 P. 800; In re Estate of Walker, 169 Cal. 400, 146 P. 868; In re Estate of Martin, 166 Cal. 399, 137 P. 2; In re Estate of Winslow, 121 Cal. 92, 53 P. 362; In re Davis' Estate, 106 Cal. 453, 39 P. 756; In re Estate of Minier, 215 Cal. 31, 8 P.2d 123, 81 A.L.R. 689; In re Estate of Johnson, 31 Cal.App.2d 251, 87 P.2d 900; but see Weinstein v. Moers, 207 Cal. 534, 279 P. 444. In the distribution proceedings in the instant case the issue to be determined was: Who were entitled to take as beneficiaries of the estate? As an incident to that determination the effect of the property settlement agreement could be determined; that is, whether it be viewed as constituting a renunciation by the defendant of the legacy under the will or a revocation of such legacy pursuant to section 73 of the Probate Code.

Plaintiff cites and relies upon cases holding first, that a probate court may not determine the effect or validity of an agreement to make a will or devise property to a designated person in the probate proceeding following the death of one of the contracting parties (see 26 Cal.Jur. 834, § 163), and second, that a probate court has no jurisdiction to determine claims or titles adverse to the estate. Wilkerson v. Seib, 20 Cal.2d 556, 127 P.2d 904; see 11A Cal. Jur. 94-96.

[2,3] The first proposition is based upon the ambulatory character of a will and that a will cannot be made irrevocable. Such an agreement can have no effect upon the will or the right to legacies thereunder inasmuch as it involves the making of a will after its execution. A different situation is presented when we have an agreement following a will previously executed. Then the issue is not whether there has been a breach of the agreement. It becomes a question of what effect, if any, the agreement would have in respect to a revocation of the will or a legacy under section 73 of the Probate Code or a relinquishment of any legacy or devise made in the will. Certainly a determination of whether a will or a legacy or devise thereunder has been revoked or relinquished is for the probate court inasmuch as the direct problem presented is the effectiveness of the will and who may take thereunder. The effect of a contract bearing upon that subject is an incidental matter that may be determined. To epitomize what we have said, the agreement in the instant case is manifestly not one to make a will, and the issue here presented is the effect of an agreement on a will already made.

[4] The second rule above-mentioned is not applicable because the claim of plaintiff is not the assertion of a title or interest adverse to the estate in the sense that phrase is used. She is an heir of the deceased by reason of her kinship and she must rest her claim on that basis. True, the agreement provides as appears from the above-quoted excerpt therefrom that defendant relinquishes her right as an heir in favor of the heirs, devisees and legatees of the decedent, but that relinquishment takes nothing away from the estate. If it does anything it restores the property to the estate, the only issue being who are the heirs and qualified to take from the estate either by will or intestate succession. The relinquishment amounts to nothing more than leaving the decedent free to dispose of his property as he pleases whether that be by an act during life or by operation of law on death under the rules of intestate succession. Basically, plaintiff's claim must be derived from her status as an heir. The agreement does not affect that circumstance. It comes into the picture only as a factor in determining whether she is an heir who is entitled to inherit, which involves such questions as the degree of kinship, the presence or absence of prior heirs, or the existence of property which may pass by intestate succession depending upon the presence or absence of a will under which others may take. Hence, we cannot agree with plaintiff's assertion that she is claiming the title to the property under the property settlement agreement and thus adverse to the estate.

[5,6] Plaintiff contends that the defense of res judicata was not pleaded and that the finding was against it. With respect to the pleading it is apparent from the heretofore quoted excerpts from defendant's answer that at the time it was filed the petition for the decree of distribution was pending in the probate court and defendant so asserted in her pleadings. She could do no more as the decree had not been rendered. Technically, the proper procedure would have been for her to file an amended or supplemental pleading after the decree of distribution was made. However, it is apparent from the findings that the issue was fully litigated. It is found that the identical issues raised in the trial in the instant case were determined in the probate proceedings, that is, the effect of the property settlement agreement on defendant's right to take under the will. All the customary elements such as identity of subject matter, parties and the like were adjudicated. It is true that the findings mention a reconciliation as being a determinative factor nullifying the effect of the agreement, but we are not concerned with the validity or invalidity of the rules of law applied. The probate court having jurisdiction, its conclusion, right or wrong, is binding. The appeal being taken upon the judgment roll alone, and findings having been made which lead to only one conclusion, namely, that the issue was determined in the probate proceedings, it will be assumed on appeal that any objection to defects or insufficiency in pleading the defense was waived impliedly or by stipulation. See Sanguinetti v. Sanguinetti, 9

[7] Plaintiff asserts that the trial court's finding that: "This court does not find that this finding is res judicata" (that sentence appears in the foregoing quoted excerpt from the findings) eliminates the probate decree as being res judicata because the trial court must find on that issue. As we have seen all of the factors necessary to make the decree of distribution available as a bar were found. The ultimate conclusion of whether it was res judicata was one of law rather than fact. The statement is peculiarly worded and might imply that the court does not find on the law issue one way or the other. But assuming it is a negative finding it is nothing more than a legal conclusion from the facts found, a matter upon which this court is at liberty to draw the correct conclusion to support the judgment. There is nothing in Reidy v. Superior Court, 220 Cal. 111, 29 P.2d 780, contrary to those views. There this court merely refused to prohibit proceedings in an action in which the defense of res judicata was raised because such a plea did not oust the trial court of jurisdiction. Nor are the cases of Baird v. Superior Court, 204 Cal. 408, 268 P. 640; Rideaux v. Torgrison, 12 Cal.2d 633, 86 P.2d 826, and United Security Bank & Trust Co. v. Superior Court, 205 Cal. 167, 270 P. 184, contrary. Those cases merely adhere to the proposition that a claim of res judicata does not oust a court of jurisdiction and that once the trial court has made its final adjudication that a former judgment is not a bar in the instant action, that determination is final and conclusive whether right or wrong. They do not involve the question of whether a judgment may be affirmed on appeal on the ground that a former judgment is res judicata when in the light of the facts found the question of the legal effect of the former judgment is merely a legal conclusion and the trial court's contrary conclusion on that issue.

[8,9] The foregoing conclusions are not altered by the plaintiff's assertion that she claims that defendant holds the property for her as an involuntary trustee. A constructive trust where one unlawfully comes into possession of property of a decedent is one imposed by law. The essential question is whether it came to them unlawfully.

That issue as we have seen was determined adversely to plaintiff in the probate proceeding and is res judicata. Plaintiff alleged that defendant's claim under the will is in violation of the property settlement agreement and "constitutes a fraud upon plaintiff." At most the fraud would be constructive (see Weinstein v. Moers, supra); no specific acts of fraud are alleged and the court found those allegations untrue. There are no pleadings or findings even approaching a showing of extrinsic fraud in obtaining the decree of distribution.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

GIBSON, C. J., and SHENK, CURTIS, EDMONDS, and SCHAUER, JJ., concur.

TRAYNOR, Justice (concurring).

I concur in the judgment but for reasons other than in the majority opinion.

The majority opinion rejects plaintiff's contention that decedent revoked the legacy to his widow by executing the property settlement agreement, on the ground that the decree of distribution operates as a bar to this cause of action, that "ancillary to and incident of the probate court's jurisdiction it had power to determine, as it did, the effect of the agreement on the will and to whom the property of the estate was to be distributed." In concluding that the probate court decided the issue concerning the revocation of the legacy as an incident of the distribution of the estate, the majority opinion relies upon the finding in the distribution decree that the spouses had effected a reconciliation and that their agreement was not in effect at the time of decedent's death. It is my opinion that this finding has no bearing on the issue of revocation. If decedent revoked the legacy by executing the agreement, the subsequent suspension of the agreement by reconciliation would not revive the legacy. In re Lones, 108 Cal. 688, 41 P. 771; see Ferrier, Revival of a Revoked Will, 28 Cal.L.Rev. 265, 266. The finding in question simply indicates that the agreement did not prevent defendant from asserting rights to her husband's estate as a legatee under his will. The question whether the agreement had become inoperative before decedent's death was within the jurisdiction of the probate court, for that court may refuse to distribute any part of the estate to a legatee claiming under a valid will, if the legatee by a previous agreement or otherwise is estopped to assert his rights under the will. In re Estate of Crane, 6 Cal.2d 218, 57 P.2d 476, 104 A.L.R. 1101. The probate court, however, has no jurisdiction, in a proceeding directed to the distribution of the estate, to determine whether the will was revoked. Since this question concerns the validity of the will submitted to probate, it can be litigated and decided only in a will contest. In re Estate of Parsons, 196 Cal. 294, 237 P. 744. If no contest is initiated within the period allowed in sections 380 and 384 of the Probate Code, the order admitting the will to probate is conclusive under section 384 as to the validity of the will. In re Estate of Parsons, supra; In re Estate of Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 585, 150 P. 989; In re Estate of Duraind, 51 Cal.App.2d 206, 213, 124 P.2d 330. Plaintiff did not institute a will contest within the six-month period allowed by section 380, and is therefore bound as to the issue of revocation by the finality of the order admitting the will to probate.

The question remains whether plaintiff in seeking to impress a trust on the property received by defendant from the estate can rely on the theory that she seeks specific performance of the property settlement agreement as a third party beneficiary. It is settled that a contract of a person to dispose of his property by will in a particular manner can be given effect as against the will, not by the probate court but by a court of equity, and that the remedy to impress a trust on the property received by the legatee is in the nature of specific performance of the contract. In re Estate of Rolls, 193 Cal. 594, 226 P. 608; Wolf v. Donahue, 206 Cal. 213, 220, 273 P. 547; Notten v. Mensing, 3 Cal.2d 469, 473, 45 P.2d 198. This remedy applies also to a contract between testator and legatee in which the legatee renounces the right to take under the will. Weinstein v. Moers, 207 Cal. 534, 279 P. 444. Since the remedy is in the nature of specific performance, it does not depend, as suggested in the majority opinion, upon extrinsic fraud. For another reason, however, plaintiff cannot have a trust impressed upon the property. She cannot have such relief without showing that the executory provisions of the agreement were in effect at the time of decedent's death. She is precluded from so doing by the probate court's finding that as a result of a reconciliation of the spouses, the agreement was not in effect at the time of decedent's death. This finding, though made upon another cause of action, is conclusive upon plaintiff as to this previously litigated issue, since a decision rendered between the same parties on the same issue estops either party from relitigating the issue even in another court or on a different cause of action. *English v. Whether parties having burden of proof on issue of payment of notes failed to prove their case by a preponderance of the evidence was a question for trial court and on appeal question was whether the evidence compelled the trial court to find in appellants' favor on such issue.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1010(I)

Evidence did not compel finding that payments had been made on notes involved where the memorandum introduced in evidence by adverse party allegedly showing such payments was of uncertain character as was testimony of the witnesses. Code Civ.Proc. § 1963, subd. 6.

Where the entire interests of original borrower and option holder in encumbered property was transferred to a newly formed corporation in exchange for all of corporation's stock, no cash consideration being received, the defense of usury was available to the original borrower as well as to the corporation.

7. Usury ⇨133

Where original borrower transferred encumbered property to newly organized corporation in exchange for corporation's stock and a witness testified that original borrower was still interested in the corporation and in the encumbered property, and there was nothing in the record to indicate that original borrower was not the owner of the stock at time of commencement of foreclosure action, it was sufficiently established that original borrower was owner of the stock so as to be entitled to avail itself of the defense of usury.

8. Usury ⇨132

Where encumbered property was transferred to a newly formed corporation in exchange for corporation's stock, under an agreement listing all of original borrower's creditors and giving corporation right to negotiate with creditors for settlement, and the only opportunity of creditors to receive payment was from the assets of the original borrower or the corporation on which property they had a judgment lien, the defense of usury was available to creditors in foreclosure action.

9. Usury ⇨130

Where contract gave purchaser of mortgaged property right to contest or settle and discharge any claims of original borrower's creditors, provision in agreement that purchaser was to pay the mortgage debt with interest did not deprive purchaser of right to assert defense of usury in foreclosure action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Helen Roesch and others against Clara P. De Mota, Antonio Mota, E. O. Erickson, individually and as trustee, and the Victor Land & Mineral Company and others for an accounting and to enjoin a sale by the trustee under trust deeds, wherein the Victor Land & Mineral Company filed a cross-complaint against Clara P. De Mota, Antonio Mota, and E. O. Erickson, individually and as trustee. From the judgment all parties appeal.

Affirmed.

Prior opinion, 143 P.2d 67.

Cornish & Cornish, of Berkeley, and Maurice H. Roach, of Oakland, for plaintiffs and appellants.

Virgil M. Airola, of San Andreas, and Jesse H. Steinhart and John J. Goldberg, both of San Francisco, for defendants and appellants.

Philip C. Boardman, of San Francisco, for cross-complainant and appellant.

SHENK, Justice.

This action was brought by the plaintiffs as parties beneficially interested in certain mining property in Calaveras County, for an accounting and to enjoin a scheduled sale by the trustee under two deeds of trust. Plaintiff Roesch is the beneficiary under a junior deed of trust held by her, and which was foreclosed. At the foreclosure sale John S. DeLancey bought the property and holds title for the benefit of plaintiffs and Calaveras Central Mining Corporation and Calaveras Central Gold Mining Co., Ltd., as their interests may appear. The other two plaintiffs are judgment creditors of the defendants Calaveras Central Mining Corporation and Victor Land & Mineral Company, respectively. The defendants Clara P. De Mota and Antonio Mota were not served nor did they appear in the action, although they are the holders of the two notes and deeds of trust sought to be foreclosed by the defendant E. O. Erickson, as trustee under the deeds of trust. Defendant Calaveras Central Gold Mining Co., Ltd., is the lessee of the real property. For the purposes of this opinion, Calaveras Central Mining Corporation will be referred to as Calaveras, and Victor Land & Mineral Company will be referred to as Victor.

On December 19, 1923, Victor as the owner of the mining property obtained a loan from the Manuel Estate Company, a corporation, in the sum of $15,000 and executed a promissory note in that amount, secured by a deed of trust on the property. The note is admittedly usurious. It called for interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month, compounded. After the maturity of that note, which was in default, Victor obtained a second loan from the Manuel Estate Company and executed another note of date January 5, 1925, for $4,500, also secured by a deed of trust, and also usurious.

On March 6, 1926, Victor, whose affairs had become financially precarious, entered into an agreement with Harry Sears, whereby he obtained an option for four months to purchase and acquire at "the times and for the considerations and upon the terms and conditions as hereinafter stated" all the right, title, interest and estate of Victor in and to the land and personal property of the mine. One of the terms and conditions was that Sears organize a corporation under the laws of Delaware with a capitalization of $1,000,000, divided into one million shares of the par value of $1 each, of which Victor was to receive 150,276 shares. Another term of the agreement was that Sears would within four months "pay and discharge or secure the complete release and discharge of all indebtedness now owing by the corporation [Victor] * * * to the Manuel Estate Company, a corporation * * * and being the indebtedness now due and owing from two promissory notes executed by the said corporation [Victor] * * * the said Manuel Estate Company * * *", scribing them]; "that there is now accrued and unpaid upon said promissory notes not only the full amount of the said principal sums of said indebtedness but also interest thereon in accordance with the terms and conditions of said respective promissory notes, together with costs, charges, expenses, insurance premiums, taxes, charges for attorneys fees, costs of advertising, and other miscellaneous expenses incurred by the said Manuel Estate Company * * *". The agreement further provided for the payment and discharge or release and discharge of other obligations of Victor, including those in favor of the plaintiffs Anderson and Montreeville, and that during the life of the option any action taken by Manuel Estate Company or other creditors "shall be and is at the entire risk of the party of the second part [Sears] and that there is no duty imposed upon or to be undertaken by the party of the first part [Victor] to avoid any of such actions or the enforcement or the collection of any of such indebtedness owing by the said corporation * * * and that this option and agreement is executed by the said party of the second part with all of such possible proceedings by creditors at his own risk. It is further understood and agreed, however, that the party of the second part shall have the right to negotiate with any of the said creditors to settle, discharge, compromise or in any other manner adjust the creditor's claims or any of them, so as to avoid any proceedings that may otherwise be taken by the said creditors against the said corporation or its said properties for the collection of said creditor's claims, or any of them."

The corporation was organized as provided for in the agreement, and is the defendant Calaveras. On April 15, 1926, Sears made a written offer to assign the option agreement to Calaveras in exchange for the balance of its stock and $20,000 of its 8 per cent convertible notes. Calaveras accepted the offer, and Sears' rights in the agreement vested in the corporation. In March, 1927, Victor deeded the property to Calaveras, and Sears and Victor received the stock of Calaveras, in the proportions set forth.

In October, 1928, the defendant Clara P. De Mota became the holder of the two notes originally given by Victor to Manuel Estate Company, which notes were then in default. Proceedings to foreclose the deeds of trust were instituted, whereupon this action was brought by plaintiffs. Victor admitted the allegations of the complaint and filed a cross-complaint seeking the same relief as the plaintiffs, and setting up the defense of usury. In its cross-complaint Victor alleged, and the court found, that Calaveras was organized to purchase and own the real and personal property referred to and to conduct the mining operations; and that the property is the principal property of that corporation. Defendants Calaveras and Calaveras Central Gold Mining Co., Ltd., admitted the allegations of the complaint; defendant Erickson contested the claim that the notes had been paid in part and asserted that the defense of usury was not available to the plaintiffs, to Victor or to the Calaveras corporations.

The trial court found that the notes were usurious, that the defense of usury was available to the plaintiffs, and that no payments had been made on the notes. It enjoined the trustee, Erickson, from selling the property under the deeds of trust for amounts in excess of the face value of the notes plus charges and fees stipulated to be in the sum of $3,750, or a total of $23,250.

All of the parties appealed from the judgment. Plaintiffs and the defendants Calaveras appealed on the ground that the court erred in finding that no payments had been made on the $15,000 note; Victor as cross-complainant appealed on the ground that the court erred in finding that the defense of usury was not available to it as an original borrower still interested in the property by reason of its shareholdings in Calaveras; Erickson, the trustee, appealed on the ground that the defense of usury was not available to any of the parties.

The questions on this appeal are (1) whether the evidence is sufficient to support the trial court's finding that no payments had been made on the notes; and (2) whether the defense of usury was available to the plaintiffs, Victor or the corporations Calaveras.

[1] With reference to the first point the state of the pleadings and the proof are of vital importance. The execution of the notes for the principal sums of $15,000 and $4,500 with interest was alleged by the plaintiffs. They also alleged that Calaveras and Sears had paid thereon in excess of $15,000. Victor alleged that Calaveras and Sears had paid thereon in excess of $10,000 and that the defendants De Mota knew of such payments when the notes were purchased in 1928. Calaveras, in its verified answer, admitted the allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint that over $15,000 had been paid by Calaveras and Sears and prayed that the court determine the balance due after crediting those payments. The answer of Calaveras was verified by Sears, its president and general manager. There was no allegation or proof that Victor had paid anything on the notes either prior to March 6, 1926, or after that time. The plaintiffs and Calaveras and Victor all tendered the issue of part payment on the notes by Calaveras and Sears. The burden was upon them to prove such payments. When they presented their evidence on that issue, it must be assumed that they had or should have had available to them the testimony of the persons who had made the alleged payments on account or the records of the corporation on whose behalf the payments were made. It is true that Sears was in New York at the time of the trial, but his deposition was not taken and there was no showing that it could not have been taken. No canceled checks or books or business records of Calaveras or of Sears were produced in support of the asserted payments, and no showing was made that the customary business records had been lost or destroyed. No officer or employee of Victor or Calaveras testified that payments had been made and there was no showing why such proof was omitted. None of the plaintiffs testified in support of their allegations that payments had been made. The only proof of payments tendered by those on whom rested the burden of establishing the same was the testimony of M. H. Manuel, president of the Manuel Estate Company, which was the payee of the promissory notes. He was called as a witness for the plaintiffs. He was shown a statement dated March 15, 1928, and headed "Manuel Estate Company * * * Victor Land & Mineral Co." This memorandum was produced on behalf of the plaintiffs and purported to show debits and credits on the account of the Victor Land & Mineral Company on the $15,000 note, from 1923 to 1928. It also purported to credit payments of principal and interest at various dates and to debit the unpaid interest at 1 per cent per month, plus charges for insurance, taxes, attorneys' fees, etc. The trial occurred in April, 1941. Mr. Manuel testified that he had no independent recollection of payments made on this note or of preparing the statement, but that he believed it was in his handwriting; that the statement did not refresh his recollection as to whether payments had been made; it showed that it had been made from the records of his corporation for the purpose of indicating the payments made on and charges against the note; that in his opinion the statement was correct; that he would not have made it if it had not been correct. He based his testimony as to payments not on his knowledge or recollection that they had been made, but on his belief that items on the memorandum were correct. He did not testify that any of the payments shown on the statement had been made, but only that "the statement shows" that the several payments had been made. When asked about the payment of particular items, he said: "Well, according to the statement here" the payments were made.

The defendant Erickson was requested by the plaintiffs to stipulate with reference to the items on the statement showing payment. He agreed to do so on condition that opposing counsel would also stipulate to the correctness of the other items on the statement. This the plaintiffs refused to do.

After interrogating Mr. Manuel the plaintiffs did not offer the statement in evidence. The defendant Erickson called Mr. Manuel as his own witness and offered the memorandum in evidence in order that the trial court might have the document as a whole before it. The plaintiffs objected on the ground that the statement "expresses the opinion and conclusion of the witness." The objection was overruled and the document was received in evidence. No records of the Manuel Estate Company were produced and no proof was tendered that any attempt had been made to find, examine or produce its books or records. All that was elicited on this subject was the statement of Mr. Manuel: "I don't know whether I have them [the company's records] in detail or not—I don't know whether I could find them, it is so long ago."

With the foregoing evidence before it the trial court found "that there is considerable doubt as to what if any payments were made on account of the aforesaid promissory notes or either of them and the court therefore finds that nothing has been paid on account of the aforesaid notes or either of them."

[2, 3] In substance the trial court found and concluded that the plaintiffs and those equally charged with them in sustaining the burden had not proved payment by a preponderance of evidence. The problem here is not whether the appellants on the issue of payment failed to prove their case by a preponderance of the evidence. That was a question for the trial court and it was resolved against them. The question for this court to determine is whether the evidence compelled the trial court to find in their favor on that issue. These appellants contend that the testimony of Mr. Manuel was uncontroverted and that it required a finding in their favor. It may be assumed that his testimony was uncontradicted and unimpeached, but it would not necessarily follow that it was of such a character and weight as to leave no room for a judicial determination that it was insufficient to support a finding in favor of payment. In the first place the testimony of Mr. Manuel independently of the memorandum was uncertain and obviously insufficient to establish payment. He had no recollection of payments having been made, and the memorandum did not refresh his recollection. Secondly, the memorandum was secondary evidence concerning which the trial court might properly conclude that primary evidence of the facts of payment was within the power of these appellants to produce and that they had not done so. The officers or employees of the appellant corporations who might have made such payments did not testify and their failure to testify either in person or by deposition was not explained; nor was their failure to produce the books of these corporations accounted for. From these facts the trial court was entitled to infer that the primary evidence, if produced, would have been adverse. Code Civ.Proc. § 1963, subd. 6.

But the plaintiffs and the appellant corporations assert that the memorandum was introduced in evidence by the trustee; that although they objected to its introduction on other grounds no objection was made on the ground that it was secondary evidence or that a proper foundation had not been laid, and that therefore the trustee was bound by it. However, a reference to the circumstances of its receipt in evidence, above narrated, discloses at least two reasons why the trial court was not bound to apply the rule invoked or itself be required to hold the evidence sufficient to constitute proof of payment. One was the uncertain and unsatisfactory character of the testimony of Mr. Manuel and the other was the secondary character of the memorandum introduced. No other evidence on the issue of payment was offered. In view of this uncertainty and of the weakness of the memorandum as secondary evidence when primary evidence of its contents, so far as the record shows, was available to the plaintiffs, it may not properly be concluded that the trial court was compelled to find in favor of the plaintiffs and the defendant corporations on the issue of payment.

[4, 5] As to the second point, it is conceded that the question of usury was not in the minds of any of the parties at the time of the acquisition of the interests of Victor and Sears by Calaveras. It was not until some time after the decision of this court in the case of Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., 200 Cal. 609, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A.L.R. 725, that the notes were recognized as usurious. It cannot be said that the parties to the agreement intended either to waive or to transfer the defense of usury, since the availability of such a defense was not then within their knowledge. Waiver always rests upon intent. Waiver is the intentional relinquishment of a known right after knowledge of the facts. Wienke v. Smith, 179 Cal. 220, 226, 176 P. 42; 25 Cal.Jur. 926. The parties did not know that the notes were usurious at the time they entered into the 1926 agreement, and the agreement cannot be interpreted as imputing to the parties an intention not within their contemplation at the time of the execution of the same.

The trial court found that the defense of usury was available to the plaintiffs. The defendants Victor and Calaveras contend that the defense should have also been found available to them.

[6] Victor claims the right to assert the defense of usury on the ground that it is the original borrower and still interested in the property by reason of its interest in Calaveras, and Calaveras asserts its right as the successor of the original borrower. The consideration for the transfer of the property from Victor and Sears to Calaveras was the issuance to them of the shares of stock of Calaveras, and the assumption of Victor's obligations. Victor did not receive a cash consideration for the property, but accepted shares of stock. This distinguishes the case from those in which the seller accepted a price for the property from which was deducted the amount due under the obligation, thereby waiving the defense of usury, and requiring the purchaser to pay the agreed price. Ames v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., 210 Cal. 271, 291 P. 182; Matthews v. Ormerd, 140 Cal. 578, 74 P. 136; Esposti v. Rivers Bros., Inc., 207 Cal. 570, 279 P. 423. Here, Victor and Sears transferred to the newly created corporation their interest in the real property and the option agreement. Their entire interest passed to the corporation and they acquired all of the stock of the corporation in return. By this transaction the corporation was substituted in the place of Victor and Sears. In the case of Western States Acceptance Corporation v. Frank D. Tuttle, Inc., 210 Cal. 51, 290 P. 574, it was pointed out that the corporation defendant was the alter ego of Tuttle, the borrower, and the defense of usury was held available to it. The same rule should apply and the defense be held available where two persons have merged their holdings into a corporate entity. Greengard v. Katz, 270 Ill.App. 227; Chas. S. Riley & Co. v. W. T. Sears & Co., 154 N.C. 509, 70 S.E. 997. The transaction is one where, as between the parties, the seller remains interested in the property, and to enforce the usurious obligation would be to destroy or impair the property interests so retained.

[7] Defendant Erickson contends that Victor did not allege in its cross-complaint that it still owned the shares of stock of Calaveras issued to it. The evidence showed and the court found that the 150,-276 shares "were issued and delivered" to Victor in accordance with the contract of March 6, 1926, and the remainder to Harry Sears. One witness (counsel for Victor) testified that Victor was still interested in Calaveras and in the property. There is nothing in the record to indicate that Victor was not the owner of the stock at the time of the commencement of the action. Under such circumstances we think it is sufficiently established that it was the owner of the stock at the time. As such a shareholder in Calaveras, there can be no question but that a sale of the property for the amount of the notes and usurious interest would adversely affect Victor through a reduction in the value of its stock. By the agreement, Calaveras had the right to settle, discharge, compromise, or in any other manner adjust the creditors' claims "so as to avoid any proceeding that may otherwise be taken by said creditors against the said corporation or its said properties for the collection of said creditors' claims, or any of them." Any settlement or adjustment made by the new company with the creditors of Victor whereby any creditor accepted less than the amount claimed would enhance the value of Victor's stock and necessarily result in a direct benefit to that corporation. It would be to the direct financial interest of Victor that the defense of usury be held available to it, and to Calaveras, its successor.

[8] The plaintiffs Montreeville and Anderson are judgment creditors of Victor and Calaveras, respectively, and the indebtedness represented by the judgments was incurred prior to the execution of the deeds of trust sought to be foreclosed. The obligations were included in the list of creditors of Victor. The judgments in favor of these plaintiffs provided that the payment of either judgment should be payment pro tanto of the other. These creditors never lost the right to look to Victor or to its properties for payment. If these plaintiffs are permitted to assert the defense of usury it will be to the immediate benefit of the original borrower, Victor. By the agreements with Sears and Calaveras, plaintiffs Montreeville and Anderson were brought into privity with Victor and Calaveras, and to that extent the agreement was for the benefit of these creditors. It is established law that one not a party to an usurious contract may not attack it unless he is injured by it. Zimmerman v. Boyd, 97 Cal.App. 406, 408, 275 P. 509; Matthews v. Ormerd, supra. In the present case it is clear that plaintiffs Montreeville and Anderson would be injured. Their only opportunity to receive payment of their judgment is from the assets of Victor or Calaveras, on which they have a judgment lien. The preservation of the property through the defense of usury is directly to their benefit.

[9] Defendant Erickson claims that under the contract Calaveras was to pay the obligation with interest, and that this provision would exclude the right to assert the defense of usury. It has been shown, however, that the agreement also provided that Calaveras should have the right to negotiate with any of the creditors to settle, discharge, compromise or in any other manner adjust the creditors' claims. Taken as a whole, the agreement served to list the obligations of Victor and to authorize Calaveras to contest any or all of them. It did not deprive Calaveras of the right to assert any defense to any of those obligations. It is therefore concluded that the defense of usury was not only available to the plaintiffs but to the defendants Victor and Calaveras as well.

The judgment is affirmed.

Lloyd E. Hewitt, Dist. Atty., of Yuba City, for Treasurer of Sutter County.

CARTER, Justice.

These consolidated actions present the question of the liability of reclamation districts for interest on their bonds and interest coupons after maturity. The Irvine case was before this court on a prior occasion but the issue was not passed upon. Irvine v. Gibson, 19 Cal.2d 14, 118 P.2d 812.

In the Irvine case it is charged in the complaint that the defendant Reclamation District No. 108 was organized under the general reclamation law of 1868; and issued on January 1, 1925, bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each in the total principal sum of $3,142,000, bearing interest at 6 per cent per annum and having attached thereto interest coupons for semiannual payment of interest. The bonds matured serially to January 1, 1943. Plaintiff is the holder of $31,000 principal of such bonds, 15 of which matured on January 1, 1935, and 16 on January 1, 1936, the principal of which was not paid when plaintiff commenced his action; the interest was not paid for the last half of 1935 on the 16 bonds. Since the commencement of the action there has been paid the principal of the 15 bonds and $650 on each of the 16 bonds together with $19.50 on each of the interest coupons for the last half of 1936. Prior to the commencement of the action and on October 6, 1938, plaintiff demanded payment of the bonds which was refused, but the bonds were registered by the treasurer. He demands interest at 7 per cent per annum on the principal and the unpaid interest coupons from maturity.

In the Bekins case plaintiff alleges that defendant Reclamation District No. 1500, was created by a special act of the Legislature in 1913 (Stats.1913, p. 130), and issued bonds in 1920, having interest coupons bearing 6 per cent payable semiannually attached thereto. Plaintiff owns three bonds of this district maturing January 1, 1936, and two maturing January 1, 1938. Payment of said bonds was refused. Later the principal and interest coupons on said bonds were paid, but payment of interest on the principal since maturity was refused. Plaintiff claims such interest on a 7 per cent rate basis.

Demurrers were sustained to the complaints in both actions and judgments entered that plaintiffs take nothing.

It appears that defendant district in the Irvine action was organized prior to 1913, and thereafter Reclamation District No.

729 was consolidated therewith and reorganized, which consolidation was approved by the Legislature, and the Political Code provisions on reclamation districts made applicable. Stats.1913, ch. 62, p. 62. The reorganization was again ratified and validated in 1915, 1917, and 1919. Stats.1915, p. 559; Stats.1917, p. 1219; Stats.1919, p. 357.

The course of the decisions in this state upon the two questions of whether or not government bonds bear interest after maturity and whether the interest coupons bear interest after maturity is devious and confusing. In Beals v. Board of Supervisors, 28 Cal. 449, an indebtedness of one county was imposed on another by the Legislature. No bonds were involved. The debtor county issued a warrant to the creditor county, which upon presentation was refused payment because of lack of funds. Demand of an assignee for the payment of interest on the warrant was refused. The court denied recovery of interest because the statute imposing the obligation did not mention interest, there was no express contract for interest, no rule of law independent of statute required interest, and a general statute authorizing interest on warrants should not be applied because the statute imposing the debt fixed the obligation as only the principal and provided for a special fund out of which it was to be paid. Relying upon the Beals case, the rule was announced in Soher v. Supervisors of Calaveras Co., 39 Cal. 134, that where no provision is made in the statute under which the bonds are issued for interest after maturity on county bonds, none is payable. In Kendall v. Porter, 120 Cal. 106, 110, 45 P. 333, 334, 52 P. 143, the Beals case was distinguished on the ground that the obligation was legislatively imposed and was not a contract like a bond. The Soher case was disapproved, because it was based on a false assumption of the holding in the Beals case. The Kendall case involved municipal bonds and stated the rule to be that:

"The statute being thus the measure of the bondholders' rights, it becomes important to consider its provisions in relation to the interest upon the bonds; for the bondholders will be entitled to just such interest, and no other, as by a fair intentment the statute provides that they shall have. * * *" It would appear from the rule that no interest is payable after maturity unless the statute so provides. The statute there involved did not expressly provide one way or the other and the court went on to say: "It is a rule so general and well established that it is not even controverted by respondents in this case that interest bearing coupon bonds continue to bear interest after their maturity."

"To take these bonds out of the operation of this rule, there must be pointed out some language in the statute evincive of an intent so to do; some declaration which will justify the court in saying that it was designed that the interest should cease upon the maturity of the bonds. * * *

(Italics added.) It therefore appears that the court intended to announce the general rule, that where government bonds are issued which provide for interest, the interest continues after maturity, even though there are interest coupons attached thereto covering only the period before maturity, unless there is some provision in the authorizing statute evincing an intent that they should not bear such interest. That view is further fortified by the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Beatty in which he cites the cases of Sawyer v. Colgan, 102 Cal. 283, 36 P. 580, 834 and Hopkins v. Contra Costa County, 106 Cal. 566, 39 P. 933. Those cases must be deemed to have been overruled by the Kendall case. Moreover, the Hopkins case may be distinguished in that it merely announced the general rule that interest does not run on a claim against the state in the absence of a statute imposing it and that general provisions for interest (section 1917 of the Civil Code then provided for interest at 7 per cent on moneys after they became due unless the contract was to the contrary, and section 3287 allowed interest on damages which were certain) do not apply to the state, whereas in the case of bonds being issued that do bear interest, it may yet be said the interest continues after maturity. However, the Sawyer case is clearly contrary to the Kendall case. The Kendall case was followed by Meyer v. City & County of San Francisco, 150 Cal. 131, 88 P. 722, 10 L.R. A., N.S., 110, where it was held that bonds for street improvements to be paid by special assessments did not bear interest after maturity because the authorizing statute should not be so construed. The court seemed impressed by the special assessment feature as the sole source of payment of the bonds, and that there would not be sufficient funds raised thereby to pay post maturity interest. That is not wholly persuasive because it may be that, although the assessment was intended to be sufficient to pay the principal, by virtue of delinquencies, it might not be. It may have some bearing as indicating the legislative intent with reference to interest continuing. Although the Meyer case purports to distinguish the Kendall case it is fundamentally opposed to it for it does not accept the rule that interest on bonds continues after maturity unless the statute evinces a contrary intent. Rather it assumes such interest does not accrue unless the authorizing statutes expressly so provide.

[1-3] There are cases which hold generally that interest will not run against the government on its obligations in the absence of special statutory authority and that general statutes providing for interest are not applicable. See McNutt v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 245, 201 P. 592, action for damages for change in grade of street; Savings, etc., Soc., v. City and County of San Francisco, 131 Cal. 356, 63 P. 665; Columbia Sav. Bank v. Los Angeles County, 137 Cal. 467, 70 P. 308; Miller v. County of Kern, 150 Cal. 797, 90 P. 119; Spencer v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 103, 179 P. 163; Kern Valley W. Co. v. County of Kern, 150 Cal. 801, 90 P. 121; see Lockhart v. Wolden, 17 Cal.2d 628, 633, 111 P.2d 319; United Taxpayers' Co. v. City and County of San Francisco, 55 Cal. App. 239, 203 P. 120; Birch v. Board of Supervisors, 191 Cal. 235, 215 P. 903; probably the weight of authority is to the contrary, see Schlesinger v. State, 195 Wis. 366, 218 N.W. 440, 57 A.L.R. 357; 76 A.L.R. 1012; Hahne Realty Corp. v. City of Newark, 119 N.J.L. 12, 194 A. 191, 112 A.L.R. 1183; actions to recover taxes illegally levied, Engelbreton v. City of San Diego, 185 Cal. 475, 197 P. 651; Los Angeles Dredging Co. v. City of Long Beach, 210 Cal. 348, 291 P. 839, 71 A.L.R. 161; Reclamation D. No. 1500 v. Reclamation Bd., 197 Cal. 482, 241 P. 552; Powell v. City of Los Angeles, 95 Cal.App. 151, 272 P. 336; see Sheehan v. Board of Police Com'rs., 188 Cal. 525, 206 P. 70. But there is a clear distinction between an obligation of the government which makes no mention of interest and an obligation such as a bond where the authorizing law and the bond itself provide for interest. See City of Indianola v. Gates, 181 Miss. 145, 179 So. 284. Even if we accept the general proposition that government obligations do not bear interest in the absence of statutory provision therefor, where the statute states that the bond shall bear interest the only reasonable implication is that it shall continue to bear interest after maturity. Government bonds are ordinarily classed with negotiable instruments and pass freely from hand to hand. They are the solemn and binding obligation of the government. There is little doubt that it is the understanding of the purchasers of such bonds that the interest does not cease when the bond matures and the maker defaults. The interest accruing after maturity is not accurately speaking damages, rather it is an implied part of the basic contract. We see no derogation of sovereign immunity in that conclusion. Certainly considerations of merchantability and justice require that to that extent the government be placed in the same category as private individuals issuing bonds. Many cases have held that nongovernmental negotiable instruments bear interest after maturity at the same rate as stipulated for before maturity. See Kohler v. Smith, 2 Cal. 597, 56 Am.Dec. 369; Casey v. Gibbons, 136 Cal. 368, 68 P. 1032; Guy v. Franklin, 5 Cal. 416; Molera v. Cooper, 173 Cal. 259, 160 P. 231; Puppo v. Larosa, 194 Cal. 717, 230 P. 439; Nesbit v. MacDonald, 203 Cal. 219, 263 P. 1007. Although those cases may have been primarily concerned with the rate of the interest after maturity, yet they implicitly hold that interest does run after maturity. Some of them base their conclusion on section 3289 of the Civil Code which reads: "Any legal rate of interest stipulated by a contract remains chargeable after a breach thereof, as before, until the contract is superseded by a verdict or other new obligation." Others do not. They indicate the distinction between an obligation which does not call for interest at all and one that provides for interest before maturity but is silent as to interest thereafter, thus conveying the thought that allowance of interest after maturity is an implied part of the contract rather than damages for the wrongful detention of money. See Casey v. Gibbons, supra, 136 Cal. at page 371, 68 P. at page 1034, distinguishing Malone v. Roy, 107 Cal. 518, 40 P. 1040. It is said in Nesbit v. MacDonald, supra, 203 Cal. at page 222, 263 P. at page 1008, involving a promissory note that did not provide for any interest:

"In a case of this character the interest is not recoverable by virtue of any provision of the note or contract, but is in the nature of damages for detention of the debt. Furthermore, a prayer for 'interest,' without specifying the rate, is deemed a prayer for legal interest. * * *

"This very question was before the court in the case of Puppo v. Larosa, 194 Cal. 717, 720, 721, 230 P. 439, 440, and it was there said: 'The promissory note by its terms bore no interest. The trial court allowed legal interest thereon from the date of its maturity. * * * If, * * * interest is not expressly reserved, and the paper matures at a time certain, it will draw interest from its maturity by operation of law without prior demand, and at the legal rate. In such case interest is in the nature of damages for the detention of the debt, and is not recoverable by virtue of any provision of the contract. (Civ.Code, § 3302; Gray v. Bekins, 186 Cal. 389, 399, 199 P. 767; 8 Cor.Jur., pp. 1095, 1096, secs. 1425-1427.) * * * The fact that the contract provides for no interest has nothing whatever to do with the damages due after the breach of the condition for payment on the due date of the note. * * * The action of the trial court in allowing legal interest on the amount due was, therefore, correct.'" (Italics added.) As stated before there is no invasion of sovereign immunity in applying the above principles to a government bond, or concluding that section 3289 of the Civil Code is applicable. It does nothing more than announce a rule that is fair and just and which should be applied by the court without reference to that section. The foregoing views are in accord with the rule enunciated in Kendall v. Porter, supra, and, as it appears that Meyer v. City & County of San Francisco, supra, is obviously inconsistent with that view it must be disapproved except to the extent that it may be said to have been justified on the ground that the authorizing statute there involved indicated that no interest would run after maturity. Bullard v. Riverside County Drainage Dist., 41 Cal. App.2d 900, 107 P.2d 929, being based on the Meyer case must be likewise disapproved.

It has been determined in cases in other states, although there is contrary authority, that governmental bonds bearing interest continue to bear interest after maturity. State v. Village of Brooklyn, 141 Ohio St. 593, 49 N.E.2d 684; City of Indianola v. Gates, supra; Peoples Bank & Trust Co. v. Sabougla Drainage Dist., 186 Miss. 539, 191 So. 93, 824; see 44 C.J. 1236; Jones, Bonds & Securities, 4th Ed., §§ 735, 739; Quindry, Bonds and Bondholders, § 122; McQuillen, Municipal Corps., 2d Ed., vol. 6, § 2431. It is aptly said in Peoples Bank & Trust Co. v. Sabougla Drainage Dist., supra:

"The sole question for determination in this case, * * * is whether interest is recoverable on the bonds and interest coupons of the drainage district after maturity and until paid. This question was answered in the affirmative in the recent decision in City of Indianola v. Gates, 181 Miss. 145, 179 So. 284, in respect to municipal bonds, and we see no sound reason for any distinction between municipal bonds and those of other political or taxing districts of the State, such as drainage districts.

"If it could be supposed that as to any of the subdivisions of the State, whether of counties, municipalities or districts, no interest after maturity could be recovered on their bonds issued for borrowed money, such bonds would be unsalable at any advantageous price; and we must assume that the legislature never for a moment thought that the statutes would be fairly capable of any such an interpretation as would bring about that self-destructive result."

Many of the authorities involve municipal corporations as distinguished from a state agency such as a county but we see no sound reason to apply a different rule.

[4] With regard to interest on the interest coupons on bonds after maturity of the coupons we find that the matter has been considered in several cases, the holding being that they do not bear interest after the maturity of the coupon. Davis v. Porter, 66 Cal. 658, 6 P. 746; Bates v. Gerber, 82 Cal. 550, 22 P. 1115; Molineux v. State of California, 109 Cal. 378, 42 P. 34, 50 Am.St.Rep. 49; Davis v. State, 121 Cal. 210, 53 P. 555; Hewel v. Hogin, 3 Cal.App. 248, 255, 84 P. 1002. Davis v. County of Yuba, 75 Cal. 452, 13 P. 874, 17 P. 533, took a contrary view but it was overruled in Hopkins v. Contra Costa County, 106 Cal. 566, 39 P. 933. It has been said that by the weight of authority interest coupons do bear interest. Jones, Bonds & Bond Securities, vol. 2, § 735; 27 A.L.R. 83. There is a difference between interest on interest coupons and on the principal of matured bonds. In the latter case the bonds call for interest and even though the statute is silent upon the question of interest after maturity that result should follow by necessary implication. There is ordinarily no provision for interest on the interest coupons at any time and hence we must apply the general rule announced in the cases heretofore cited (McNutt v. City of Los Angeles, supra, et seq.) that interest will not run against a government obligation unless it is imposed by statute or authorized contract.

[5] With the foregoing in mind we turn to the statute under which the bonds in the instant cases were issued to determine if, with reference to interest on the bonds after maturity, the statute evinces an intent that it should not continue, and, in regard to interest on interest coupons, provision is made for such interest. The bonds in the Irvine case were issued in 1925 under section 3480 of the Political Code which provided at that time that an election shall be held to decide whether bonds shall be issued in the amount of assessments levied. If the bonds are authorized by the election they shall be of certain denominations and shall "bear interest at a rate not to exceed six per cent per annum, payable semi-annually on the first day of January and the first day of July in each year at the office of said county treasurer upon the presentation of the proper coupons therefor. Coupons for each installment of interest shall be attached to said bonds and shall bear the facsimile signature of the county auditor. The principal of said bonds shall be made payable on the first day of July, or the first day of January, and in such years as the trustees may prescribe, but said bonds shall be payable serially within twenty years from their date in the manner following, to wit: (1) Not less than ten per centum * * * within ten years from their date. (2) Not less than ten per centum of the aggregate face value of bonds remaining unpaid at the end of ten years shall be payable each year beginning with the eleventh year from their date, until the whole amount of said bonds has been paid. Said bonds shall be substantially in the following form: * * * Reclamation District No. —, * * * promises to pay to the holder hereof at the office of the treasurer * * * on the first day of —, 19—, the sum of $—, * * * with interest thereon in like gold coin from date hereof until paid, at the rate of — per cent, per annum, payable at the office of said treasurer semi-annually on the first day of January and the first day of July in each year on presentation and surrender of the interest coupons hereto attached. This bond * * * is based upon and secured by an assessment levied on the lands in said district, * * *. And the interest coupons may be substantially in the following form: No. _____ $_____ The county treasurer of _____ county, California, will pay to the holder hereof on the _____ day of _____ 19____, at his office in said county of _____ the sum of $_____ in gold coin of the United States out of the funds of Reclamation District No. _____ for interest on bond of said district numbered _____. * * * All moneys collected by any county treasurer upon any assessment upon which bonds shall have been issued, including all moneys derived from sale of land for delinquent installments, or from redemption thereof, or from sale of lands bought by the treasurer at any such sale, shall be by such treasurer forthwith paid into the main county treasury to the credit of the bond fund of such reclamation district, and shall be used exclusively for the payment of principal and interest of said bonds issued on such assessment, * * *. The lien of any unpaid assessment upon which bonds shall have been issued shall continue until all said bonds, and any refunding bonds which may be issued, shall have been paid in full, and if for any reason any part of such principal or interest of said bonds, or of refunding bonds shall remain unpaid after enforcement of said assessment as in this article provided, the board of supervisors of the main county shall order an additional or supplemental assessment to be made as provided in section three thousand four hundred fifty-nine, sufficient to pay such unpaid principal and interest; * * *. Where bonds of the district have been authorized to be issued on such assessments all unpaid assessments shall bear interest at the rate of seven per cent per annum from the date of the bonds originally issued thereon until such bonds and any refunding bonds issued thereon shall have been fully paid and discharged, and the interest due at any time on said unpaid assessments may be called without calling any installment of the said assessment. The word installment as used in this section shall be construed as applying to interest as well as the principal as the case may be.

"At least ninety days before any interest date of the bonds, including refunding bonds, the county treasurer of the main county shall estimate the amount of money necessary to pay interest and principal maturing on such interest date after crediting thereon the funds in the treasury applicable to the payment thereof, and shall add thereto fifteen per cent of such aggregate sum to cover possible delinquencies. * * * The treasurer shall credit to the bond fund of the district all money collected by him by sale or otherwise, upon assessments against which bonds shall have been issued, including interest and penalties, and he shall likewise credit to said fund the amounts of purchase money paid in bonds or coupons on sales made for said assessments. * * * Any parcel of land bid in and purchased by a treasurer as aforesaid, as trustee of the bond fund of the district, may be sold * * * by him * * * at any time after the expiration of said redemption period of one year, * * * to any person paying him the amount for which said parcel was bid in by said treasurer at delinquent sale, with interest thereon at the date of seven per cent per annum, compounded yearly, from the date of said delinquent sale, and also the amount of all subsequent installments then delinquent, with accrued interest and penalties thereon. * * * Any balance remaining in such bond fund, after payment in full of the principal and interest of all outstanding bonds of the district, shall be by the treasurer transferred to the general fund of the district. * * * All bonds hereafter issued under this section or under section three thousand four hundred eighty and one-half shall contain a provision as follows: 'This bond is callable, in the manner provided by law, for payment on only interest-payment date, at its face value plus a premium of two per cent; and whenever, on or after such date, funds are provided for payment, interest hereon shall cease.' * * * the county treasurer, * * * shall publish a notice wherein he shall set forth said order of the trustees and shall notify all holders of said bonds to present the same for payment on the date specified and that whenever, on or after such date, funds are received by him for payment of said bonds with a premium of two per cent all interest thereon shall cease." (Italics added.) Deering's 1923, Pol.Code.

Prior to its amendment in 1917, that section made specific provisions concerning interest stating: "If any coupon shall not be paid when presented because there are no funds, the treasurer shall indorse such coupon 'not paid for want of funds' and thereafter the amount due on such coupon shall bear interest at the rate of six per cent per annum compounded semi-annually. * * * If any bond shall not be presented for payment when the same becomes due, it shall cease to draw interest, but, if presented at such time and not paid for want of funds, the said county treasurer shall so indorse it and thereafter such bond shall draw interest until paid at said rate of six per centum per annum compounded semi-annually, until funds shall have been provided for its payment, * * *." Stats.1911, pp. 639, 650. Those sentences were eliminated by the 1917 amendment.

In the Bekins case at least a portion of the bonds were refunding bonds issued under section 3480a of the Political Code, formerly section 3480½. The provisions of that section are substantially the same as those of section 3480, in respect to the interest and form of bond.

[6] We find nothing in either of those sections which indicate that the bonds shall not bear interest after maturity or that the interest coupons shall bear interest. Indeed both acts in setting forth the form of the bond affirmatively specify that it shall bear interest until paid. While it does go on to state that the interest shall be payable semiannually on presentation of the interest coupon, that clause must refer to the interest before maturity and does not limit the major clause calling for interest until paid. With reference to the bonds issued under section 3480, it is plain from the reading of that section before its amendment in 1917 that interest did continue on the bonds after maturity but that it shall cease unless the bonds are presented and certain conditions exist. The elimination of that clause may be said to evince the thought that while interest continues, the restrictions on that continuance are no longer effective. In regard to coupons, interest was expressly authorized prior to the amendment under certain conditions only. The elimination of those conditions indicates an intention that coupons under the amended act shall not bear interest. It is also of interest to note that prior to the amendment of section 3480 in 1917, the form of the bond did not contain the phrase that it should bear interest from date until paid. The provision for attaching interest coupons to the bonds and payment thereof upon presentation to the treasurer is merely a method for having the interest before maturity represented by coupons. Although there is no provision for the attachment of coupons for post maturity interest, the obvious reason for the absence of such provision is that it is not known whether the bonds will not be paid at maturity, and if not, how long thereafter payment will be delayed. Hence, it is not practicable to attach post maturity interest coupons to the bonds upon issuance. That reasoning does not refute the implication that the bonds continue to bear interest after maturity for the implication arises from the contract and the contingency that the principal may not be paid at maturity. Usually it is contemplated that a debtor or maker of a negotiable instrument will pay the obligation according to his promise, but that does not eliminate the practical supposition that he may not, or establish the proposition that he does not intend to have the interest continue after maturity.

[7] Defendants contend that the statute contains no provision for realizing funds for the payment of interest after maturity or for the payment thereof and hence evinces a legislative intent that none shall be payable. That argument is of doubtful persuasiveness in view of the clear implication in the statute that bonds do bear interest after maturity. If there is no other source for the payment of the bonds than that designated, and that is a part of the agreement, it might mean that the bondholder would never receive the full amount of the principal, but it would not indicate an intent that the principal was not payable under any circumstances. The same is true of the interest on the principal after maturity, which is an implied part of the bond. In any event we do not believe the statute is susceptible of that construction. The particular portion of section 3480 above mentioned states that within ninety days before any interest payable date of the bonds, the treasurer shall estimate the amount of money necessary to pay the interest and principal maturing on the interest payable date after crediting the funds on hand, and adding 15 per cent to cover delinquencies. Defendants claim the periods above-mentioned are for calls for the payment of assessments, and only at the time of the maturity dates of the bonds and coupons. But it is not to be supposed that the assessments on which the payment of the bonds are based would not include sufficient to pay interest after maturity. It will be noted that the provision as to calls does not refer to payment of coupons. It refers to interest generally which may well include interest after maturity. Presumably the assessment is levied in the first instance to pay for the reclamation project or other expenses, and the bonds are a method of financing those obligations. The bonds are issued in an "amount equal to the amount of such assessment, or the part of such assessment remaining unpaid." Nothing is there said about interest before or after maturity, but it is not to be supposed that those words require that the assessment and the principal of the bonds be equal, thus excluding even interest before maturity. Defendants rely upon Bekins v. Raub, 40 Cal.App. 2d 709, 105 P.2d 625, as establishing that there may not be calls for assessments after maturity to pay interest, but that case merely involved the question of whether the treasurer could be compelled by mandamus to include in a call the amount necessary to pay bonds that had matured but which had not been paid out of funds raised by a previous call because section 3480 permitted the use of bonds maturing in the future to pay an assessment on a call therefor, thus leaving insufficient cash to pay maturing bonds. That does not mean that those maturing bonds were not to be paid. In the instant actions we are not concerned with when or in what manner the post maturity interest should be paid. If such interest is payable the demurrers should not have been sustained and plaintiffs are entitled to an adjudication of their rights. We find nothing in that case to indicate that the current interest after maturity may not be met by current calls for assessments. Indeed, if the doctrine announced in Bekins v. Raub, supra, and Copeland v. Raub, 36 Cal.App. 2d 441, 97 P.2d 859, is correct, the clear indication is that bonds do bear interest after maturity. In the Copeland case it was held that the provision in section 3480 of the Political Code, before its amendment in 1933 (Stats.1933, p. 1211), limiting the payment of assessments with bonds, to bonds maturing before 90 days after the call, authorized the use of both matured and unmatured bonds to pay assessments. Thereafter the Bekins case held that the treasurer could not be compelled to include in his assessment call any amount to pay bonds that had matured at the time of a prior call but were unpaid for the lack of funds at that time due to assessments having been paid in the prior call by unmatured bonds rather than cash. It cannot be presumed that the Legislature intended to achieve the unjust result that, although the bondhold-er's bonds were not paid for the above reasons, and could not be paid by subsequent assessment calls and possibly not until all of the assessments had been enforced (see Rohwer v. Gibson, 126 Cal.App. 707, 14 P. 2d 1051), the bondholder would not be entitled to interest during that period.

There is a method provided by the Legislature in which the bonds may be refinanced and many of the difficulties arising out of the original financing program eliminated. Section 3480a (formerly 3480½) of the Political Code authorizes such refinancing of bonds issued under section 3480 by issuing refunding bonds for all or part of the installments of principal of outstanding bonds. Those bonds bear interest at not exceeding 6 per cent "from the dates, respectively, on which the bonds to be refunded shall mature." Thus the refunding bonds are in a sense a renewal of the old bonds, and the interest payable is in effect, the interest that would have accrued after maturity of the old bonds if they had not been refunded. The same assessments which secured the old bonds secure the refunding bonds. Section 3480a provides:

[8] "The principal and interest of refunding bonds shall be based on and payable out of the assessment or assessments upon which the bonds so refunded were payable, in accordance with the provisions of section 3480 of this code." One of the purposes of the statute authorizing the issuance of refunding bonds was to provide for the payment of post maturity interest on the old bonds by a regular and systematic scheme which may well be advantageous to the governmental agency. Implicit in that purpose is the thought that interest continues after maturity where no refunding bonds are issued. Moreover, inasmuch as the interest on the refunding bonds is in effect post maturity interest on the old bonds, and the same assessments stand as security, the reasonable implication is that such assessment in the first instance was intended to and did contemplate post maturity interest.

[9] Defendant complains that there is no source from which funds can be derived for the payment of post maturity interest, thus evincing a legislative intent that it is not payable. We have heretofore seen that the assessments do contemplate such interest and there are indications in the statute that such is the case. Also it will be remembered that the statute provides for supplemental assessments when "any part of the principal or interest of said bonds * * * shall remain unpaid after enforcement of the assessments." Even if we assume that the supplemental assessment may not be made until all the bonds mature, and all steps for the enforcement of the assessment have been taken, and only when the supplemental assessment will not exceed the value of the benefits to the landowners from the project (see Rohwer v. Gibson, supra), that does not preclude the running of interest after maturity. Although the interest may run for a long time before the supplemental assessment is made, it cannot be said that economic chaos for the district will follow. It has its relief by way of refunding bond issues which have proven effective to relieve such districts of financial pressure.

There are affirmative indications that the original assessment is the source for the payment of post maturity interest as well as the principal and ante maturity interest. Although not conclusive and possibly subject to other interpretations, taken with the act as a whole, they certainly tend to show that there is no prohibition in the statute against the payment of such interest. We are not in a position to work out the minute details of the amounts that may be realized from those sources or precisely to what extent they extend to such interest, but we are concerned rather with the legislative intent. The statute provides that the lien of any unpaid assessment shall continue until the bonds shall have been paid in full. The unpaid assessments bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from the date the bonds are issued until the bonds are "fully paid and discharged." The maximum rate of interest on the bonds is 6 per cent. When the treasurer makes a call he shall add 15 per cent of the amount estimated to be required to cover possible delinquencies. A penalty of 10 per cent is added for delinquency in payment of assessments, and both a redemptioner and a purchaser after the redemption period must pay interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum. Various other penalties are imposed and all of the funds thereby realized are payable into the bond fund.

[10] On the whole we think that the legislative intent is clear that post maturity interest is recoverable on the bonds involved in the instant actions, but is not recoverable on the interest coupons attached thereto.

For the foregoing reasons the judgments are and each of them is, reversed.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 3, 1944.

1. Negligence ⇨121(2)

"Res ipsa loquitur" does not apply unless defendant had exclusive control of thing causing the injury and the accident is of such a nature that it ordinarily would not occur in the absence of negligence by the defendant.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Res Ipsa Loquitur".

2. Negligence ⇨121(2)

Res ipsa loquitur may be applied upon theory that defendant had control at the time of the alleged negligent act although not at the time of the accident, provided plaintiff first proves that the condition of the instrumentality had not been changed after it left the defendant's possession.

3. Negligence ⇨121(3)

In action by waitress for injuries sustained when a bottle of carbonated beverage exploded, plaintiff relying upon res ipsa loquitur was required to prove that she handled the bottle carefully.

4. Negligence ⇨121(3)

In action by waitress for injuries sustained when bottle of carbonated beverage exploded, it was not necessary that plaintiff eliminate every remote possibility of injury to bottle after defendant lost control in order that res ipsa loquitur might be relied upon, but it was sufficient if there was evidence permitting a reasonable inference that bottle was not accessible to extraneous harmful forces and that it was carefully handled by plaintiff, or by any third person who may have moved or touched it.

5. Negligence ⇐136(12)

Where waitress suing for injuries sustained when bottle of carbonated beverage exploded adduces evidence permitting a reasonable inference that bottle was not accessible to extraneous harmful forces and that it was carefully handled by plaintiff or any third person who may have moved or touched it after defendant had lost control thereof, defendant's negligence becomes a question for the trier of facts.

6. Negligence ⇐134(10)

In action by waitress for injuries sustained when bottle of carbonated beverage exploded, evidence supported a reasonable inference that the bottle was not damaged by any extraneous force after delivery to restaurant by defendant.

7. Negligence ⇐121(3)

Where one relies on res ipsa loquitur in action for injuries resulting from explosion of bottle of carbonated beverage, it must appear that bottles of carbonated liquid are not ordinarily defective without negligence by the bottling company.

8. Evidence ⇐7

It is common knowledge that an overcharge of a bottle of carbonated beverage would not ordinarily result without negligence.

9. Negligence ⇐27

If bottling company negligently failed to discover defective bottle containing a safe pressure of carbonated liquid, company would be liable for injuries from an explosion resulting from a defective bottle.

10. Negligence ⇐121(3)

If defect in bottle containing safe pressure of carbonated liquid is visible, an inference of negligence would arise from failure of bottling company to discover defect.

11. Negligence ⇐121(3)

Where defects are discoverable, it may be assumed that they will not ordinarily escape detection if a reasonable inspection is made, and if such a defect is overlooked, an inference arises that a proper inspection was not made.

12. Negligence ⇐121(3)

In action by waitress for injuries sustained when bottle of carbonated beverage exploded, evidence entitled plaintiff to rely on doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

13. Negligence ⇐136(12)

When a defendant produces evidence to rebut inference of negligence which arises upon application of doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, it is ordinarily a question of fact for jury to determine whether the inference has been dispelled.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; James D. Garibaldi, Judge.

Action by Gladys Escola against Coca Cola Bottling Company of Fresno for injuries sustained when a bottle containing a carbonated beverage exploded. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Prior opinion, 140 P.2d 107.

H. K. Landram, of Merced, for appellant.

C. Ray Robinson, Willard B. Treadwell, Dean S. Leshner, and Loraine B. Rogers, all of Merced, and Belli & Leahy and Melvin M. Belli, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

Plaintiff, a waitress in a restaurant, was injured when a bottle of Coca Cola broke in her hand. She alleged that defendant company, which had bottled and delivered the alleged defective bottle to her employer, was negligent in selling "bottles containing said beverage which on account of excessive pressure of gas or by reason of some defect in the bottle was dangerous * * * and likely to explode." This appeal is from a judgment upon a jury verdict in favor of plaintiff.

Defendant's driver delivered several cases of Coca Cola to the restaurant, placing them on the floor, one on top of the other, under and behind the counter, where they remained at least thirty-six hours. Immediately before the accident, plaintiff picked up the top case and set it upon a near-by ice cream cabinet in front of and about three feet from the refrigerator. She then proceeded to take the bottles from the case with her right hand, one at a time, and put them into the refrigerator. Plaintiff testified that after she had placed three bottles in the refrigerator and had moved the fourth bottle about 18 inches from the case "it exploded in my hand." The bottle broke into two jagged pieces and inflicted a deep five-inch cut, severing blood vessels, nerves and muscles of the thumb and palm of the hand. Plaintiff further testified that when the bottle exploded, "It made a sound similar to an electric light bulb that would have dropped. It made a loud pop." Plaintiff's employer testified, "I was about twenty feet from where it actually happened and I heard the explosion." A fellow employee, on the opposite side of the counter, testified that plaintiff "had the bottle, I should judge, waist high, and I know that it didn't bang either the case or the door or another bottle * * * when it popped. It sounded just like a fruit jar would blow up * * *." The witness further testified that the contents of the bottle "flew all over herself and myself and the walls and one thing and another."

The top portion of the bottle, with the cap, remained in plaintiff's hand, and the lower portion fell to the floor but did not break. The broken bottle was not produced at the trial, the pieces having been thrown away by an employee of the restaurant shortly after the accident. Plaintiff, however, described the broken pieces, and a diagram of the bottle was made showing the location of the "fracture line" where the bottle broke in two.

One of defendant's drivers, called as a witness by plaintiff, testified that he had seen other bottles of Coca Cola in the past explode and had found broken bottles in the warehouse when he took the cases out, but that he did not know what made them blow up.

Plaintiff then rested her case, having announced to the court that being unable to show any specific acts of negligence she relied completely on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

Defendant contends that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply in this case, and that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment.

Many jurisdictions have applied the doctrine in cases involving exploding bottles of carbonated beverages. See Payne v. Rome Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 10 Ga.App. 762, 73 S.E. 1087; Stolle v. Anheuser-

Busch, 307 Mo. 520, 271 S.W. 497, 39 A.L.R. 1001; Bradley v. Conway Springs Bottling Co., 154 Kan. 282, 118 P.2d 601; Ortego v. Nehi Bottling Works, 199 La. 599, 6 So.2d 677; MacPherson v. Canada Dry Ginger Ale, Inc., 129 N.J.L. 365, 29 A.2d 868; Macres v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 290 Mich. 567, 287 N.W. 922; Benken-dorfer v. Garrett, Tex.Civ.App., 143 S.W. 2d 1020. Other courts for varying reasons have refused to apply the doctrine in such cases. See Gerber v. Faber, 54 Cal.App.2d 674, 129 P.2d 485; Loebig's Guardian v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 259 Ky. 124, 81 S.W.2d 910; Stewart v. Crystal Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 50 Ariz. 60, 68 P.2d 952; Glaser v. Seitz, 35 Misc. 341, 71 N.Y.S. 942; Lucians v. John Morgan, Inc., 267 App.Div. 785, 45 N.Y.S.2d 502; cf. Berkens v. Denver Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 109 Colo. 140, 122 P.2d 884; Ruffin v. Coca Cola Bottling Co., 311 Mass. 514, 42 N.E.2d 259; Slack v. Premier-Pabst Corporation, 1 Terry 97, 40 Del. 97, 5 A.2d 516; Wheeler v. Laurel Bottling Works, 111 Miss. 442, 71 So. 743, L.R.A.1916E, 1074; Seven-Up Bottling Co. v. Gretes, 182 Va. 138, 27 S.E.2d 925; Dail v. Taylor, 151 N.C. 284, 66 S.E. 135, 28 L.R.A.,N.S., 949. It would serve no useful purpose to discuss the reasoning of the foregoing cases in detail, since the problem is whether under the facts shown in the instant case the conditions warranting application of the doctrine have been satisfied.

[1] Res ipsa loquitur does not apply unless (1) defendant had exclusive control of the thing causing the injury and (2) the accident is of such a nature that it ordinarily would not occur in the absence of negligence by the defendant. Honea v. City Dairy, Inc., 22 Cal.2d 614, 616, 617, 140 P.2d 369, and authorities there cited; cf. Hinds v. Wheadon, 19 Cal.2d 458, 461, 121 P.2d 724; Prosser on Torts [1941], 293-301.

[2-5] Many authorities state that the happening of the accident does not speak for itself where it took place some time after defendant had relinquished control of the instrumentality causing the injury. Under the more logical view, however, the doctrine may be applied upon the theory that defendant had control at the time of the alleged negligent act, although not at the time of the accident, provided plaintiff first proves that the condition of the instrumentality had not been changed after it left the defendant's possession. See cases collected in Honea v. City Dairy, Inc., 22 Cal.2d 614, 617, 618, 140 P.2d 369. As said in Dunn v. Hoffman Beverage Co., 126 N.J.L. 556, 20 A.2d 352, 354, "defendant is not charged with the duty of showing affirmatively that something happened to the bottle after it left its control or management; * * * to get to the jury the plaintiff must show that there was due care during that period." Plaintiff must also prove that she handled the bottle carefully. The reason for this prerequisite is set forth in Prosser on Torts, supra, at page 300, where the author states: "Allied to the condition of exclusive control in the defendant is that of absence of any action on the part of the plaintiff contributing to the accident. Its purpose, of course, is to eliminate the possibility that it was the plaintiff who was responsible. If the boiler of a locomotive explodes while the plaintiff engineer is operating it, the inference of his own negligence is at least as great as that of the defendant, and res ipsa loquitur will not apply until he has accounted for his own conduct." See, also, Olson v. Whitthorne & Swan, 203 Cal. 206, 208, 209, 263 P. 518, 58 A.L.R. 129. It is not necessary, of course, that plaintiff eliminate every remote possibility of injury to the bottle after defendant lost control, and the requirement is satisfied if there is evidence permitting a reasonable inference that it was not accessible to extraneous harmful forces and that it was carefully handled by plaintiff or any third person who may have moved or touched it. Cf. Prosser, supra, p. 300. If such evidence is presented, the question becomes one for the trier of fact (see, e. g., MacPherson v. Canada Dry Ginger Ale, Inc., 129 N.J.L. 365, 29 A.2d 868, 869), and, accordingly, the issue should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions.

In the present case no instructions were requested or given on this phase of the case, although general instructions upon res ipsa loquitur were given. Defendant, however, has made no claim of error with reference thereto on this appeal.

[6] Upon an examination of the record, the evidence appears sufficient to support a reasonable inference that the bottle here involved was not damaged by any extraneous force after delivery to the restaurant by defendant. It follows, therefore, that the bottle was in some manner defective at the time defendant relinquished control, because sound and properly prepared bottles of carbonated liquids do not ordinarily explode when carefully handled.

[7] The next question, then, is whether plaintiff may rely upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to supply an inference that defendant's negligence was responsible for the defective condition of the bottle at the time it was delivered to the restaurant. Under the general rules pertaining to the doctrine, as set forth above, it must appear that bottles of carbonated liquid are not ordinarily defective without negligence by the bottling company. In 1 Shearman and Redfield on Negligence (Rev.Ed.1941), page 153, it is stated that: "The doctrine * * * requires evidence which shows at least the probability that a particular accident could not have occurred without legal wrong by the defendant."

An explosion such as took place here might have been caused by an excessive internal pressure in a sound bottle, by a defect in the glass of a bottle containing a safe pressure, or by a combination of these two possible causes. The question is whether under the evidence there was a probability that defendant was negligent in any of these respects. If so, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies.

[8-11] The bottle was admittedly charged with gas under pressure, and the charging of the bottle was within the exclusive control of defendant. As it is a matter of common knowledge that an overcharge would not ordinarily result without negligence, it follows under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur that if the bottle was in fact excessively charged an inference of defendant's negligence would arise. If the explosion resulted from a defective bottle containing a safe pressure, the defendant would be liable if it negligently failed to discover such flaw. If the defect were visible, an inference of negligence would arise from the failure of defendant to discover it. Where defects are discoverable, it may be assumed that they will not ordinarily escape detection if a reasonable inspection is made, and if such a defect is overlooked an inference arises that a proper inspection was not made. A difficult problem is presented where the defect is unknown and consequently might have been one not discoverable by a reasonable, practicable inspection. In the Honea case we refused to take judicial notice of the technical practices and information available to the bottling industry for finding defects which cannot be seen. In the present case, however, we are supplied with evidence of the standard methods used for testing bottles.

A chemical engineer for the Owens-Illinois Glass Company and its Pacific Coast subsidiary, maker of Coca Cola bottles, explained how glass is manufactured and the methods used in testing and inspecting bottles. He testified that his company is the largest manufacturer of glass containers in the United States, and that it uses the standard methods for testing bottles recommended by the glass containers association. A pressure test is made by taking a sample from each mold every three hours—approximately one out of every 600 bottles—and subjecting the sample to an internal pressure of 450 pounds per square inch, which is sustained for one minute. (The normal pressure in Coca Cola bottles is less than 50 pounds per square inch.) The sample bottles are also subjected to the standard thermal shock test. The witness stated that these tests are “pretty near” infallible.

It thus appears that there is available to the industry a commonly-used method of testing bottles for defects not apparent to the eye, which is almost infallible. Since Coca Cola bottles are subjected to these tests by the manufacturer, it is not likely that they contain defects when delivered to the bottler which are not discoverable by visual inspection. Both new and used bottles are filled and distributed by defendant. The used bottles are not again subjected to the tests referred to above, and it may be inferred that defects not discoverable by visual inspection do not develop in bottles after they are manufactured. Obviously, if such defects do occur in used bottles there is a duty upon the bottler to make appropriate tests before they are refilled, and if such tests are not commercially practicable the bottles should not be re-used. This would seem to be particularly true where a charged liquid is placed in the bottle. It follows that a defect which would make the bottle unsound could be discovered by reasonable and practicable tests.

[12] Although it is not clear in this case whether the explosion was caused by an excessive charge or a defect in the glass there is a sufficient showing that neither cause would ordinarily have been present if due care had been used. Further, defendant had exclusive control over both the charging and inspection of the bottles. Accordingly, all the requirements necessary to entitle plaintiff to rely on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to supply an inference of negligence are present.

[13] It is true that defendant presented evidence tending to show that it exercised considerable precaution by carefully regulating and checking the pressure in the bottles and by making visual inspections for defects in the glass at several stages during the bottling process. It is well settled, however, that when a defendant produces evidence to rebut the inference of negligence which arises upon application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, it is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the inference has been dispelled. Druzanich v. Criley, 19 Cal.2d 439, 444, 122 P.2d 53; Michener v. Hutton, 203 Cal. 604, 610, 265 P. 238, 59 A.L.R. 480.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCHAUER, JJ., concurred.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

I concur in the judgment, but I believe the manufacturer's negligence should no longer be singled out as the basis of a plaintiff's right to recover in cases like the present one. In my opinion it should now be recognized that a manufacturer incurs an absolute liability when an article that he has placed on the market, knowing that it is to be used without inspection, proves to have a defect that causes injury to human beings. MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co., 217 N.Y. 382, 111 N.E. 1050, L.R.A.1916F, 696, Ann.Cas.1916C, 440 established the principle, recognized by this court, that irrespective of privity of contract, the manufacturer is responsible for an injury caused by such an article to any person who comes in lawful contact with it. Sheward v. Virtue, 20 Cal.2d 410, 126 P.2d 345; Kalash v. Los Angeles Ladder Co., 1 Cal.2d 229, 34 P.2d 481. In these cases the source of the manufacturer's liability was his negligence in the manufacturing process or in the inspection of component parts supplied by others. Even if there is no negligence, however, public policy demands that responsibility be fixed wherever it will most effectively reduce the hazards to life and health inherent in defective products that reach the market. It is evident that the manufacturer can anticipate some hazards and guard against the recurrence of others, as the public cannot. Those who suffer injury from defective products are unprepared to meet its consequences. The cost of an injury and the loss of time or health may be an overwhelming misfortune to the person injured, and a needless one, for the risk of injury can be insured by the manufacturer and distributed among the public as a cost of doing business. It is to the public interest to discourage the marketing of products having defects that are a menace to the public. If such products nevertheless find their way into the market it is to the public interest to place the responsibility for whatever injury they may cause upon the manufacturer, who, even if he is not negligent in the manufacture of the product, is responsible for its reaching the market. However intermittently such injuries may occur and however haphazardly they may strike, the risk of their occurrence is a constant risk and a general one. Against such a risk there should be general and constant protection and the manufacturer is best situated to afford such protection.

The injury from a defective product does not become a matter of indifference because the defect arises from causes other than the negligence of the manufacturer, such as negligence of a submanufacturer of a component part whose defects could not be revealed by inspection (see Sheward v. Virtue, 20 Cal.2d 410, 126 P.2d 345; O'Rourke v. Day & Night Water Heater Co., Ltd., 31 Cal.App.2d 364, 88 P.2d 191; Smith v. Peerless Glass Co., 259 N.Y. 292, 181 N.E. 576), or unknown causes that even by the device of res ipsa loquitur cannot be classified as negligence of the manufacturer. The inference of negligence may be dispelled by an affirmative showing of proper care. If the evidence against the fact inferred is "clear, positive, uncontradicted, and of such a nature that it can not rationally be disbelieved, the court must instruct the jury that the nonexistence of the fact has been established as a matter of law." Blank v. Coffin, 20 Cal.2d 457, 461, 126 P.2d 868, 870. An injured person, however, is not ordinarily in a position to refute such evidence or identify the cause of the defect, for he can hardly be familiar with the manufacturing process as the manufacturer himself is. In leaving it to the jury to decide whether the inference has been dispelled, regardless of the evidence against it, the negligence rule approaches the rule of strict liability. It is needlessly circuitous to make negligence the basis of recovery and impose what is in reality liability without negligence. If public policy demands that a manufacturer of goods be responsible for their quality regardless of negligence there is no reason not to fix that responsibility openly.

In the case of foodstuffs, the public policy of the state is formulated in a criminal statute. Section 26510 of the Health and Safety Code, St.1939, p. 989, prohibits the manufacturing, preparing, compounding, packing, selling, offering for sale, or keeping for sale, or advertising within the state, of any adulterated food. Section 26470, St.1941, p. 2857, declares that food is adulterated when "it has been produced, prepared, packed or held under insanitary conditions whereby it may have become contaminated with filth, or whereby it may have been rendered diseased, unwholesome or injurious to health." The statute imposes criminal liability not only if the food is adulterated, but if its container, which may be a bottle (§ 26451, St. 1939, p. 983), has any deleterious substance (§ 26470(6)), or renders the product injurious to health (§ 26470(4)). The criminal liability under the statute attaches without proof of fault, so that the manufacturer is under the duty of ascertaining whether an article manufactured by him is safe. People v. Schwartz, 28 Cal.App.2d Supp. 775, 70 P.2d 1017. Statutes of this kind result in a strict liability of the manufacturer in tort to the member of the public injured. See cases cited in Prosser, Torts, p. 693, note 69.

The statute may well be applicable to a bottle whose defects cause it to explode. In any event it is significant that the statute imposes criminal liability without fault, reflecting the public policy of protecting the public from dangerous products placed on the market, irrespective of negligence in their manufacture. While the Legislature imposes criminal liability only with regard to food products and their containers, there are many other sources of danger. It is to the public interest to prevent injury to the public from any defective goods by the imposition of civil liability generally.

The retailer, even though not equipped to test a product, is under an absolute liability to his customer, for the implied warranties of fitness for proposed use and merchantable quality include a warranty of safety of the product. Goetten v. Owl Drug Co., 6 Cal.2d 683, 59 P.2d 142; Mix v. Ingersoll Candy Co., 6 Cal.2d 674, 59 P.2d 144; Gindraux v. Maurice Mercantile Co., 4 Cal.2d 206, 47 P.2d 708; Jensen v. Berris, 31 Cal.App.2d 537, 88 P.2d 220; Ryan v. Progressive Grocery Stores, 255 N.Y. 388, 175 N.E. 105, 74 A.L.R. 339; Race v. Krum, 222 N.Y. 410, 118 N.E. 853, L.R.A.1918F, 1172. This warranty is not necessarily a contractual one (Chamberlain Co. v. Allis-Chalmers, etc., Co., 51 Cal.App.2d 520, 524, 125 P.2d 113; see 1 Williston on Sales, 2d ed., §§ 197-201), for public policy requires that the buyer be insured at the seller's expense against injury. Race v. Krum, supra; Ryan v. Progressive Grocery Stores, supra; Chapman v. Roggenkamp, 182 Ill.App. 117, 121; Ward v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 231 Mass. 90, 94, 120 N.E. 225, 5 A.L.R. 242; see Prosser, The Implied Warranty of Merchantable Quality, 27 Minn.L.Rev. 117, 124; Brown, The Liability of Retail Dealers For Defective Food Products, 23 Minn.L.Rev. 585. The courts recognize, however, that the retailer cannot bear the burden of this warranty, and allow him to recoup any losses by means of the warranty of safety attending the wholesaler's or manufacturer's sale to him. Ward v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., supra; see Waite, Retail Responsibility and Judicial Law Making, 34 Mich.L.Rev. 494, 509. Such a procedure, however, is needlessly circuitous and engenders wasteful litigation. Much would be gained if the injured person could base his action directly on the manufacturer's warranty.

The liability of the manufacturer to an immediate buyer injured by a defective product follows without proof of negligence from the implied warranty of safety attending the sale. Ordinarily, however, the immediate buyer is a dealer who does not intend to use the product himself, and if the warranty of safety is to serve the purpose of protecting health and safety it must give rights to others than the dealer. In the words of Judge Cardozo in the MacPherson case [217 N.Y. 382, 111 N.E. 1053, L.R.A.1916F, 696, Ann.Cas. 1916C, 440]: "The dealer was indeed the one person of whom it might be said with some approach to certainty that by him the car would not be used. Yet the defendant would have us say that he was the one person whom it was under a legal duty to protect. The law does not lead us to so inconsequent a conclusion." While the defendant's negligence in the MacPherson case made it unnecessary for the court to base liability on warranty, Judge Cardozo's reasoning recognized the injured person as the real party in interest and effectively disposed of the theory that the liability of the manufacturer incurred by his warranty should apply only to the immediate purchaser. It thus paves the way for a standard of liability that would make the manufacturer guarantee the safety of his product even when there is no negligence.

This court and many others have extended protection according to such a standard to consumers of food products, taking the view that the right of a consumer injured by unwholesome food does not depend "upon the intricacies of the law of sales" and that the warranty of the manufacturer to the consumer in absence of privity of contract rests on public policy. Klein v. Duchess Sandwich Co., Ltd., 14 Cal.2d 272, 282, 93 P.2d 799, 803; Ketterer v. Armour & Co., D.C., 200 F. 322, 323; Id., 2 Cir., 247 F. 921, 160 C.C.A. 111, L.R.A.1918D, 798; Decker & Sons v. Capps, 139 Tex. 609, 164 S.W.2d 828, 142 A.L.R. 1479; see Perkins, Unwholesome Food As A Source of Liability, 5 Iowa L. Bull. 6, 86. Dangers to life and health inhere in other consumers' goods that are defective and there is no reason to differentiate them from the dangers of defective food products. See Bohlen, Studies in Torts, Basis of Affirmative Obligations, American Cases Upon The Liability of Manufacturers and Vendors of Personal Property, 109, 135; Llewellyn, On Warranty of Quality and Society, 36 Col.L.Rev. 699, 704, note 14; Prosser, Torts, p. 692.

In the food products cases the courts have resorted to various fictions to rationalize the extension of the manufacturer's warranty to the consumer: that a warranty runs with the chattel; that the cause of action of the dealer is assigned to the consumer; that the consumer is a third party beneficiary of the manufacturer's contract with the dealer. They have also held the manufacturer liable on a mere fiction of negligence: "Practically he must know it [the product] is fit, or take the consequences, if it proves destructive." Parks v. C. C. Yost Pie Co., 93 Kan. 334, 144 P. 202, 203, L.R.A.1915C, 179; see Jeanblanc, Manufacturer's Liability to Persons Other Than Their Immediate Vendees, 24 Va.L.Rev. 134. Such fictions are not necessary to fix the manufacturer's liability under a warranty if the warranty is severed from the contract of sale between the dealer and the consumer and based on the law of torts (Decker & Sons v. Capps, supra; Prosser, Torts, p. 689) as a strict liability. See Green v. General Petroleum Corp., 205 Cal. 328, 270 P. 952, 60 A.L.R. 475; McGrath v. Basich Bros. Const. Co., 7 Cal.App.2d 573, 46 P.2d 981; Prosser, Nuisance Without Fault, 20 Tex. General Petroleum Corp., 5 So.Cal.L.Rev. 263, 271; Pound, The End of Law As Developed In Legal Rules And Doctrines, 27 Harv.L.Rev. 195, 233. Warranties are not necessarily rights arising under a contract. An action on a warranty "was, in its origin, a pure action of tort," and only late in the historical development of warranties was an action in assumpsit allowed. Ames, The History of Assumpsit, 2 Harv.L.Rev. 1, 8; 4 Williston on Contracts (1936) § 970. "And it is still generally possible where a distinction of procedure is observed between actions of tort and of contract to frame the declaration for breach of warranty in tort." Williston, loc. cit.; see Prosser, Warranty On Merchantable Quality, 27 Minn.L.Rev. 117, 118. On the basis of the tort character of an action on a warranty, recovery has been allowed for wrongful death as it could not be in an action for breach of contract. Greco v. S. S. Kresge Co., 277 N.Y. 26, 12 N.E.2d 557, 115 A.L.R. 1020; see Schlick v. New York Dugan Bros., 175 Misc. 182, 22 N.Y.S. 2d 238; Prosser, Torts, p. 119. As the court said in Greco v. S. S. Kresge Co., supra [277 N.Y. 26, 12 N.E.2d 561, 115 A.L.R. 1020], "Though the action may be brought solely for the breach of the implied warranty, the breach is a wrongful act, a default, and, in its essential nature, a tort." Even a seller's express warranty can arise from a noncontractual affirmation inducing a person to purchase the goods. Chamberlain Co. v. Allis-Chalmers, etc., Co., 51 Cal.App.2d 520, 125 P.2d 113. "As an actual agreement to contract is not essential, the obligation of a seller in such a case is one imposed by law as distinguished from one voluntarily assumed. It may be called an obligation either on a quasi-contract or quasi-tort, because remedies appropriate to contract and also to tort are applicable." 1 Williston on Sales, 2d Ed. § 197; see Ballantine, Classification of Obligations, 15 Ill.L.Rev. 310, 325.

As handicrafts have been replaced by mass production with its great markets and transportation facilities, the close relationship between the producer and consumer of a product has been altered. Manufacturing processes, frequently valuable secrets, are ordinarily either inaccessible to or beyond the ken of the general public. The consumer no longer has means or skill enough to investigate for himself the soundness of a product, even when it is not contained in a sealed package, and his erstwhile vigilance has been lulled by the steady efforts of manufacturers to build up confidence by advertising and marketing devices such as trade-marks. See Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N.Y. 397, 57 Am.Dec. 455; Baxter v. Ford Motor Co., 168 Wash. 456, 12 P.2d 409, 15 P.2d 1118, 88 A.L.R. 521; Crist v. Art Metal Works, 230 App. Div. 114, 243 N.Y.S. 496, affirmed 255 N.Y. 624, 175 N.E. 341; see Handler, False and Misleading Advertising, 39 Yale L.J. 22; Rogers, Good Will, Trade-Marks and Unfair Trading (1914) ch. VI, A Study of The Consumer, p. 65 et seq.; Williston, Liability For Honest Misrepresentation As Deceit, Negligence Or Warranty, 42 Harv.L.Rev. 733; 18 Cornell L. Q. 445. Consumers no longer approach products warily but accept them on faith, relying on the reputation of the manufacturer or the trade mark. See Max Factor & Co. v. Kunsman, 5 Cal.2d 446, 463, 55 P.2d 177; Old Dearborn Distributing Co. v. Seagram-Distillers Corp., 299 U.S. 183, 57 S.Ct. 139, 81 L.Ed. 109, 106 A.L.R. 1476; Schechter, The Rational Basis of Trade Mark Protection, 40 Harv.L.Rev. 813, 818. Manufacturers have sought to justify that faith by increasingly high standards of inspection and a readiness to make good on defective products by way of replacements and refunds. See Bogert and Fink, Business Practices Regarding Warranties In The Sale Of Goods, 25 Ill.L.Rev. 400. The manufacturer's obligation to the consumer must keep pace with the changing relationship between them; it cannot be escaped because the marketing of a product has become so complicated as to require one or more intermediaries. Certainly there is greater reason to impose liability on the manufacturer than on the retailer who is but a conduit of a product that he is not himself able to test. See Soule, Consumer Protection, 4 Encyclopedia of The Social Sciences, 282; Freezer, Manufacturer's Liability For Injuries Caused By His Products: Defective Automobiles, 37 Mich.L. Rev. 1; Llewellyn, Cases And Materials on Sales, 340 et seq.

The manufacturer's liability should, of course, be defined in terms of the safety of the product in normal and proper use, and should not extend to injuries that cannot be traced to the product as it reached the market.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie E. Still, Judge.

William Leva Hough was convicted of murder in the first degree after a prior conviction of a felony and he appeals under the automatic appeal provision of Penal Code, § 1239(b).

Judgment affirmed.

Prior opinion, 144 P.2d 581.

Frederic H. Vercoe, Public Defender, William B. Neeley, Deputy Public Defender, and Morris Lavine, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

CURTIS, Justice.

This is an automatic appeal taken under the provisions of subdivision (b) of section 1239 of the Penal Code from a judgment of death under an amended indictment charging the appellant with the crime of murder, after a prior conviction of a felony. The original indictment against appellant was in two counts. By count one he was charged with the murder of Inez Hough, wife of the appellant, and by count two he was charged with the murder of Frederick L. Culp. Each of said offenses was alleged to have been committed on the 13th day of June, 1942, in the county of Los Angeles. To this indictment the appellant entered a plea of not guilty to each count and not guilty by reason of insanity. At a later date an amended indictment was filed against him in which he was charged with the same two offenses and also with a prior conviction of a felony. Upon the filing of the amended indictment, the appellant withdrew his former pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity, interposed to the original indictment. He thereafter pleaded guilty to the two charges of murder and admitted the prior conviction of a felony as alleged in the amended indictment. The court thereupon set the case for hearing to determine the degree of crime and to fix the punishment. At the conclusion of this hearing the trial judge determined the degree of the crime alleged in each count to be murder in the first degree and imposed upon the appellant the extreme penalty of the law.

The evidence produced before the trial court at this hearing is free from any serious conflict. The appellant and Inez Hough were married on February 2, 1940. He was 47 and she was 35 years of age at the time of her death. It was his fifth marriage and her second. They had known each other about six months before their marriage. They were married in El Paso, Texas, and he brought her to Los Angeles. At that time he was engaged in transporting cars from Detroit, Michigan, to Los Angeles. They first lived at the Stadler Hotel in Los Angeles, but for only a few days, when they moved to Wilmington, California. While living in this latter place, the appellant on one of his trips to the east brought his wife's mother, Mrs. Katie M. Griggs, home with him from Kansas City, Missouri, and the three lived together for some months. In the meantime the appellant had given up transportation work and returned to his former trade of welding and was employed in the shipyards at Wilmington.

During the two years and more of their married life, appellant and his wife frequently had arguments and disagreements of such gravity as to cause their temporary separations. Their differences, however, were at least for the time adjusted, reconciliations were effected, and they resumed their marital relations as previously carried on. The most serious of these family jars occurred in August, 1941, and deserves special mention as shedding some light upon the question involved in this appeal. They started an argument as to why she had been away when he returned from one of his transportation trips. Appellant went into the bedroom and came out with a jacket over his arm and walked over to his wife and said, "I might just as well kill her now as any time and be done with it." There was a knock at the door and the wife answered it, then ran out of the house and down the street. Appellant with a gun in his hand ran after her. His mother-in-law telephoned the police. Before the police arrived appellant returned, got in his car and followed his wife. He returned in about fifteen minutes, retired to his bedroom, and went to bed. His wife returned with the police who came in and took the gun. It was in a dresser drawer in his bedroom. After this episode the parties separated, and appellant went to live again at the Stadler Hotel in Los Angeles. Mrs. Hough continued to reside at their Wilmington home for about two months when the mother went to live with another daughter and the wife went to work at a rest home.

Even after this violent disturbance of their domestic life, appellant and his wife patched up their differences and took up their residence in Long Beach. It was then that he went to work as a welder. This was about the 1st of December, 1941, according to his testimony. He bought furniture for their apartment at a cost of about $900 and obligated himself to the extent of $700 for jewelry for his wife. However, it does not appear that in their new home they enjoyed any greater domestic felicity than had previously existed in other places where they had lived. Appellant testified that "I and my wife would argue—we would have arguments and I could not take it." Finally, on Easter Sunday, which was April 5, 1942, Mrs. Hough left him. Appellant made numerous attempts to have her return to him. He even had the pastors of two of the local churches intercede with her in an endeavor to effect a reconciliation. The wife refused to be again reconciled or to live with him. She secured employment in a beauty parlor, and subsequently instituted an action for a divorce. In this action she recovered an interlocutory decree of divorce and an order to show cause why he should not be restrained from molesting her. The appellant testified that about this time and for some months previously, his health began to fail, that he had a number of fainting spells and was sent to hospitals for treatment. Only a few days on each of these occasions were spent by him in the hospitals and the doctors who attended him on these occasions were not of the opinion that his condition was as serious as he appeared to believe it to be.

Appellant returned to Los Angeles and again took up his residence at the Stadler Hotel. He there became acquainted with a Mr. Langley, from whom he purchased a .45 Colt automatic pistol on the afternoon of June 13, 1942. A few days prior to that date he had had conversations with Langley about the purchase of a pistol and stated at the time that if he had one he could get a job. Langley had one, but would not sell it to him as he needed it in his business. However, a day or so before June 13, 1942, he had acquired a second pistol and on that day sold one of them to the appellant at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon for $32.50, receiving $10 as a down payment. At the same time Langley delivered to appellant a clip containing seven loaded cartridges. At 4 o'clock of the same day, after drinking a half pint of whiskey, appellant purchased a round-trip ticket from the Pacific Electric Railway Company and left for Long Beach. He took with him the pistol he had bought from Langley and the clip containing the seven loaded cartridges. These were not in the pistol at the time he purchased it from Langley, but appellant inserted the clip with the loaded cartridges into the gun after he boarded the street car for Long Beach. On arriving at Long Beach he went to the location of the Y.W.C.A. building, where he knew his wife was staying, and met her as she was coming out of the building. It does not appear just what the appellant did, after arriving at Long Beach before he met his wife. He must have reached Long Beach from Los Angeles between 5 and 6 o'clock, and his meeting with his wife, as she came out of the Y.W.C.A. building, was between 9 and 9:30 o'clock of the same evening. After meeting his wife, as just related, the two walked down the street toward the Pacific Electric Station, and when they were about a half block from the station the wife told appellant that she was to meet a lady friend at the station and she did not want to be seen with appellant. Thereupon the two parted.

Mrs. Hough went to the station where she met her friend, Mrs. Klaproth, who had just arrived from Wilmington accompanied by her daughter and a young man, a friend of the daughter. This meeting took place at about 9:30 p. m., as Mrs. Klaproth stated she left Wilmington on the 9:20 train. Immediately thereafter the four walked down to the Pike, a street on which is located the amusement zone of Long Beach. They walked along the Pike to a point opposite a fortune teller's concession. The two young people left the other two and went over to have their fortunes told. Mrs. Hough and Mrs. Klaproth were left standing on the sidewalk, and while there a gentleman, an entire stranger to the two ladies, by the name of Frederick L. Culp, approached and engaged them in conversation. These three then walked east along the Pike toward the 230 Club, referred to by the appellant as a saloon and situated about a half block from the fortune teller's concession. On their way there they were joined by a second gentleman, who was also an entire stranger to the two ladies, but an intimate friend of Mr. Culp. His name was John C. Parsons. The four continued their walk and entered the 230 Club. Not finding a booth near the entrance of the club, they walked along the bar to the rear of the room and entered a booth in which was located a table with a bench on either side of it. Mrs. Hough and Culp seated themselves on one of these benches and the other couple occupied the bench opposite them. Just as they were seated a waiter came in and wiped off the table and immediately after the waiter left, the appellant stepped up to the entrance of the booth in which the two couples were sitting and began shooting. He fired seven shots, five of which entered the body of Mrs. Hough and two entered the body of Mr. Culp, killing each of them instantly. Each bullet passed through the entire body of the unsuspecting victim. The appellant was overpowered by a couple of bystanders and his gun was taken from him. He was held and turned over to the police. Before he was disarmed he struck his wife on her head two or three times after he had shot her, and evidently addressing Culp, stated, "This will learn you a lesson, you son of a b——."

On the arrival of the officers the appellant was placed in their charge and taken to the police station in Long Beach. While at the police station, the appellant made the following statements to one of the police officers: "I shot that bastard for being out with my wife." "I told her if she did not come back something would happen." "I came here to kill them and, by God, I sure took care of them." "I would have shot the other man if I had not run out of ammunition." A few minutes later and while at the police station, appellant was asked by another officer whether he knew that his wife was dead and was informed that he (the officer) did not know. Appellant replied, "I hope she is because if she is not, my time is spent in vain." This officer further testified that at this same conversation "he also told me that he had told her three or four months previously that if he ever caught her running around with anybody he would kill her and, whoever it was, that he did not give a damn who it was."

The appellant took the stand and testified at the hearing. He made no denial that he had killed his wife and Culp. He admitted that he saw someone who looked like his wife enter the 230 Club, and that after entering the place, he saw his wife sitting in a booth with a man. But he did not remember aiming the gun, or pulling the trigger, or firing the gun; that he did not remember saying anything, and to quote his own language: "I don't know what happened." He disclaimed any intention of killing anyone when he walked into the place, or when he walked up to the booth in which he found his wife.

He gave as reasons for buying the revolver just before going to Long Beach and taking it with him on his trip that he might get a job as guard and because he was short of money, he thought he could pawn the gun should he need some additional money while at Long Beach. He gave no reason for paying about the last dollar he had for the gun just before his trip to Long Beach, when he thought he might need more money before his return. He further testified to the failing condition of his health, which compelled him to give up his job as welder and seek lighter employment, which the position as guard seemed to promise.

[1] The sole contention of appellant on this appeal is that the evidence produced on the hearing before the trial court for the purpose of determining the degree of the crimes and fixing the punishment is not sufficient to sustain a conviction of murder in the first degree, but on the other hand it establishes a crime of no greater degree than manslaughter, in that it showed that the act of killing was done in the heat of passion. Appellant would limit the evidence against him to his acts and conduct between the time he first saw his wife with Culp and the time he fired the fatal shots which killed the two of them. His theory appears to be that the sight of his wife entering the club or saloon with a male companion and the two seating themselves at a table within one of the booths so inflamed his mind that he shot and killed them upon this sudden heat of passion, and not with that deliberation and intent which are necessarily elements of the crime of murder.

Were we to limit the evidence in this case as contended for by appellant, there might be some plausible reason in support of the theory advanced by him. But this evidence in order to determine the state of mind under which appellant acted at the time he shot and killed his two victims must be considered with other evidence in the case reflecting his state of mind at the time. This other evidence which must be considered includes, of course, his previous conduct toward his wife, and particularly the threats made by him that if she did not come back to him something would happen, and that if he ever caught her running around with anybody he would kill the two of them; and the statements to the police officers shortly after his arrest, that he shot Culp for being out with his wife, and further to quote his own words: "I came here to kill them and by God, I sure took care of them"; also his statement later made to an officer, who told appellant that he did not know whether or not his wife was dead, "I hope she is because if she is not, my time is spent in vain." This undisputed evidence as a whole shows without a shadow of a doubt that appellant did not act "upon any sudden quarrel or heat of passion" in the slaying of his wife and her companion, but upon mature deliberation to kill and murder her and whomever he caught her running around with. It would be difficult to imagine a more complete and conclusive case of deliberate premeditated murder.

[2] The entire evidence in this case, as previously outlined, and without repetition, should be considered in determining the guilt of appellant and the degree of his crime. This would include practically the history of their married life; their relations toward each other after their marriage; their frequent separations; his attempt to use his pistol on one occasion coupled with a threat to kill her; her institution of an action for divorce resulting in an interlocutory decree of divorce against him, and an order to show cause why he should not be restrained from visiting her; his attempts to persuade her to return to him and her refusal to do so; his threats against her if she did not return to him; his purchase of the pistol on the day of the murder, and his immediate departure thereafter for Long Beach where his wife was living; their meeting and separation on that day; his subsequent sight of her as she entered the club with another man; his acts of following them into the club and shooting each of them to death on finding them seated in a booth together; his arrest, and subsequent statements to the police officers, not only admitting that he shot his wife and companion, but that he came to Long Beach for that purpose, and that he shot to kill them.

[3] Viewing the evidence as a whole, we are of the opinion that the appellant's intent to kill his wife if she refused to return and live with him was formed at the time he purchased the pistol from Langley, if not long before when he was endeavoring to buy a pistol. This conclusion seems inevitable when considering the entire evidence in the case. The facts in this case are in some respects similar to those in the case of People v. Coleman, 20 Cal.2d 399, on page 409, 126 P.2d 349, on page 355, where this court reviewing the evidence in that case stated its conclusion as follows: "There is here an abundance of credible evidence to support the verdicts of the jury. Even if the jury believed the defendant's testimony that he had no recollection of what transpired after he left Laguna Beach until he awoke in the Coronado jail, there is sufficient in the record to justify the implied finding of the jury that the defendant formed the specific intent before he commenced the trip to San Diego, and that such intent continued to control his act. People v. Norwood, 39 Cal.App.2d 503, 505, 103 P.2d 618."

The evidence against the appellant is much stronger than that in the case just cited and supports in every respect the order of the trial court in determining the degree of the crime as murder in the first degree and fixing the extreme penalty as the punishment.

Appellant relies upon the cases of People v. Howard, 211 Cal. 322, 295 P. 333, 71 A.L.R. 1385, and People v. Kelley, 208 Cal. 387, 281 P. 609, in support of his contention that the evidence against him in this case is insufficient to show that he was guilty of murder in the first degree, and that under the rule announced and followed by this court in those cases, the facts here show the appellant to be guilty of no higher crime than that of manslaughter. We find nothing in either of those cases that tends in the slightest degree to support this contention of the appellant. The difference between the factual situation in those cases and that now before us is so apparent that we deem it unnecessary to discuss them further.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte HOUGH.

Cr. 4500.

Supreme Court of California.

July 18, 1944.

1. Habeas corpus ☞85(1)

One sentenced to death on his pleas of guilty of murder was not entitled to release from prison in habeas corpus proceeding on ground that pleas were secured by illegal means, rendering his conviction void as depriving him of life without due process of law, in absence of showing that trial judge, district attorney or any one connected with prosecution made any promise or offered any inducement to petitioner or his attorney to withdraw his previous pleas of not guilty and enter pleas of guilty. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

2. Criminal law ☞641

The public defender of county is not county officer representing state in prosecution of criminal actions. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 1910.

3. Criminal law ☞641

A public defender, appointed to represent one accused of crime, becomes accused's attorney for all purposes of case and to same extent as if regularly employed by accused and is free from any domination by district attorney or prosecuting authorities, so that accused is bound by his pleas of guilty as against contention that in so pleading he was misled by public defender's advice. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 1910, §§ 5, 6; Const. Cal. art. 1, § 8; U. S.C.A.Const. Amend. 6.

4. Habeas corpus ☞85(1)

One sentenced to death on his pleas of guilty of murder is not entitled to release from prison in habeas corpus proceeding on ground that he was misled into entering such pleas by deputy public defender's assurance that petitioner would not suffer death penalty if he pled guilty, in view of conclusive and overwhelming evidence of petitioner's guilt and such deputy's emphatic denial in his affidavit supporting petition that he made any such assertion.

5. Habeas corpus ☞25(1)

Failure of deputy public defender, representing one accused of murder, to inform accused of trial judge's statement, in conversation with such deputy and two deputy district attorneys just before court session at which accused withdrew his pleas of not guilty and pleaded guilty, that judge wanted accused's counsel to know that judge might have to pronounce death penalty, so that such counsel would not plead defendant guilty with any expectations, furnished no legal ground for Supreme Court to set aside guilty pleas in habeas corpus proceeding, in view of interpretation of judge's remarks by deputy defender, who was experienced lawyer in whom accused had absolute confidence, as indicating no change of mind by trial judge.

6. Criminal law ⇨274

A proceeding to set aside judgment on plea of guilty may be resorted to only where defendant is deprived of right to trial on merits by duress, fraud, or other force overreaching his free will and judgment.

7. Habeas corpus. ⇨25(1)

One accused of murder was bound by his pleas of guilty, entered on advice of deputy public defender representing accused, and not entitled to have pleas set aside by reason of such advice or deputy's withholding from accused of information, which deputy honestly believed to be of no material assistance to accused, as to trial judge's statement just before entry of pleas that he might have to pronounce death penalty.

8. Criminal law ⇨625

Whether trial court should proceed with case against defendant, claimed to be in such highly nervous and irrational state of mind as to render him mentally incompetent to make proper defense and pleas of guilty, on which case was set for trial, was within trial judge's sound discretion.

9. Criminal law ⇨625

Where two of three alienists, appointed by trial court to examine accused after he pleaded not guilty of murder by reason of insanity, reported that accused was sane at times of homicide and examination, and third alienist reported that defendant would be legally insane at time set for trial of case, trial judge did not abuse his discretion in proceeding with trial two weeks later.

10. Habeas corpus ⇨30(3)

Where trial court spent greater part of three days in hearing evidence as to both degree of murder committed by one pleading guilty thereof and punishment to be fixed therefor and pronounced death sentence after both parties rested and defendant waived time for sentence, defendant was not entitled to release from prison on writ of habeas corpus on ground that death penalty was imposed without taking any evidence to fix punishment, though hearing was had in answer to court's question as to how parties wanted to take care of matter of fixing degree of crime.

Habeas corpus proceeding by William Leva Hough for release from the custody of the warden of the state prison at San Quentin.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to respondent's custody.

Prior opinion, 144 P.2d 585.

Morris Lavine, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

CURTIS, Justice.

The petitioner seeks his release from the custody of the warden of the State Prison at San Quentin after his pleas of guilty to two counts of murder upon which the death sentence was pronounced against him.

The ground upon which his petition for release is based is that the judgments of conviction are illegal and are violative of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and deprive petitioner of his life without due process of law. His main complaint is that his pleas of guilty were secured and induced by improper and illegal means, which render his conviction void and of no legal effect. As will more fully hereinafter appear, petitioner was represented during the pendency of his action in the trial court and on the appeal of said action to this court by a representative of the public defender of the county. While his said appeal was pending, he changed attorneys and his newly acquired attorney represents him in the present proceeding.

Petitioner was indicted for the murder of his wife and her male companion on June 13, 1942, at Long Beach in the county of Los Angeles. The original indictment was in two counts. By count 1 he was charged with the murder of his wife, Inez Hough, and by count 2, with the murder of Frederick L. Culp. To each of these two counts he pleaded not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity. At a later date an amended indictment was filed against him in which he was charged with the same two offenses of murder and with a prior conviction of a felony. Upon filing the amended indictment petitioner withdrew his two former pleas of not guilty, and pleaded guilty to the two charges of murder and admitted the prior conviction of a felony.

He now contends, in the first place, that his counsel was misled by the trial judge and the prosecuting officers of the county by assurances that if petitioner would withdraw his pleas of not guilty and plead guilty to the amended indictment, the sentence of death would not be imposed. The case against petitioner was before us on appeal, and the factual situation therein involved is set forth in some detail in our opinion, therein this day filed. People v. Hough, 150 P.2d 444.

[1] The record before us in the present proceeding fails to show that either the trial judge or anyone connected with the district attorney's office or with the prosecution of the case against petitioner made any promise or commitment, directly or indirectly, to petitioner or to his counsel in consideration of his withdrawal of his pleas of not guilty and of his entry of pleas of guilty. Deputy District Attorney Sten was assigned by the district attorney's office to represent the prosecution, and Deputy District Attorney Hunt was assigned to assist Mr. Sten in the prosecution of the case. In the numerous conferences had between them and petitioner's counsel, Deputy District Attorney Sten informed the latter that the district attorney's office would not consent to life imprisonment, or any lesser punishment than the death penalty. The trial judge who took part in some of those conferences "hoping to get a satisfactory disposition of this case, stated that if the District Attorney would be satisfied with life imprisonment, it would be satisfactory to the Court." The trial judge, however, at no time promised or intimated to petitioner or his counsel that he would impose the penalty of life imprisonment in opposition to the recommendation of the district attorney's office.

The case after some continuances was set down for trial for August 11th. The day before, the trial judge called into his chambers the petitioner's attorney and the two deputy district attorneys, informed them that the case could not be tried on the 11th, due to an unfinished case then before the court, and suggested to counsel that the case be continued to the next day, August 12th. This was agreed to, and at the same meeting Mr. Sten informed the court that he intended to file an amended indictment charging petitioner with a prior felony conviction in addition to the two charges of murder. On the morning of August 11th, the case was called with counsel for all parties present. The amended indictment was filed, charging the two crimes of murder and the previous conviction of a felony. The petitioner was arraigned on these charges and the case continued to the following day, August 12th. On the evening of August 11th, petitioner's counsel informed the trial judge that the petitioner would withdraw his pleas of not guilty by reason of insanity and not guilty to each count of the amended indictment, and plead guilty and admit his prior conviction.

Before the opening of court the next morning, August 12th, the trial judge called petitioner's counsel and Mr. Sten and Mr. Hunt into his chambers and made the following statement to petitioner's counsel: "Before you proceed in this matter I don't want you to be misled by any of the conversations you have had with me, or by any conversation that you have had with anyone else, or by anything that you might have heard from anyone, because if I try this case I may have to pronounce the death penalty, and I want you to know this in advance so you won't plead the defendant guilty with any expectations. We have a jury panel present and you can have a jury trial." To this statement petitioner's counsel replied: "All I want to know is, do you start this case with an open mind?" In answer to this question Judge Still (the trial judge) states in his affidavit: "I told him that I did, and he [petitioner's counsel] said: 'I am going to proceed as I have advised you.'" Immediately following this meeting, court convened with petitioner and his counsel present. Petitioner withdrew his former pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity and pleaded guilty to the two counts of murder contained in the amended indictment and admitted his prior felony conviction. Thereupon the court proceeded to take evidence to determine the degree of the crime and to fix the punishment. This hearing consumed the greater part of three days. At its close petitioner waived time for sentence. Thereupon, the court sentenced him to suffer the death penalty.

It will thus be seen that there is absolutely no showing that either the trial judge or the district attorney offered any promise or inducement to petitioner's attorney or to petitioner to withdraw his pleas of not guilty and enter pleas of guilty. There is no attempt to show that any person whatever connected with the prosecution of petitioner made any promise to either petitioner or his counsel or misled either of them as to the entry of petitioner's pleas of guilty. Petitioner leans heavily upon certain statements made to his attorney by Deputy District Attorney Hunt. He refers to him as the "veteran prosecutor," and a lawyer with much more experience in the prosecution of cases than Mr. Sten. But the record shows without conflict that Mr. Sten was in charge of the prosecution of the case against petitioner and that Mr. Hunt was assigned to assist Mr. Sten, but was without any authority whatever to bind the district attorney's office in any matter in reference to the case. The record further shows without dispute that Mr. Hunt at no time made any promise or inducement to petitioner or his counsel respecting petitioner's pleas in said action. Mr. Hunt did state to petitioner's counsel at various times before petitioner entered his pleas of guilty, that in his opinion a sentence of life imprisonment would satisfy the ends of justice, but, as just stated, he at no time promised directly, indirectly, or impliedly, that he would ask or recommend to the court a sentence of life imprisonment in case pleas of guilty were entered. Petitioner's counsel well knew of Mr. Hunt's position in the case and that he had no authority to bind the district attorney's office respecting any matter involved in the case and Mr. Hunt, realizing his subordinate position, never purported to do so. In the conferences before the trial judge he expressed his views respecting the punishment to be administered in the case, and that was all. According to the trial judge "Mr. Hunt took only a negligible part in the conversation." The attempt to show that petitioner or his attorney was misled by any statement or act on the part of Mr. Hunt finds no support whatever in the record before us.

[2] Petitioner's second contention rests upon the following state of facts: At the time of petitioner's arraignment upon the original indictment he was without any attorney and without funds to employ an attorney to defend him. For this reason the court appointed the public defender of the county to represent him. Mr. E. J. Hovden, a regularly appointed and acting deputy in the office of the public defender, was assigned to conduct the defense of petitioner, and he acted as petitioner's attorney during the entire proceedings in said action up to and including the time that judgment was pronounced against him. It is petitioner's contention that the public defender is an officer of the county, and represents the state in the prosecution of criminal actions, in the same light and to the same extent as the district attorney, or other officer of the state or county connected with the prosecution of criminal cases. With this contention we cannot agree. Petitioner cites no authority in support of his contention and none has come to our attention.

[3] The office of public defender was created by an act of the Legislature enacted in 1921. See Stats.1921, p. 354, ch. 245, Deering's Gen.Laws 1937, Act 1910. By section 5 of this act the duties of such an officer are defined in the following terms, so far as pertinent to this proceeding: "Upon request of the defendant or upon order of the court, the public defender shall defend, without expense to them, all persons who are not financially able to employ counsel and who are charged with the commission of any contempt, misdemeanor, felony or other offense. He shall also, upon request, give counsel and advice to such persons, in and about any charge against them upon which he is conducting the defense, and he shall prosecute all appeals to a higher court or courts, of any person who has been convicted upon any such charge, where, in his opinion, such appeal will, or might reasonably be expected to, result in the reversal or modification of the judgment of conviction." While the act has been amended on two occasions (Stats. 1927, p. 1886; Stats.1931, p. 2566) the quoted portion of section 5 has not been changed in any respect. Section 6 of the act, both in its original and amended form, provides for the appointment by the board of supervisors of a sufficient number of deputies to properly conduct the office of public defender and fixes their salaries.

Under this statute when the public defender is appointed to represent a defendant accused of a crime, he becomes the attorney for said defendant for all purposes of the case and to the same extent as if regularly retained and employed by the defendant. The judge of the trial court has no more authority or control of him than he has of any other attorney practicing before his court. The public defender is free from any restraint or domination by the district attorney or of the prosecuting authorities. He is as free to act in behalf of his client as if he had been regularly employed and retained by the defendant whom he represents. Were it not so his client would not be afforded the full right "to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defense" which the Constitutions, both state and federal, give to one accused of crime. Const.U.S.Amend. 6; Const.Cal. art. 1, § 8. With such plenary powers given a public defender when appointed to defend one accused of crime, it necessarily follows that no act of his in advising his client or in defending the latter upon the charge against him can be considered in any different light than if such act were performed by an attorney regularly employed and retained by the defendant. In no sense can it be held that the prosecuting officers of the county are in any respect charged with the consequences of such an act. The contention therefore that the petitioner is not bound by his pleas of guilty, on the ground that in so pleading he was misled by the advice of the public defender acting as his attorney, is not well taken.

[4] The further contention is made by petitioner that his former attorney assured him that should he plead guilty to the charges against him, he would not suffer the death penalty. In fact petitioner under oath states that Mr. Hovden stated to him, "I guarantee you that if you plead guilty you won't get gassed." Mr. Hovden filed a lengthy affidavit in support of petitioner's original application in this matter and in other ways has shown his willingness to assist petitioner in his present efforts to escape from the judgment rendered against him by the trial court. He has shown himself to be a most willing witness in petitioner's behalf. However, he expressly denies giving to petitioner any such assurance as petitioner claims, and he further denies making the statement quoted above or "any other statement which in substance or effect guaranteed or assured any particular punishment to be imposed." The record shows that Mr. Hovden had had over twelve years' experience as deputy public defender before his association as attorney for the petitioner. The evidence against petitioner, as briefly detailed in the opinion of this court on the appeal from this judgment following petitioner's pleas of guilty, is so conclusive and overwhelming against petitioner that it is most unreasonable to believe that an attorney of Mr. Hovden's experience and ability would give any such guarantee or assurance as claimed by petitioner. Giving consideration to those facts and the further fact that Mr. Hovden emphatically denies making any such assertion as that attributed to him by petitioner, we are unable to give credence to petitioner's claim that he was misled in entering his pleas of guilty by any assurance or guarantee on the part of Mr. Hovden.

[5] In seeking to avoid the judgment in this case the petitioner claims further that his former attorney failed to fully advise him as to the attitude of the trial judge and district attorney's office respecting the punishment which might be imposed upon him in case he should plead guilty to the two charges against him. In support of this contention the only claim made by petitioner is that his former attorney failed to inform him of the conversation between the trial judge, the two deputy district attorneys and Mr. Hovden held on the morning of August 12th just prior to the session of the court at which petitioner withdrew his former pleas and pleaded guilty to the two charges of murder set forth in the amended indictment. Petitioner's former attorney admits that he did not inform petitioner of this conversation nor of the statement of the trial judge on that occasion for the reason that the remarks of the judge "were interpreted by affiant [his former attorney] not as indicating any change of mind of the trial court but as being a protective comment to absolve the court of any direct promise or commitment respecting punishment."

Did the failure of his attorney to inform petitioner of this statement of the trial judge furnish any legal ground upon which this court can base an order setting aside petitioner's pleas of guilty? Examining this matter in the light of all the surrounding circumstances and the law applicable thereto, we are of the opinion that the question just asked must be answered in the negative. The surrounding circumstances show that petitioner's former attorney was a lawyer of more than ordinary experience in the defense of persons accused of crime. Petitioner's present attorney referred to Mr. Hovden in his argument as a "high class attorney," "a courageous public defender" and that he "had no criticism of Mr. Hovden." The record shows that petitioner had absolute confidence in the ability and loyalty of Mr. Hovden. There can be no doubt that Mr. Hovden exercised his best judgment in advising petitioner in respect to the pleas the latter was called upon to make to the charges in the amended indictment. Had he informed petitioner of the statement of the trial judge just prior to their entry into the court room on the day set for the trial of petitioner's case, petitioner would naturally have asked Mr. Hovden's advice respecting his pleas in view of the recent statement of the trial judge, and Mr. Hovden would have advised him that he did not interpret these latest remarks of the trial judge "as indicating any change of mind of the trial court." The record shows without conflict that the petitioner at all times had implicit confidence in Mr. Hovden and followed his advice on every occasion, and it is reasonable to suppose that he would have done so on this morning of August 12th had Mr. Hovden informed him of the statement of the trial judge just before opening of court on that morning. Under these circumstances we think it quite evident that petitioner's situation would not have been any different from what it was at the time he entered his pleas of guilty had Mr. Hovden informed him of the latest statement by the court.

[6] Turning now to the legal phase of petitioner's contention that his pleas of guilty should be set aside by reason of his former attorney's failure to inform him of the trial court's statement just prior to his entry of said pleas, we find it fairly "well settled in this state that this procedure to set aside a judgment after plea of guilty may only be resorted to where, on account of duress, fraud, or other force overreaching the free will and judgment of a defendant, he is deprived of his right to a trial on the merits." People v. Gottlieb, 25 Cal.App. 2d 411, 415, 77 P.2d 489, 491; People v. Aseltine, 139 Cal.App. 768, 780, 34 P.2d 830. In the Gottlieb case, 25 Cal.App.2d at page 415, 77 P.2d at page 491, it is stated: "Neither does it avail appellant anything that he entered his plea solely on the advice of his counsel representing him in the case, because this falls far short of being a fraudulently obtained plea."

[7] The early case of People v. Miller, 114 Cal. 10, 45 P. 986, is in many respects like the situation now before us. The defendant was accused of the crime of murder. The court appointed two attorneys to represent him. He entered a plea of not guilty and his case was set down for trial. On the day fixed for the trial of his case he appeared in court with his attorney and asked to withdraw his pleas of not guilty and to plead guilty. His request was granted and he entered a plea of guilty. The time was set for hearing testimony to fix the degree of the crime. After some continuances, evidence for this purpose and in mitigation of punishment was received on a number of different days. A further continuance was asked by defendant and denied by the court. Whereupon the defendant through his counsel asked to be allowed to withdraw his plea of guilty and to plead not guilty on the ground, as shown by affidavits filed by him at the hearing of said motion, that he (114 Cal. at page 14, 45 P. at page 987) "while in jail, feared mob violence, and summary death at the hands of lynchers, and that when he pleaded guilty he did so 'without due deliberation, and without fully realizing his position, and in the hope that by so doing the punishment to which he would be exposed, were he tried before a jury, would thereby be mitigated.'" The court denied his motion and on appeal in affirming the judgment this court stated (114 Cal. at page 16, 45 P. at page 987): "Appellant's contention is that the court abused its discretion in not allowing him to withdraw his plea, interpose a plea of not guilty for the second time, and go before a jury for trial. Before judgment the court may at any time permit this to be done (Pen.Code, § 1018), and the discretion thus vested is one to be liberally exercised. * * * But the mere fact that a defendant, knowing his rights and the consequences of his act, hoped or believed, or was led by his counsel to hope or believe, that he would receive a shorter sentence or a milder punishment by pleading guilty than that which would fall to his lot after trial and conviction by jury, presents no ground for the exercise of this liberal discretion." That case was referred to by this court in the case of People v. Schwarz, 201 Cal. 309, 257 P. 71, and the following comment thereon was made on pages 315 and 73, respectively, of the opinion: "The case of People v. Miller, 114 Cal. 10, 16, 45 P. 986, 987, it is said, supports the action of the trial court, but it is not in the same category with the case before us as to the facts thereof. There the defendant was led by the advice of his counsel to believe that he would get less punishment if he changed his plea to guilty than he would receive if he stood trial and was convicted. In this hope, however, he was disappointed. The court rightly held that with full knowledge of the consequences which might follow he should not be permitted to speculate upon the action of the court."

Under these authorities we are of the opinion that the petitioner under the facts here was bound by his pleas of guilty entered in the case then pending against him and may not have his pleas set aside or vacated by reason of any act of his attorney in advising him respecting his defense in said action, or withholding from him the information which his attorney honestly believed would be of no material assistance to his client before entering said pleas.

[8,9] Petitioner also advances the contention that he was weak in body and in such a highly nervous and irrational state of mind as to render himself mentally incompetent to make a proper defense to the action against him, and that a plea of guilty by a defendant in such a mental state is no plea at all and should be set aside when the true facts are shown to the court. It is unnecessary to go into the details of petitioner's condition subsequent to his arrest and during the progress of the action against him up to and during the hearing by the court after his pleas of guilty. After petitioner had pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity at his arraignment on the original indictment, the trial court appointed three alienists to examine petitioner as to his mental condition. Two of these alienists reported that petitioner was sane both at the time he killed his wife and at the time of their examination of him. One of the three was unable to state whether or not petitioner was sane. He did report that in his opinion the defendant "will be legally insane at the time of the hearing set for July 28, 1942" (the date then set for defendant's trial). As noted above, the date of trial was advanced to August 12, 1942. Whether the court should have proceeded with the case against defendant in his then mental state was within the sound discretion of the trial judge. Under the circumstances shown and particularly in view of the report of the two appointed alienists that petitioner was then sane, we are of the opinion that there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge in proceeding with petitioner's case in the manner shown by the record.

[10] The final contention of petitioner needs even less discussion than that just considered. Petitioner in this contention claims that the court proceeded to impose upon him the death penalty without taking any evidence to fix the punishment or to determine whether there were any mitigating circumstances sufficient to justify the judgment of life imprisonment rather than death. This contention is answered by what we have previously said in this opinion, that is, that after petitioner's plea of guilty the court then proceeded to take evidence as to the degree of the crime and to fix the punishment, and that the greater part of three days was spent by the court in the hearing of said matter.

Petitioner bases his hope of sustaining this contention upon the statement of the court after petitioner had entered his pleas of guilty. This statement was made immediately after petitioner had entered said pleas and was in the following words: "Now the matter of fixing the degree remains. How do you want to take care of that?" It was in answer to this question and by agreement of all parties in the case that the court spent the greater part of three days in hearing the witnesses, both of the prosecution and the defense, and at its close both parties rested, the petitioner waived time for sentence and the court pronounced its judgment. There is no showing that this hearing was limited to the question of the degree of the crime and did not include evidence for the purpose of fixing the punishment. In fact it would be difficult if not impossible to separate these two purposes for which the evidence was admitted. In endeavoring to show that the crime was not of the first degree, a defendant would introduce every item of evidence which would have the least tendency to prove that he was only guilty of some lesser offense. This would include not only evidence that he was not guilty of the higher offense, but also such evidence if any he had, which would mitigate his offense and thus influence the court in fixing his crime at less than the supreme penalty.

We find nothing in the record before us which would justify the relief sought by the petitioner. The writ is accordingly discharged and the petitioner is remanded to the custody of the warden of the State Prison of the State of California at San Quentin, California.

RIBLE v. HUGHES, Superintendent of Schools, et al.

Sac. 5638.

Supreme Court of California.

July 5, 1944.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 3, 1944.

1. Schools and school districts ⇨136

A city or county school board's rules and regulations in effect at date of making or renewal of teacher's employment contract are integral parts of such contract.

2. Schools and school districts ⇨144(4)

A city or county board of education may exercise its discretion in adopting permanent teachers' salary schedules, though such schedules must be adopted before beginning of school year, allowances based on years of training and experience must be uniform and subject to reasonable classification, and schedules must not be arbitrary, discriminatory or unreasonable. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.734.

3. Schools and school districts ⇨144(4)

A city school board's salary schedules, providing for decreases in salaries of permanent teachers failing to continue their professional training by study in residence at accredited educational institutions within stated periods, were not invalid as indirectly providing for dismissal of such teachers without cause in violation of statute. School Code, §§ 5.401, 5.500, 5.650, 5.731, 5.734.

4. Schools and school districts ⇨144(4)

A city school board's rules, providing for decreases in salaries of permanent teachers failing to complete courses of study at accredited educational institutions within prescribed periods, were not invalid as imposing on such teachers training requirements in addition to those prescribed by state board of education as conditions precedent to employment. School Code, § 5.731.

5. Officers ⇨103

If reasonable minds may well be divided as to wisdom of administrative board's action, or there appears to be some reasonable basis for classification made by board, such action is conclusive, and court will not substitute its judgment for that of administrative body.

6. Schools and school districts ⇨144(4)

A city school board's salary schedules, providing for decreases in salaries of permanent teachers failing to complete courses of study in accredited educational institutions one summer out of each four, were reasonable and hence conclusive on courts. School Code, § 5.731.

7. Schools and school districts ⇨144(4)

A city school board's salary schedules, providing for decreases in salaries of permanent teachers failing to complete courses of study in accredited educational institutions one summer in four, are not invalid as discriminatory, as uniformity required by statute in salary schedules making allowances for years of training and service is not violated by reasonable classification. School Code, § 5.734.

8. Schools and school districts ⇨144(4)

The fact that city superintendent of schools did not prepare set of written standards for judging teachers' training as required by rules annexed to city school board's salary schedules, but delegated to high school principal power to determine such standards, did not show that administration of board's rules, decreasing salaries of permanent teachers failing to complete courses of study at accredited educational institutions within prescribed periods, was arbitrary as applied to permanent high school teacher who refused to study only because she considered such rules coercive. School Code, § 5.731.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Dal M. Lemmon, Judge.

Proceeding by Lilly May Rible against Charles C. Hughes, as Superintendent of Schools of the City of Sacramento, and others for a writ of mandate to compel payment to plaintiff of an increased amount of salary due her as a teacher in the senior high school of such city. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Prior opinion, 140 P.2d 181.

John Quincy Brown, Dist. Atty., and William A. Green, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondents.

J. H. O'Connor, County Counsel of Los Angeles, and Beach Vasey, Deputy County Counsel, of Los Angeles, amici curiae on behalf of respondents.

EDMONDS, Justice.

The Teacher's Salary Schedules of the Sacramento City Schools, effective in 1935, provide that each year, in establishing the salaries of a permanent teacher for the ensuing twelve months, the amount paid to him for the preceding year shall be decreased if he does not maintain his professional efficiency by graduate study. Lilly May Rible, a teacher subject to the schedule, refused to take any course of instruction and her salary was fixed at the amount specified for those who do not comply with the requirement. Thereafter she sought by writ of mandate to compel the payment of the amount to which she would be entitled had she earned additional educational credits, and her appeal is from a judgment adverse to her contentions.

Miss Rible graduated from Stanford University in 1912 and since that year has been a teacher of English in the Sacramento Senior High School. After nine years of service, she was classified as a permanent teacher and in 1932 she received a life diploma, authorizing her to teach English in the public high schools of California. That diploma is in full force and effect and no proceedings have been taken to suspend, reduce or transfer her. School Code, § 5.650 et seq. In summer recesses commencing in 1929, Miss Rible traveled abroad, doing research work and collecting data pertaining to English literature. By her travels she accumulated, in accordance with the Rules of the Board of Education of the City of Sacramento in effect until 1935, 40 or 50 "rating credits."

During the school year 1933-34 the Board of Education of the City of Sacramento directed its conference bureau, composed of executives of the school department, to study, for the purpose of revision, the existing salary schedules of certificated employees of the Sacramento city schools. After considerable investigation, the conference bureau reached the conclusion that new schedules, based upon certain stated principles, should be adopted. It was agreed that salaries of elementary and high school teachers should be on a basis definitely to encourage additional training. In place of automatic advances in salary it was decided that increased compensation should be uniformly granted upon an evaluation of initial training, teaching experience, and additional professional study obtained by regular attendance at an institution of four-year college rank accredited by the State Department of Education. The conference also declared that teachers reaching the maximum salary should be stimulated to maintain their professional proficiency by continued training, and for the purpose of making this effective, it provided for a salary penalty to be imposed upon those failing to do so within a reasonable length of time.

The principles stated by the conference bureau were approved by the board of education and, in the main, were acceptable to representatives of the various teacher groups with whom they were discussed. Accordingly, a new salary schedule interpreting this "practical philosophy" of the teaching profession was promulgated. A minimum salary of $1,548 is fixed for a teacher in a senior high school. In the fifth year of service this salary is automatically increased to $1,836. If the teacher, after having been employed for five years, has completed the study requirement, he is entitled to an annual increment of $96 in each of the next five years of service. Likewise, after the tenth year, the salary is raised only if the teacher has obtained credit for six additional semester units. One who is eligible for all of the advances authorized by the schedule is entitled to $2,700 as salary for the fourteenth year of teaching. The maximum of $2,748 for the fifteenth and subsequent years is attainable only after having concluded further courses of study.

Consistently with the principles stated by the conference bureau, the salary schedule also provides that if a teacher, during the first five years of her employment as a permanent teacher, has not carried on her professional training by study in residence at an accredited institution, commencing with the sixth year "the salary will be decreased by one annual increment each year until the condition is met; whereupon one annual increment per year shall be restored until the maximum is again reached." A similar condition is imposed at the end of the tenth and fourteenth years of service, and the same requirement is made for the retention of the maximum salary specified after fifteen years of service.

According to the schedules, a conditional increase in salary is allowed when "six semester units shall have been completed in courses open to under-graduates, or four semester units in courses open only to graduates, in an institution or institutions of four-year college rank accredited by the State Department of Education. This work must be done in residence. In conformity with this principle, the Superintendent will prepare a set of written standards against which training taken to meet the conditions for advancement on these schedules will be judged."

On July 1, 1935, the effective date of the new schedules, Miss Rible was receiving an annual salary of $2,700. Having failed during the succeeding four school years to comply with the additional training requirement, on July 1, 1939, her salary was reduced to $2,604 and, on July 1, 1940, to $2,508. By a petition for a writ of mandate, she then demanded that the Board of Education and the Superintendent of Schools of the City of Sacramento authorize the payment of salary to her at the rate of $2,748 per year commencing July 1, 1939. This is the compensation to which she would be entitled had she met the requirement for additional training upon which the increase to that amount was conditioned. The trial court determined that the schedules are not in conflict with the provisions of the School Code fixing the qualification of a teacher in the high school nor of the rules and regulations of the State Board of Education and denied her any relief. The appeal is from that judgment.

As grounds for reversal of the judgment, the appellant urges that the conditions of the salary schedules are unreasonable, arbitrary and discriminatory. But, she asserts, conceding that the board of education did not abuse its discretion, it had no power to adopt the rules to which she takes exception for section 5.734 of the School Code requires that salaries must be uniform and based upon years of training and experience. She also contends that the rules are arbitrary and unreasonable in that they delegate to subordinates the discretion to determine the studies a teacher must pursue. And, as the school board cannot discharge her without cause, because of contract and tenure rights (School Code, § 5.650), it is seeking to do indirectly that which it cannot do directly. Moreover, she continues, disciplinary action for a failure to comply with the rules is inconsistent with the legal rights of a permanent teacher.

Other points presented by the appellant are that, conceding for the purposes of argument that the conditions of the 1935 salary schedules were lawfully adopted and reasonable, there are fundamental principles of law which prevent their application to her. Miss Rible contends that her salary is governed by a contract, entered into between herself and the school board in 1921, which requires payment of a salary amounting to $2,700 a year. Under the provisions of section 5.401 of the School Code, she insists, a teacher's contract of employment is automatically renewed upon the same terms and conditions as existed for the previous year, and a bilateral contract may be modified only by mutual assent. Therefore, the appellant reasons, the automatic reduction in her salary in 1939 was a unilateral act which cannot affect the bilateral agreement by which the board promised to pay her $2,700 per year. This conclusion, she says, is supported by the statutes relating to tenure and the rules and regulations of a local school board are of no effect where inconsistent with the School Code. Because the School Code delegates to the State Board of Education the power to prescribe and determine the qualifications of teachers, it follows, she contends, that the jurisdiction is an exclusive one and the rules of the Sacramento board are void because they impose training qualifications additional to those required by the School Code or the rules of the state body.

In support of the judgment in their favor, the respondents contend that the challenged rules are not contrary to any statutory provision. In effect, they say, the rules do no more than provide that teachers shall be compensated according to their training and experience. And the respondents deny that the rules are unreasonable and arbitrary, or beyond the authority of the board to enact.

Notwithstanding Miss Rible's assertions, the controversy does not concern either the validity of her teaching credential or her tenure of position; the narrow issue is whether the board of education may each year fix the salary of all certificated employees upon the basis that those teachers who continue professional training are more qualified persons than the ones who do not do so and entitled to compensation accordingly. More particularly, the question is: may the compensation of those teachers who are unwilling or unable to progress by the completion of a course of study once in four years properly be placed at a lower amount because of their lesser worth in the educational field.

[1] The rules and regulations of a city or county school board, in effect at the date of the making or renewal of a teacher's contract of employment, are integral parts of it. Kacsur v. Board of Trustees, 18 Cal.2d 586, 116 P.2d 593; Fry v. Board of Education, 17 Cal.2d 753, 112 P.2d 229; Abraham v. Sims, 2 Cal.2d 698, 42 P.2d 1029; Fidler v. Board of Trustees, 112 Cal.App. 296, 296 P. 912. Miss Rible's last written agreement, executed in 1921, was designated a "Salary Contract" and it provided that she was elected "under section 1609" of the Political Code "in accordance with salary schedule adopted by the Board." Under the provisions of section 1609 of the Political Code, the pertinent provisions of which are now embodied in sections 5.401 and 5.500 of the School Code, the contract of employment of a permanent teacher is automatically renewed from year to year upon the same terms unless, prior to renewal, a school board acts to change such terms. It follows, therefore, that upon the automatic renewal of Miss Rible's contract for the school year 1935-36, it was subject to the new salary schedule and rules adopted July 1, 1935, unless the board had no authority to adopt them or its acts in doing so constituted an abuse of discretion.

[2] Section 5.731 of the School Code provides that city and county boards of education have the power to fix and order paid the compensation of school teachers. The section has been interpreted accordingly. Kacsur v. Board of Trustees, supra; Fry v. Board of Education, supra; Abraham v. Sims, supra; Fidler v. Board of Trustees, supra. In recognizing the power of a board to fix teachers' salaries under the provisions of section 5.731, the court, in the Kacsur case [18 Cal.2d 586, 116 P. 2d 596], reiterated "that a permanent teacher has no vested right to a particular salary and that such salary may be changed by the administrative authority," subject to the qualification "that the fixing of salaries must not be discriminatory, arbitrary or unreasonable." In the Fry case [17 Cal.2d 753, 112 P.2d 233] it was said that, "within the limits fixed by the School Code, the Board has discretionary control over the salaries of teachers." A restriction upon the authority in that regard, said the court, is the legislative requirement that "within reasonable limits, the principle of uniformity of treatment as to salary for those performing like services with like experience" must be observed but this limitation "does not prevent the Board from making reasonable classifications." In the Sims case [2 Cal.2d 698, 42 P.2d 1035], it was said that, although the Legislature intended to give teachers a permanency of tenure, it did not give any "assurance against change in salary. * * * The power of the trustees to raise or reduce the salaries of permanent teachers cannot be doubted, provided it is reasonably exercised and no attempt is made after the beginning of any particular school year to reduce the salaries for that year." According to these decisions, then, a board of education may exercise its discretion in adopting salary schedules fixing the compensation to be paid to permanent teachers although (1) the schedule must be adopted prior to the beginning of the school year; (2) any allowance based upon years of training and experience must be uniform, and subject to reasonable classification; and (3) the schedule must not be arbitrary, discriminatory or unreasonable.

[3,4] In the present case, the salary schedules fix the rate of compensation in accordance with stated conditions. They apply generally to all certificated employees. At his option, a teacher may, by obtaining additional educational credits, from time to time qualify for additional salary. If he does not choose to do so, the board of education rates his worth to the school district at a lesser amount than one who enlarges his educational experience. In short, the salary schedules merely provide that a teacher is to be compensated in accordance with training and experience.

Certainly this is a desirable procedure. Miss Rible has not been singled out for particular or arbitrary action and the rules do not impose a penalty in the legal sense of that term but set up a standard of salary to be paid each year. There is no basis for the assertion that the board, by adopting the schedules, attempting to do indirectly what section 5.650 of the School Code, providing against dismissal of permanent teachers without cause, prohibited it from doing directly. The fixing of a lower salary for one who has not taken a course of study during four years is not a dismissal without cause, nor do the rules impose training requirements upon permanent teachers, in addition to those prescribed by the State Board of Education, as a condition precedent to employment.

[5, 6] These considerations apply with equal force to the appellant's remaining contention, that the schedules and their conditions are unreasonable, arbitrary and discriminatory. If reasonable minds may well be divided as to the wisdom of an administrative board's action, its action is conclusive. Or, stated another way, if there appears to be some reasonable basis for the classification, a court will not substitute its judgment for that of the administrative body. Gabrielli v. Knickerbocker, 12 Cal. 2d 85, 82 P.2d 391; Monahan v. Department of Water and Power, 48 Cal.App.2d 746, 120 P.2d 730. The completion of a course of study one summer out of each four has a reasonable relation to a teacher's ability to discharge his professional duties. Although such training may not benefit all teachers equally, the basis of our educational system is that study enlarges one's capacity for accomplishment and leadership in any activity. Very certainly, a permanent teacher of long service, such as Miss Rible, who, so far as the record shows, during more than 30 years of school work has not been in touch with any other phase of education than her own teaching, would benefit from college study not only with respect to the specific subjects for which she received credit but also from contact with modern educational processes. The Sacramento salary schedules are based upon this self-evident fact, and the determination of the board of education that compensation should be fixed each year in accordance with an estimation of ability is a reasonable one and, therefore, conclusive upon the courts.

[7, 8] Nor is it true that the schedules are discriminatory in their application to the appellant. As emphasized, the difference in salary payments to permanent teachers performing the same duties is based upon a reasonable classification: that of fixing salaries upon the basis of training. Although it would appear that, as Miss Rible asserts, section 5.734 of the School Code requires uniformity in any schedule of salaries making allowance for years of training and service, nevertheless, uniformity is not violated by a reasonable classification. Fry v. Board of Education, supra. And the fact that the superintendent did not "prepare a set of written standards against which training * * * will be judged," as required by the rules annexed to the 1935 schedules (Bulletin, p. 10), but, rather, delegated to the principal of the high school the power to so determine; does not support Miss Rible's claim that the administration of the rule was arbitrary. She did not refuse to study because no particular courses had been prescribed by the superintendent but upon the ground that she considered herself "qualified to teach, and those rules were what we might call coercion and rather foolish ones."

The judgment is affirmed.

GIBSON, C. J., and TRAYNOR and SCHAUER, JJ., concurred.

CARTER, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. I believe that the salary schedule adopted by the Sacramento School Board is discriminatory and unreasonable.

The opinion of the court in stating that appellant's teaching credentials or tenure of position is not here involved, and confining discussion of the controversy strictly to the power to adjust and reduce compensation, is entirely oblivious of the fact that the effect of such salary manipulation as here sought to be practiced can only be to deprive the teachers of this state, of rights protected by their grant of a life diploma by the State Board of Education, and to impair rights heretofore guaranteed by the provisions of the School Code providing for the permanent tenure of teachers.

Sections 5.260 to 5.281 of the School Code provide for the granting of life diplomas, authorizing the holder to serve for life in the public schools of this state, in the capacity therein specified. Appellant, in 1932, was awarded such a life diploma, the state thereby recognizing her qualifications to teach. Sections 5.270 to 5.281 of the School Code provide for the issuance by county, or city and county boards of education, of a permanent certificate to the holder of a life diploma, upon the successful completion of the number of years of teaching prescribed therein, which entitles the holder to teach in that county or city and county during the life of the holder. The question, then, immediately presents itself, as to the value of such a life diploma, or certificate, if the teacher's salary may intermittently be diminished, by the infliction of penalties, upon failure to meet superimposed study requirements.

As to teachers' tenure, it is the declared policy of this state. School Code, §§ 5.500-5.504. "The Legislature has conferred upon teachers, under specified circumstances, a vested right to be so classified and to teach as permanent instructors, in the particular district where this right has been secured." Dutart v. Woodward, 99 Cal. App. 736, 279 P. 493, 494; Davis v. Gray, 29 Cal.App.2d 403, 84 P.2d 534. We are not here concerned with the soundness of that policy. Dutart v. Woodward, 99 Cal. App. 736, 739, 279 P. 493.

The rule making power of a local school board is limited to those rules and regulations which are reasonable, uniform in treatment, and not in conflict with existing law. Fry v. Board of Education, 17 Cal. 2d 753, 112 P.2d 229; Kacsur v. Board of Trustees, 18 Cal.2d 586, 116 P.2d 593; Dutart v. Woodward, supra. We are justified in saying as a basic premise, that anything which would work to undermine and destroy the declared policy of tenure is unreasonable. The salary schedule here under consideration, does just that.

While the provisions of the School Code, providing for permanent tenure of teachers, guarantees to the public retention of those teachers who have demonstrated their fitness (Hogsett v. Beverly Hills School Dist., 11 Cal.App.2d 328, 53 P.2d 1009), such statutes also have a reciprocal purpose, looking toward benefit of the teachers, giving a measure of security to those who have served as teachers for the probationary period. Board of Education of Jersey City v. Wall, 119 N.J.L. 308, 196 A. 663; State ex rel. Bass v. Vernon Parish School Board, La.App., 194 So. 74. And it cannot be doubted, that the latter was the motivating factor in the enactment of our tenure law. Tenure, therefore, not being merely an instrument whereby a teacher may continue the enjoyment of teaching, but the basic element therein being the right to receive a compensation commensurate with the status he or she has attained by virtue of his or her years of study, preparation and past experience, thousands of teachers throughout this state have as a consequence thereof conformed their mode of living to the salary levels which they have been led to believe they were assured as an incident to their tenure status. It is true that a teacher has no vested right to a particular salary, and that such salary may be changed by administrative authority. Kacsur v. Board of Trustees, supra, but such changes must be uniform, and must have some regard to the actual classroom worth of the teacher. Abraham v. Sims, 2 Cal.2d 698, 42 P.2d 1029; Fry v. Board of Education, supra; Kacsur v. Board of Trustees, supra. Assuming that the additional educational experience required would have some tendency to increase the ability of an already qualified teacher (it may be here noted that the rule does not prescribe what type of courses shall be taken), by no stretch of the imagination can it be said that failure to take the additional course of study will result in such a substantial diminution in the classroom worth of the teacher, as to justify the salary deductions here contemplated. As applied to appellant, the schedule proposes to reward her, to the extent of $48 if she takes certain additional training, but if she does not take the training she is to be penalized "one annual increment," amounting to $96 each year "until the condition is met." If she does not comply with the rule for a period of twelve years, she will be reduced to a beginner's salary of $1,548. That such lot could befall one who has been given the protective status of tenure is unthinkable. In order to attain tenure, appellant met rigid qualifications, and gave the required number of years of satisfactory service, and in addition thereto has traveled extensively looking toward her professional improvement; these travels being designed to improve her subject of literature, comprising a large phase of the English courses which she teaches. As to her teaching record, the trial court expressly found that she has rendered many years of efficient, satisfactory, successful service in the Sacramento schools, including the years involved in this salary controversy.

There are many circumstances, or reasons, which may constitute good cause for not taking, or entirely preventing a teacher from taking, the courses and accumulating the credits demanded, such as sickness, need of recuperation from the school year's work, necessity of caring for children, inability to transfer residence to a university center, financial reasons, etc., and thus by virtue of the demerit system employed, they will be penalized, while less efficient and less competent teachers who may take the required units of work, and still remain the least competent, will not be penalized. Even if a teacher is physically able to meet the requirements, the rule compels him or her to forego one out of every four vacation periods, the same constituting a part of that teacher's own leisure time, to fulfilling the conditions imposed.

If the objective of additional schooling be deemed desirable, in order that teachers may keep in touch with modern processes, or for other reasons, the result could be brought about by other methods, that would not affect tenure, for example, opportunities for advancement, the granting of privileges and other like inducements, rather than by giving demerits, such as result from the subtraction process here employed.

This case was originally appealed to the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District and a decision was rendered by that court reversing the judgment of the trial court and directing the issuance of the writ of mandamus as prayed. The opinion in the District Court of Appeal was prepared by Presiding Justice Adams and concurred in by Justices Peek and Thompson. I am convinced that said opinion contains a correct statement of the law applicable to the facts of this case and I adopt as a part of this dissent the following portion of said opinion [140 P. 2d 181]:

"Section 5.530 of the School Code provides that boards of school trustees and city boards of education shall have power and it shall be their duty to fix and prescribe the duties to be performed by all persons in public school service in the school district. Section 5.420 provides that they shall employ only persons holding proper credentials and certificates; section 5.731 imposes upon them the duty to fix and order paid the compensation of persons in public school service employed by them; sections 5.541-5.547 prescribe the duties of teachers; section 5.650 provides that no permanent employee of a school board shall be dismissed except for the reasons set forth therein, and sections 5.652 et seq. provide the time and method by which charges must be made and heard. There is no provision in the law for disciplinary action against a teacher short of dismissal.

"It is not contended or even suggested by respondent herein that petitioner is subject to dismissal or that it would be within the power of the board to promulgate and enforce a rule requiring that permanent teachers in its employ continue to take college courses. It is said in respondents' brief that 'the question here is not whether the district can require the petitioner to take more training as a teacher in order to hold her position, but whether or not she can be required to take more training or else suffer a reduction in salary.' Obviously, then, the board is attempting to do indirectly what it could not do directly—that is, compel teachers to acquire additional college units by penalizing them by way of a reduction of salary if they do not. This, we believe, is in excess of the powers of the board. Inasmuch as such boards are quasi-municipal corporations of limited power, they have only special powers which may not be exceeded. 23 Cal.Jur. 90; Pasadena School District v. City of Pasadena, 166 Cal. 7, 9, 134 P. 985, 48 L.R.A., N.S., 892, Ann.Cas.1915B, 1039; Grigsby v. King 202 Cal. 299, 304, 260 P. 789. They are powerless to impose penalties—a purely legislative power. Board of Harbor Commissioners v. Excelsior Redwood Co., 88 Cal. 491, 26 P. 375; 22 Am.St.Rep. 321; Gilgert v. Stockton Port District, 7 Cal.2d 384, 390, 391, 60 P.2d 847. And such rules and regulations as they may be authorized to make and enforce must be reasonable and not discriminatory or oppressive, or arbitrary. Dutart v. Woodward, 99 Cal. App. 736, 739, 740, 279 P. 493; Chambers v. Davis, 131 Cal.App. 500, 507, 22 P.2d 27;

Lotts v. Board of Park Commissioners, 13 Cal.App.2d 625, 57 P.2d 215; McLeod v. State, 154 Miss. 468, 122 So. 737, 63 A.L.R. 1161; Hutton v. Gill, 108 Ind.App. 1, 7 N.E.2d 1011; Hutton v. Gill, 212 Ind. 164, 8 N.E.2d 818, 820; Valentine v. Independent School District, 187 Iowa 555, 174 N.W. 334, 6 A.L.R. 1525; 24 R.C.L. 575, § 23. They can promulgate no rules in contravention of statutory provisions, nor accomplish by indirection that upon which a statute has placed a ban. Fairchild v. Board of Education, 107 Cal. 92, 40 P. 26; Mitchell v. Winnek, 117 Cal. 520, 527, 49 P. 579; Dutart v. Woodward, supra. There can be no arbitrary or unreasonable exercise by the board of its power to reduce salaries or change assignments of permanent teachers. Abraham v. Sims, 2 Cal.2d 698, 711, 42 P.2d 1029; Dutart v. Woodward, supra. And classification of teachers for salary purposes must be reasonable, natural, and based upon a substantial difference germane to the subject, or upon some basis having a reasonable relation to the work assigned. Hutton v. Gill, 212 Ind. 164, 8 N.E.2d 818, 820.

"In the case before us the rule enforced against petitioner by the reductions of her salary ignores successful experiences and efficiency as a factor in determining salaries, in contravention of section 5.734 of the School Code; it arbitrarily assumes that a teacher becomes not more, but less efficient with experience; that failure to take additional college work makes a teacher less competent; it also assumes arbitrarily that the taking of any six (or four) units of college work every four years will restore efficiency (though only by degrees); it ignores rating credits acquired under the former salary schedule; it compels a teacher, at her own expense and on her own time, to leave her home and go to a college one semester each four years; it is not a rule governing the conduct of the schools under the jurisdiction of the board, but of the teacher during her vacation from school duties; it ignores every other method by which a teacher might acquire mental stimulus; and in this case it implies inefficiency in conflict with the finding of the trial court of petitioner's efficiency. It is based upon no classification of either teachers or duties, unless it be contended that teachers are to be classified as those that do and those that do not take the prescribed additional college work; and such a classification would be purely an arbitrary one not based upon qualifications or experience, and could not be justified. Lotts v. Board of Park Commissioners, supra; Mansur v. City of Sacramento, 39 Cal.App. 2d 426, 103 P.2d 221.

"The rule is arbitrary also in that no basis appears for the fixing of the so-called 'annual increment' of $96 deducted from appellant's salary, no basis for the number of college units teachers are required to complete, and no basis for the requirement that such university courses be taken every four years. If six college units every four years can be required, six units each year can be required; and if a penalty of $96 per annum can be imposed for non-compliance, any other arbitrary amount could be imposed and the advantages of tenure utterly defeated. It does not prescribe what kind of courses shall be taken by teachers, but merely the number of units that must be completed; so a teacher of English, if she so desired, might present six units of hygiene or home economics, kinesiology or Coptic. Though the rules of the board provide that written standards shall be set up by the superintendent of schools to govern training conditions, it is admitted that none such were set up.

"Petitioner did not fail to perform any duty prescribed by the law or the board. It is not contended that she has not kept up to date in her methods; and except for her failure to acquire the requisite college units her salary would have been the same as previously, $2,700. There was no change in her rank or grade, working hours or duties. The deductions were not made because of any inefficiency on her part, but as a penalty for failing to go to school. Respondents in their brief contend that there is no penalty involved; but we note that in the Bulletin issued by the board in September, 1936, it is recited: 'It was concluded that teachers reaching the maximum should be stimulated to maintain their professional proficiency by continued training. To make this effective, it was agreed that a salary penalty should be imposed upon those failing to do this within a reasonable length of time.' (Italics ours.)

"Also, the rule as applied to petitioner is discriminatory. The evidence shows that high school teachers of English with as little as ten years of experience were receiving $2,748 per annum, while petitioner, with twenty-nine years of successful experience, was, after the reductions, the lowest paid among such teachers. There was no general reduction of salaries, the only ones reduced being those of teachers who had not complied with the 'condition.'

"In Kacsur v. Board of Trustees, 18 Cal. 2d 586, 592, 116 P.2d 593, the court said:

"However, there are limitations on the powers of boards of trustees to change salaries of permanent teachers. One of the 'legal consequences' referred to in the Abraham case, supra (Abraham v. Sims, 2 Cal.2d 698, 42 P.2d 1029, is that the fixing of salaries must not be discriminatory, arbitrary or unreasonable. The above cited cases all so qualify the general power of the administrative agencies to fix the salaries of permanent teachers. Because of this qualification it necessarily follows that there must be a comparison with the salaries of other teachers or salaries of previous years. If this could not be done, the qualification would be meaningless.' (Italics ours.)

"The record there showed that the respondent board attempted to reduce appellants' salaries from $1,600 to $1,325, practically the minimum allowed by law. No other salaries were reduced; most of them were raised; and the salary of a teacher of approximately the same years of service, experience and qualifications remained the same. The court said:

"These facts standing alone are sufficient to force the conclusion that the attempted action of the board was unreasonable and arbitrary. The fact that the salary of a teacher of like experience and years of service was not reduced is particularly strong in support of appellants' claim of discrimination. That there must be some degree of uniformity was recently recognized by this court in the case of Fry v. Board of Education, 17 Cal.2d 753 [at page 757], 112 P.2d 229, 233, wherein it is stated "It must be conceded that, within the limits fixed by the School Code, the Board has discretionary control over the salaries of teachers. (Citing cases.) However, it must also be conceded that the legislature had enjoined on such Boards, within reasonable limits, the principle of uniformity of treatment as to salary for those performing like services with like experience. * * *'" And in that case the Supreme Court reversed the finding of the trial court that the Board had not acted arbitrarily.

"We conclude that the rule of the board requiring petitioner to acquire additional college units or suffer a reduction in salary to which she was otherwise entitled was in excess of the powers of the board. The judgment is reversed and the lower court is directed to issue the writ of mandamus as prayed."

In my opinion the judgment should be reversed.

HANCOCK OIL CO. OF CALIFORNIA et al. v. INDEPENDENT DISTRIBUTING CO. et al.

L. A. 18087.

Supreme Court of California.

July 13, 1944.

1. Interpleader ⇨6

Essential elements of common-law "interpleader" were that the same thing, debt, or duty must be claimed by both or all parties against whom relief is demanded; all adverse titles or claims must be dependent or derived from common source; the one seeking relief must not have nor claim any interest in the subject matter, and must have incurred no independent liability to either claimant.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Interpleader".

2. Interpleader ⇨7

The statute providing that interpleader lies although titles or claims are adverse to and independent of one another directly abrogates the common-law requirement that adverse claims be dependent or derived from common source, and hence privity between conflicting claimants need not be shown. Code Civ.Proc. § 386.

3. Interpleader ⇨7

Interpleader is not allowed by amended statute where each claimant asserts the right to a different debt, claim, or duty, or if conflicting claims are mutually exclusive, but fact that identical right is not asserted by each claimant does not preclude the remedy. Code Civ.Proc. § 386.

4. Interpleader ⚡7

If partnership suing lessors as trustees for the partnership, should claim reasonable value of use and occupation, with mesne profits or damages for waste, lessees could not maintain interpleader between lessors and partnership. Code Civ.Proc. § 386.

5. Interpleader ⚡21

Where lessees' complaint in interpleader alleged conflicting claims between lessors and partnership claiming that lessors held in trust for partnership, lessors and partnership were required to answer and, if each agreed that his claim concerned right to rents and royalties, lessees should be discharged from liability upon payment of their obligations under the lease. Code Civ.Proc. § 386.

6. Interpleader ⚡23

A complaint, in interpleader by lessees against lessors and partnership, which claimed that lessees held in trust for partnership, sufficiently showed that lessees stood in position of disinterested stakeholders. Code Civ.Proc. § 386.

7. Interpleader ⚡10

Interpleader will not lie if stakeholder has incurred some personal obligation to either claimant, independent of title or right to possession, which would create a claim against stakeholder that could not be settled in litigation with the other claimant.

8. Interpleader ⚡10

Mere existence of contractual relation between plaintiff in interpleader and one defendant, under which the fund is required to be paid to such claimant, does not of itself defeat interpleader.

9. Interpleader ⚡10

There was no "independent liability" of lessees to lessors, which would bar interpleader by lessees against lessors and partnership which claimed that lessors held in trust for partnership, to determine rights to oil royalties. Code Civ.Proc. § 386.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Independent Liability".

10. Landlord and tenant ⚡61

The rule against tenant's disputing landlord's title, which arose in actions by landlord for rent, is based upon estoppel and public policy. Code Civ.Proc. § 1962, subd. 4.

11. Interpleader ⚡9

A tenant may interplead his landlord and another where opposing claimant derived title from landlord after landlord-tenant relation commenced. Code Civ.Proc. § 386; § 1962, subd. 4.

12. Interpleader ⚡1½

The code provision concerning interpleader must be liberally construed as a remedial statute designed to avoid multiplicity of suits and prevent vexatious litigation. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 4, 386.

13. Statutes ⚡239

In California, an enactment in derogation of common law should be interpreted to effect its objects and promote justice. Code Civ.Proc. § 4.

14. Landlord and tenant ⚡63(2)

The amendment broadening remedy of interpleader implies intention to abrogate any limitation upon tenant as plaintiff in interpleader by reason of statute prohibiting him from denying landlord's title. Code Civ.Proc. § 386; § 1962, subd. 4.

15. Interpleader ⚡9

The statutes abolishing requirement of privity in interpleader cases did away with basis for common-law rule against tenant's maintaining interpleader to dispute landlord's title. Code Civ.Proc. § 386; § 1962, subd. 4.

16. Interpleader ⚡10

A tenant bringing interpleader against landlord and another must not deny landlord's title, since he would no longer be a disinterested stakeholder. Code Civ.Proc. § 386; § 1962, subd. 4.

17. Interpleader ⚡11

Lessees could maintain interpleader against lessors and partnership which claimed that lessors held in trust for it, notwithstanding statute prohibiting tenant from disputing landlord's title. Code Civ. Proc. § 386; § 1962, subd. 4.

18. Interpleader ⚡3(1)

A tenant may not maintain interpleader against lessor and another upon a mere pretext or suspicion of double vexation, but must allege facts showing reasonable probability of double vexation. Code Civ.Proc. § 386; § 1962, subd. 4.

19. Interpleader ⇐8(1)

The right to interpleader is not founded on possibility of double liability, but on threat of double vexation in respect to one liability.

20. Interpleader ⇐23

A complaint by lessees against lessors and copartnership which claimed that lessors held land in trust for it, seeking interpleader as to rights to oil royalties, was sufficient against general demurrer and precluded denial of leave to amend in sustaining special demurrer. Code Civ.Proc. § 386; § 1962, subd. 4.

21. Appeal and error ⇐1201(4)

Upon reconsideration of special demurrer after reversal of judgment sustaining special demurrer without leave to amend, trial court could require clarification of uncertainties in statement of essential elements of right to interplead.

CARTER, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Ernest D. Wagner, Judge.

Interpleader action by the Hancock Oil Company of California and another against the Independent Distributing Company, a copartnership, and others, and W. L. Hopkins and others, to determine rights to oil royalties. From a judgment sustaining a general and special demurrer without leave to amend, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed.

Prior opinion 130 P.2d 490.

Pease & Dolley, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Schauer, Ryon & McMahon and Robert W. McIntyre, all of Santa Barbara, for respondents.

EDMONDS, Justice.

Two corporations, lessees of certain real property, demand that the lessors and certain other persons interplead their rights to the landowner's oil royalties accrued and to accrue under the terms of the lease. A general and also a special demurrer interposed by some of those against whom interpleader is sought, was sustained without leave to amend, and the question for decision concerns the right of a tenant to maintain such a suit against his landlord and a stranger to the lease.

According to the complaint, in 1936 W. L. Hopkins and Gertrude Ann Hopkins, his wife, leased certain real property to Hancock Oil Company of California and R. R. Bush Oil Company. Landowner's royalties of approximately $1,500. have accrued. It is also alleged that in 1941, Independent Distributing Co., a copartnership composed of Merritt Bloxom, Eugene E. Lowell and Murray M. Lowell, brought an action asserting that W. L. Hopkins, Gertrude Ann Hopkins, and two persons sued by fictitious names, hold the real property described in the lease in trust for them. The relief sought in the suit of Independent Distributing Co. was an accounting of the rents of the land.

The copartnership and the copartners, together with W. L. Hopkins and Gertrude Ann Hopkins, H. James Hopkins and W. L. Hopkins, trustees of Wilbur T. Hopkins Trust, and H. James Hopkins and W. L. Hopkins, trustees of the H. James Hopkins Trust, are named as the defendants in the present suit, the charge of the complaint being that the copartnership and the copartners claim to be the owners of the land described in the lease and entitled to all of the landowner's royalties accrued and to accrue under that agreement. A further assertion of the complaint is that the defendants other than the copartnership and the copartners also claim the same royalties and by reason of these conflicting claims the lessees cannot safely determine to whom the rent should be paid. In conclusion, the plaintiffs declare that the suit was not commenced in collusion with any of the defendants.

To this complaint Merritt Bloxom, Eugene E. Lowell, Murray M. Lowell and Independent Distributing Co. filed an answer alleging that they are the owners of the property and entitled to all of the rents and profits from it. They also assert that the defendants named Hopkins are holding title to the property in trust for them. The defendants other than the copartners and the copartnership interposed a general demurrer and a special demurrer upon the ground of uncertainty. Each demurrer was sustained without leave to amend and the corporations' appeal is from the judgment which followed that order.

From an opinion of the trial judge, it appears that the demurrers were sustained upon the sole ground that a tenant may not question the title of his landlord at the date of the lease; accordingly, a suit by a tenant to interplead his landlord and one who claims the rent agreed to be paid in accordance with the terms of the lease by which he holds possession of the real property is in violation of this fundamental principle. The appellants assert that a suit in interpleader does not constitute a denial of the landlord's title but is simply a means by which the tenant may discharge his obligation to pay rent under the lease without becoming involved in the conflict between different claimants to the amount due and unpaid. They take the position that section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1881, abrogates the common law rule and so liberalizes the remedy as to permit a tenant to interplead his landlord and a stranger to the lease where both claim the rent.

The respondents, in defending the judgment in their favor, argue that the rights of the parties are governed by the common law rule prohibiting a tenant from interpleading his landlord with a stranger to the lease where their titles or claims are not in privity. They point out that a denial of the remedy under such circumstances is based upon the statute declaratory of the common law that "A tenant is not permitted to deny the title of his landlord at the time of the commencement of the relation." Code Civ.Proc., § 1962(4). They also insist that the common law rules governing interpleader are still in effect notwithstanding the provisions of section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The common law bill of interpleader had four essential elements: (1) The same thing, debt, or duty must be claimed by both or all the parties against whom the relief is demanded; (2) all of the adverse titles or claims must be dependent, or be derived from a common source; (3) the one seeking the relief must not have nor claim any interest in the subject matter; and (4) he must have incurred no independent liability to either of the claimants. See 4 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 5th Ed. 1941, § 1322, p. 906.

[2] These requirements have been termed historical limitations upon this otherwise expeditious equitable proceeding (see comment, 29 Cal.L.Rev. 35, 36, and 41; 4 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 5th Ed. 1941, § 1324, footnote p. 910), and in 1881 section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended to broaden the remedy. The statute, as modified to remove in part the artificial restrictions which have kept interpleader within technical and narrow bounds, declares, insofar as is here pertinent: "And whenever conflicting claims are or may be made upon a person for or relating to personal property, or the performance of an obligation, or any portion thereof, such person may bring an action against the conflicting claimants to compel them to interplead and litigate their several claims among themselves. The order of substitution may be made and the action of interpleader may be maintained, and the applicant or plaintiff be discharged from liability to all or any of the conflicting claimants, although their titles or claims have not a common origin, or are not identical, but are adverse to and independent of one another." The provision of this enactment, that interpleader lies "although their titles or claims have not a common origin * * * but are adverse to and independent of one another," directly abrogates the common law requirement that all the adverse titles or claims must be dependent or be derived from a common source, and it is therefore clear that privity between the conflicting claimants need not be shown to invoke the remedy under the code. But the effect of the amendment upon the common law requirement concerning the thing, debt or duty which is the subject of the complaint in interpleader is clearly seen only when the statute is considered in connection with the purpose and policy of the remedy.

[3] Early in the history of interpleader, it was held that one who sought to maintain such a suit must show outstanding claims, identical in every respect and without the slightest degree of variation, to the same thing, debt or duty. In the case of conflicting claims to specific personal property, this rigid formalism did not seriously interfere with the effectiveness of the proceeding. But where, as is generally the situation modernly, the subject matter of the conflicting claims was an obligation, a debt or a duty, the requirement as to the identity of the defendant's demands very often prevented a stakeholder from using interpleader where he was doubly vexed with respect to one liability. For example, under the narrow rule of the common law, if one person claimed all of the fund held by a bank and another person asserted the right to only a portion of that fund, the bank could not secure a determination of its liability by means of the equitable proceeding. The Legislature has removed this restriction, yet the very rationale of interpleader compels the conclusion that the amendment does not allow the remedy where each of the claimants asserts the right to a different debt, claim or duty. If the conflicting claims are mutually exclusive, interpleader cannot be maintained, but the fact that an identical right is not asserted by each of the claimants does not preclude the use of the remedy. This was recognized in Sullivan v. Lusk, 7 Cal. App. 186, 94 P. 91, 92, where, under authority of the statute, a trustee was permitted to interplead two attorneys, one of whom claimed one-half of the amount allowed by the court as counsel fees and the other asserted a right to the entire sum.

[4, 5] In the present case, the plaintiffs have alleged that each of the two groups against whom interpleader is sought claims the right to receive the rents and royalties reserved in the lease. If Independent Distributing Co. and the members of that copartnership should assert that they are entitled to the reasonable value of the use and occupation of the land leased to the plaintiffs, together with the mesne profits or damages for waste, the trial court would be required to deny the plaintiffs the right to interplead those parties with their lessors. Under such circumstances the claims of the parties would not relate to the same obligation. But as the appellants' complaint pleads that there are conflicting claims concerning their obligation to pay the rents and royalties reserved by the lease, the lessors and the third parties must answer and, if each of them agrees that his claim concerns the right to those rents and royalties, the lessees should be discharged from liability upon payment of their obligations under the lease.

[6] As to the remaining common law principles governing a suit of interpleader, the appellants' complaint conforms with the requirement that the plaintiff in such a proceeding must stand in the position of a disinterested stakeholder. However, much of the present controversy centers about the last element which is specified as essential. Although the complaint discloses no obligation of the appellants other than under the lease, the respondents assert that the obligation to pay rent constitutes an independent liability and bars the remedy of interpleader.

[7, 8] Yet not every obligation may be correctly characterized as an independent liability which will defeat the right to interpleader. The rule concerning independent liability is stated in Corpus Juris as follows: "Interpleader will not lie if the stakeholder has incurred some personal obligation to either of the claimants, independent of the title or the right to possession, because such claimant would in that event have a claim against him which could not be settled in a litigation with the other claimant." 33 C.J. 439. The editors of American Jurisprudence are in accord with this statement. 30 Am.Jur. 221. The Supreme Court of Maine put the matter most convincingly when it said: "The mere fact that a contractual relation exists between plaintiff and one of the defendants, under which the fund is required to be paid to such claimant, does not of itself defeat the right of interpleader. Love v. Hartford Life Ins. Co., 153 Mo.App. 144, 132 S.W. 335. If such were the law, it would be difficult to conceive of any set of facts which would enable a bank, a trustee, or other custodian of funds, or even a bailee, to maintain interpleader. The obligation referred to in the rule must be independent of the title or right of possession of the fund or property in question. * * * 'The independent obligation covered by the rule must be such that the litigation between the defendants will not determine it, in order to warrant the dismissal of the bill.' Byers v. Sansom-Thayer Commission Co., 111 Ill.App. 575, 580." First National Bank v. Reynolds, 127 Me. 340, 143 A. 266, 268, 60 A. L.R. 712. The same reasoning has been followed by this court in holding that an escrow-holder may maintain a suit in interpleader. The determining factor was said to be that "if the relations of the parties are such that the court's decision would determine the responsibility of the escrow holder, he is for the purposes, and within the scope, of the Code section authorizing interpleader a mere stakeholder." Security Trust, etc., Bank v. Carlsen,

Although Professor Pomeroy declares that an independent liability "arises from the very nature of the original relation subsisting between" the landlord and tenant, he states that such a suit is proper whenever there is some privity between the claimant and the lessor, as, for example, when the relation of trustee and cestui que trust has been created between them. It seems, therefore, that the reason why the author asserts that the relationship of the landlord and tenant precludes interpleader by the tenant is not that, under the lease, there is an independent liability but because there is no privity between the landlord and the one joined with him as a defendant. The cases cited in the text support this conclusion, for in each of them the court based its decision as to whether interpleader was the proper remedy upon a consideration of the respective claims with regard to their derivation or common origin.

[9] From what has been said, then, it is clear that, in the present case, as according to the facts alleged in the complaint, the relations inter se of the respondents and the copartners are such that the decision will determine the liability of the lessees to each of them, there is no independent liability which will bar the remedy of interpleader; accordingly the appellants' complaint is sufficient with respect to those of the four common law requirements for interpleader not abolished or modified by the amendment in 1881 to section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But notwithstanding this fact, say the respondents, the remedy is not a proper one under the circumstances here shown because of the rule of the common law, now embodied in the Code of Civil Procedure (§ 1962, subd. 4) that a tenant may not dispute the title of his landlord at the time of the commencement of the relation.

[10, 11] The common law doctrine is generally justified upon the ground that to allow the remedy under such circumstances would amount to a violation of the ancient doctrine of attornment. 97 A.L.R. 998; 30 Am.Jur. 216. Historically, the rule arose in actions wherein the landlord sued the tenant for rent. It is based upon estoppel and also the conclusion that to permit a tenant to defend against the person who put him in possession, upon the ground that the latter had no title or that another had a paramount title, would be against public policy. See 15 Cal.Jur. 645, 646; 32 Am.Jur. 108. But as an exception to it, courts permit a tenant to interplead his landlord and another where the opposing claimant derived his title from the landlord after the commencement of the relation. In such a situation, it is said, since the defendants are in privity, the tenant is not in the position of denying his landlord's title. Maulsby v. Scarborough, 179 Md. 67, 16 A.2d 897; 4 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence [5th ed. 1941], § 1327.

In the present case, had the appellants alleged that the copartnership and the copartners derived title from the lessors after the execution of the lease, the complaint would have been sufficient as against a demurrer upon the ground of the common law rule. However, since the complaint is not certain in this respect, and from the briefs it appears that the copartnership and the copartners claim to be the beneficiaries of a constructive trust, it is necessary to determine whether section 1962(4) of the Code of Civil Procedure prevents interpleader where privity is lacking or it arose prior to the commencement of the relation. The point has not been directly adjudicated in California, but this court has considered some aspects of the problem.

In McDevitt v. Sullivan, 1857, 8 Cal. 592, 597, an action for rent by a plaintiff standing in the lessor's shoes, the court mentioned by way of dictum, "The moment Sullivan [tenant] discovered that there were adverse claims to the rents, he should have filed his bill of interpleader, making all adverse claimants parties, and offering to pay the rents into Court, to bide the ultimate decision as to the party entitled to them." This case was decided before the important amendment in 1881 to section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Schluter v. Harvey, 1884, 65 Cal. 158, 3 P. 659, held that where, after execution of the lease, the original landlord had assigned the rents to Baumgarten and conveyed the land to Harvey, the tenant could interplead both claimants to his obligation for rent, hence there was no issue as to whether an interpleader action violates the rule that a tenant may not deny his landlord's title. The case of Warnock v. Harlow, 1892, 96 Cal. 298, 31 P. 166, 31 Am.St.Rep. 209, is not helpful. There a tenant interpleaded his landlord and a stranger to the lease, but his right to do so was not questioned and the court did not pass upon the propriety of the remedy. In Spangler v. Spangler, 1909, 11 Cal.App. 321, 104 P. 995, 996, the court considered a controversy concerning rights under a lease and observed that the lessee, who was then being sued for possession of the property, was the plaintiff in another suit. In commenting upon this situation, it was said: "Conflicting claims have been made on the defendant for the rent, he had a right to require [his lessor and her grantee under a conveyance executed subsequent to the lease] to interplead."

[12,13] Notwithstanding the strict common law limitation on interpleader in landlord-tenant cases which is justified by an ancient rule of real property, the code provision concerning the remedy must be liberally construed. A remedial statute, its purpose is to avoid a multiplicity of suits and prevent vexatious litigation. And contrary to the rule of the common law requiring that statutes in derogation of it are to be strictly construed, in this state such an enactment is to be interpreted "with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." Code Civ.Proc. § 4. Not inappropriate in this connection is the comment of the District Court of Appeal upon section 386 in its present form. The court said: "In view of such technical rules as prevail in other jurisdictions (30 Am.Jur. 218) the weight of authority is not persuasive, for 'the conditions under which the remedy may be invoked in this state are prescribed by statute and (the) scope of the remedy has been broadened and enlarged.'" Williams v. Gilmore, 51 Cal.App. 2d 684, 688, 125 P.2d 539, 541.

[14-16] It should also be noted that section 1962, subdivision 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure was in effect when the Legislature, by the amendment of section 386, broadened the remedy of interpleader. From that action an intention may be implied to do away with any limitation upon a tenant as a plaintiff in such litigation by reason of the statute prohibiting him from denying the title of his landlord. Another reasonable conclusion is that as, notwithstanding the rule codified in section 1962 (4), the common law permitted a tenant to interplead his landlord and a stranger in privity, when the Legislature abolished the requirement of privity in interpleader cases, it did away with the basis for the common law rule. Moreover, it is questionable whether a tenant, by interpleading his landlord and another, directly and absolutely disputes the former's title. At most, the tenant admits his landlord's title but asserts that another claims his obligation for rent. Clearly, the tenant must not deny his landlord's title for, otherwise, he would not be a disinterested stakeholder.

Interpleader is allowed in favor of a bank against rival claimants to a bank deposit (Conner v. Bank of Bakersfield, 1920, 183 Cal. 199, 190 P. 801; Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Miner, C.C., 25 F. 533; and see First Nat. Bank of Portland v. Reynolds, 127 Me. 340, 143 A. 266, 60 A.L.R. 719), or of an insurer against such claimants to the proceeds of an insurance policy. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Henes, 1935, 8 Cal. App.2d 306, 47 P.2d 513. Upon principle as, for the reasons which have been stated, the code section forbidding denial of a landowner's title does not apply to a suit of interpleader, there is no basis for any distinction between the position of a bank or an insurance company facing rival claims to a fund and a tenant from whom rent is demanded by two or more persons.

[17] And with general judicial recognition of the right to maintain interpleader against persons in privity, little force is left in the argument grounded upon public policy. From that standpoint, a tenant would be in no better position when meeting the claim of the grantee of a forged deed dated after the commencement of his lease and the demand of one asserting that since a time before the lease was made he has been the owner of the demised property. Without question the rule of privity would allow interpleader against the forged deed claimant. To deny the tenant its benefit in opposing the asserted rights of the person claiming under a title which is described as being derived from one not the lessor, or from the lessor at a date prior to that of the lease, would deprive him of the only effective method of protecting his interests. For in the absence of the right to interplead the landlord and the adverse claimant to the rent, the tenant is faced with the unfortunate alternative of forfeiting his lease or possibly paying twice. Perkins v. Benguet Consol. Min. Co., 55 Cal. App.2d 720, 132 P.2d 70. And there is no action at law adequate to shield him from vexation by multiple litigation over the obligation for rent, against the risk of double liability upon the same obligation, and against insecurity of tenancy.

Furthermore, interpleader is not only of importance to the tenant; it is also of advantage to the third party claimant. If the tenant may not interplead his landlord and another under the common law rule, the third party must establish his right to rent in a separate action. During the progress of this litigation the tenant would pay the rents to the landlord. It is entirely conceivable that before judgment was rendered the tenant might become insolvent, leaving the third party without recourse, or because of financial difficulties overtaking the landlord, the tenant would be required to pay his obligation twice.

[18,19] Unquestionably the landlord may suffer some disadvantage in being forced to defend a suit in interpleader. While the litigation continues the rent is withheld from him without interest. But the tenant may not maintain such a suit upon the mere pretext or suspicion of double vexation; he must allege facts showing a reasonable probability of double vexation. Without accurately appraising the rationale of interpleader, by some decisions this court has mentioned as an additional requirement that the plaintiff must allege facts showing a doubt as to which claimant he can safely pay. This statement was made in the case of Pfister v. Wade, 56 Cal. 43, 51, and echoed by way of dictum in Fidelity Sav., etc., Ass'n v. Rodgers, 180 Cal. 683, 685, 182 P. 426, and Conner v. Bank of Bakersfield, supra, 183 Cal. at page 203, 190 P. 801. However, to demand from a plaintiff that he express a doubt as to which adverse claimant he is liable is an admission that the basis upon which the right to interpleader rests is the avoidance of double liability. "The right to the remedy by interpleader is founded, however, not on the consideration that a man may be subjected to double liability, but on the fact that he is threatened with double vexation in respect to one liability." Pfister v. Wade, supra, 56 Cal. at page 47; 14 Cal.Jur. 702; see, also, 33 C.J. 438; 30 Am.Jur. 215; 4 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence [5th ed. 1941], § 1320.

[20,21] The complaint therefore states a cause of action against a general demurrer and denial of leave to amend was an abuse of discretion even if the special demurrer was well taken. However, upon a reconsideration of the special demurrer the court may require the clarification of any uncertainties in the statement of the essential elements of the right to interplead. Washer v. Bank of America, 21 Cal.2d 822, 136 P.2d 297.

CARTER, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent.

I agree with respondents that the case falls within the common law rule, now embodied in Code of Civil Procedure, section 1962(4) and I do not agree that the provisions of section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1881 have any such abrogative effect upon section 1962 (4) as has just been held by the majority of this court.

I also disagree with the intimation contained in the majority opinion that it can be at all "questionable whether a tenant, by interpleading his landlord and another, directly and absolutely disputes the former's title." As will hereinafter be shown this statement is contrary and stands in opposition to all common law and modern authority. The tenant's very action in filing suit in such a situation, in the absence of any factors showing a derivative title from the lessor to the claimant, subsequent to commencement of the landlord-tenant relationship, is tantamount to an admission that such dispute dated back at least to the commencement of the landlord-tenant relationship.

The principle that a tenant is not permitted to deny the title of his landlord at the time of the commencement of the landlord-tenant relationship stems far back into the common law, and is undisputed therein. The basis for the rule is found in the inequity of allowing a tenant to secure possession of premises through a lease from the person then in possession, and afterwards, and while retaining and enjoying such possession, disputing the right of the lessor to make the lease, and depriving the latter of the benefits of his rent or other obligations incurred when due or owing. As stated in the annotation in L.R.A.1916E at page 699:

"* * * possession of land under a lease imposes upon the lessee and those claiming under him the duty of recognizing the title of the lessor, in virtue of which he secured such possession; hence, so long as he continues in possession under his lease, he is estopped in any proceeding commenced by him against his lessor, to deny the latter's title as to defects therein or adverse claims outstanding at the time of the execution of the lease. In order to be entitled to question his landlord's title in these regards, he must first surrender possession of the premises. * * *

A correlative provision of the law in this respect is found in Civil Code, section 1948 providing that: "The attornment of a tenant to a stranger is void, unless it is made with the consent of the landlord, or in consequence of a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction."

The initial question to be considered then, is whether or not a suit in which a tenant interpleads his landlord and one who claims the rent agreed to be paid in accordance with the terms of the lease by which he holds possession of the real property contravenes the foregoing conclusive presumption, that: "A tenant is not permitted to deny the title of his landlord at the time of the commencement of the relation."

While the matter is one of first impression in California¹ it has been uniformly held in other jurisdictions where the question has been raised, that a tenant by interpleading his landlord with a third person asserting an adverse title to the leased premises antecedent to the inception of the landlord-tenant relationship, thereby disputes his landlord's title and the action is not maintainable. Whitaker v. Whitaker, Tenn. Ch., 62 S.W. 664, affirmed by Supreme Ct. of Tenn. without opinion, see 62 S.W. 673; Standley v. Roberts, 8 Cir., 59 F. 836, 8 C.C.A. 305; Oil Run Petroleum Co. v. Gale, 6 W.Va. 525; Camden Safe Deposit & Trust Co. v. Barbour, 117 N.J. Eq. 401, 176 A. 313, 97 A.L.R. 993; Lawrence v. Eller, 169 N.C. 211, 85 S.E. 291, L.R.A.1916E, 699, Ann.Cas.1917D, 546; 30 Am.Jur. 216; 32 Am.Jur. 126; Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (5th ed. 1941) vol. 4, §§ 1326, 1327. If, however, the claims of the third person originate from some act of the lessor done or suffered after the commencement of the landlord-tenant relationship the action is maintainable, not solely because of the presence of privity, as required at common law, but because then the tenant is not disputing his landlord's title as it existed at the commencement of the relation. Maulsby v. Scarborough, 179 Md. 67, 16 A.2d 897; Lawrence v. Eller, 169 N.C. 211, 85 S.E. 291, L.R.A.1916E, 696, Ann.Cas.1917D, 546; Coutan v. Williams, 9 Ves.Jr. 107; Clark v. Byne, 13 Ves.Jr. 386; 4 Pomeroy Equity Jurisprudence, § 1327. Such is not this case.

Although the matter has not been directly adjudicated in California, yet the fact has been adverted to on occasions that a tenant or subtenant, cannot compel the landlord to litigate the right of some other to that possession for which the tenant has no claim. Commissioners to Manage the Yosemite Valley, etc., v. Barnard, 98 Cal. 199, 32 P. 982; Vatuone v. Cannobio, 4 Cal.App. 422, 88 P. 374.

Commissioners to Manage the Yosemite Valley, etc., v. Barnard, supra, was an action in unlawful detainer. Plaintiff prevailed. However, the trial court made a finding that there was an outstanding lease in a third person. The defendant upon appeal urged that the plaintiff not being entitled to possession, the judgment should be reversed. This court held that the finding was immaterial and said [98 Cal. 199, 32 P. 983]: "The tenant, having received the possession by the permission of his landlord, cannot compel the landlord to litigate the right of some other to that possession for which the tenant has no claim. As between him and his landlord, his contract as lessee obligates him to surrender the possession at the expiration of his term, and he cannot set up an outstanding title, or show any title in himself which has not been mediately or immediately derived from his landlord."

From what has been said it follows that we may justly disregard the mandate pertaining to the law of landlord and tenant found in section 1962(4) of the Code of Civil Procedure, only if the amendment to section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure enacted in 1881 be taken to repeal section 1962(4) as far as interpleader actions are concerned.

asserted interest stemmed from the lessor subsequent to the lease. Warnock v. Harlow, 96 Cal. 298, 31 P. 166, 31 Am.St. Rep. 209, the issue was not raised.

Section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure as here relevant provides as follows:

"And whenever conflicting claims are or may be made upon a person for or relating to personal property, or the performance of an obligation, or any portion thereof, such persons may bring an action against the conflicting claimants to compel them to interplead and litigate their several claims among themselves. The order of substitution may be made and the action of interpleader may be maintained, and the applicant or plaintiff be discharged from liability to all or any of the conflicting claimants, although their titles or claims have not a common origin, or are not identical but are adverse to and independent of one another."

The reasons for the provisions in the concluding sentence of the foregoing code section that the claims of the interpleaders need not be of a common origin, nor identical, is easily seen when one refers to the rigid common law elements of a bill of interpleader, to wit: (1) The same thing, debt, or duty must be claimed by both or all the parties against whom the relief is demanded; (2) all of the adverse titles or claims must be dependent, or be derived from a common source; (3) the one seeking the relief must not have nor claim any interest in the subject matter; (4) he must have incurred no independent liability to either of the claimants. 4 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 5th Ed. 1941, § 1322.

As a result of the code provision (Code Civ. Proc. § 386), the first two requirements have been expressly abrogated in this state. 14 Cal.Jur. 702. Such being the primary purpose, an intention on the part of the Legislature to go further, without expressly saying so, and thereby repeal such an ancient and universally recognized principle pertaining to the law of landlord and tenant as that expressed in section 1962(4) of the Code of Civil Procedure as a conclusive presumption is not to be readily implied. It is to be noted that the phraseology of section 386 permits interpleader when "conflicting claims are or may be made upon a person for or relating to personal property, or the performance of an obligation * * *." If the Legislature intended the effect for which appellant contends, they would have included real property in that phraseology. Such wording is contained in the statutes of Indiana² and it has been held in that state, solely because of this wording that a tenant holding a lease may when an action is brought against him require interpleader of the other claimant. Hall v. Craig, 125 Ind. 523, 525, 25 N.E. 538.

As for the conclusion suggested in the majority opinion that "as, notwithstanding the rule codified in section 1962(4), the common law permitted a tenant to interplead his landlord and a stranger in privity, when the Legislature abolished the requirement of privity in interpleader cases, it did away with the basis for the common law rule," the presence of privity was not the basis of the common law rule, but merely one circumstance where a tenant would not be violating the rule. This rule cannot be done away with except by express or implied repeal of the code section itself.

The conclusion herein reached that section 1962(4) of the Code of Civil Procedure was not intended to be and has not been impliedly modified by section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1881 is further borne out by a consideration of the practical results that would ensue upon the allowance of such litigation at the instance of the tenant.

The landlord upon letting the tenant into possession is entitled to his rent according to the leasehold agreement. In the event of the failure of the tenant to make payment, the landlord can sue for same and the tenant cannot defend on the basis of title in a third person, or that the landlord had no right to make the lease. He must make payment to the lessor. Reynolds v. Lewis, 59 Cal. 20. If interpleader is allowed, the rent is paid into court and the landlord is deprived thereof until the termination of the litigation, and of the possible income therefrom entirely. Many of the property owners in this state, as was shown in the late depression are largely dependent upon the rent derived from their property to meet monthly trust deed and mortgage payments. Especially is this true today as to large scale war housing projects recently constructed throughout the state. Also taxes, insurance premiums and expenses for care and maintenance continue to fall due regardless of the legal entanglements that may envelop the income. With the owner's title so effectively clouded little help can be expected from financing institutions, and it is readily conceivable that this deprivation of income may easily in a short time result in loss of the owner's equity through foreclosure of encumbrances or execution sale upon a judgment suffered.

As stated by Judge Sanborn in the case of Standley v. Roberts, 8 Cir., 59 F. 836, 842, 8 C.C.A. 305:

"* * * It would be a monstrous proposition * * * that a tenant of an owner could take a second lease of the same premises from one claiming title to them, and then compel the real owner and the pretended owner to litigate, not only the title to the premises, but the validity of the leases the tenant himself had taken, before either lessor could recover his rent. If such a proposition could be sustained, any tenant might treat his landlord to as many law-suits as he could obtain leases of his premises. * * *"

See, also, Dungey v. Angove, 30 Eng. Reprint 644, 645.

Furthermore, such an action started by an unscrupulous tenant could quite conceivably interfere with and delay the owner in obtaining redress by use of the remedy of unlawful detainer,³ when the tenant holds over after the expiration of his term, or has failed to perform conditions and covenants in regard to upkeep of the property. Code Civ. Proc. § 1161(1) (3).

In my opinion it would be more consonant with considerations of justice and principles of equity jurisprudence to require a third person who asserts an adverse interest in real property antecedent to the inception of the landlord-tenant relationship, to obtain a preliminary injunction restraining the tenant from paying the rent to the landlord and requiring that it be impounded pending the litigation, or requiring the appointment of a receiver, in which events the person asserting the adverse interest would be required to put up a bond to protect the landlord in the event he ultimately prevailed in the action. In other words, the burden should be on the person who asserts an interest adverse to the landlord to convince the trial court on an application for a preliminary injunction that he has at least a prima facie case and give the trial court an opportunity to protect the landlord against damage by requiring the person asserting such adverse claim to furnish an undertaking which will protect the landlord against loss or damage in the event he should ultimately prevail. In such event all parties are protected and the landlord is not subjected to the perpetual threat that whenever a tenant becomes suspicious that his landlord's title may be questioned, he may bring an action in interpleader and require his landlord to resort to expensive and prolonged litigation before he may receive the rent which the tenant has by solemn written agreement promised to pay at stated periods. It is not difficult to visualize a situation where a tenant might resort to an action in interpleader without just or any cause in order to prevent the landlord from receiving the rent when due and thus cause the landlord financial embarrassment when no real or actual controversy exists as to the genuineness of the landlord's title. Such a situation should not be permitted to exist in view of the traditional policy of the common law which finds expression in our code section that "A tenant is not permitted to deny the title of his landlord at the time of the commencement of the relation." Code Civ. Proc. § 1962(4).

Although, according to the majority opinion, the complaint is uncertain as to just when the copartnership and copartners claimed to have derived title from the lessors, no contention has been made upon this appeal, that it is at all possible for plaintiffs, to amend, so as to take the case out of the rule, and it being indicative to the contrary according to the briefs on file, the sustaining of the general demurrer to plaintiff's complaint should therefore be affirmed.

³ Which action takes precedence on the court's calendar. Nor can a tenant who holds over after expiration of his term deny his landlord's title without first surrendering the premises. McKissick v. Ashby, 98 Cal. 422, 33 P. 729.

Division 1, California.

July 26, 1944.

Evidence that when arrested at card parlor defendant had in his possession a betting marker, which appeared to be in his handwriting, and a key to front door of premises sustained conviction for occupying building with paraphernalia for purpose of registering bets on horse races. 2. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 491(1)

In determining whether betting marker found in defendant's possession was in defendant's handwriting, trial court, in absence of objection or denial by defendant, had right to determine author of writing by making a comparison. Code Civ.Proc. § 1944.

It is not the actual making of bets, but occupancy of room with necessary equipment used for recording bets, which constitutes offense of occupying place with paraphernalia for recording bets on horse races. Penal Code, § 337a, subd. 2.

In prosecution for occupying store building with paraphernalia for recording bets on horse races, copy of Daily Turf Reporter found on premises was admissible. Penal Code, § 337a, subd. 2.

5. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 491(1)

In prosecution for occupying store building with paraphernalia for recording bets on horse races, there was no error in admission of application for a loan which was taken from defendant's wallet and which was used to compare writing thereon with that on betting marker found in defendant's possession in order to connect defendant with act of recording bets. Penal Code, § 337a, subd. 2.

Henry Davis was convicted of occupying a store building with paraphernalia for recording or registering bets on horse races, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Donald MacKay, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and T. G. Negrich, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

Defendant was charged in an information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles County with a violation of subdivision 2, section 337a of the Penal Code, in that on September 3, 1943, he did keep and occupy a store building at 3003 Central Avenue, Los Angeles, with books, papers, apparatus, device or paraphernalia for the purpose of recording or registering bets on horse races.

Defendant pleaded not guilty to the charge and waived a jury trial, it being stipulated that the prosecution's case might be submitted on the transcript of the preliminary examination and the exhibits there introduced.

This appeal is prosecuted from the judgment of conviction of the offense charged in the information, as well as from the order denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

The only evidence produced was the testimony of the arresting officer, James Fisk, attached to "Administrative Vice" division of the Los Angeles Police Department, whose qualifications as an expert in matters concerning bookmaking were stipulated to. His testimony was to the effect that he arrested appellant on September 3, 1943, at 11:40 o'clock in the morning at a card parlor situate at 3003 Central Avenue; that as he entered the establishment he saw appellant standing to the left of the entrance with "a piece of paper in his hand which he was attempting to place inside his belt above his right hip"; that the witness took the paper (People's Exhibit A) from appellant's hand; that this paper proved to be a betting marker; that said witness saw another man standing at the back of a cigar counter upon which rested a Daily Turf Reporter, which was identified as a scratch sheet and marked Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harold B. Landreth, Judge.

People's Exhibit B. Said witness stated that the papers and paraphernalia commonly used by bookmakers included scratch sheets, betting markers, racing forms, telephones, etc.; that a betting marker is used to record a bet on a horse race, records the identity of the horse indicated by a number or a name, and the identity of the bettor by name, initials or number, as well as the amount of money bet, whether to win, place or show; that a scratch sheet records entries at various tracks throughout the United States using numbers to identify the race horses on the betting marker, as well as recording the names of the jockeys, the probable odds, track and weather conditions, and other racing information. With respect to the betting marker (Exhibit A), said witness examined same and explained in detail the meaning of the various symbols and numbers used thereon; and also examined the scratch sheet (Exhibit B) which disclosed names and numbers having a definite meaning which he also explained. By then comparing the two exhibits, this witness stated he found that all the numbers indicating race horses on Exhibit A were also entered on Exhibit B, and that these were race horses running at various tracks in the United States on the date in question.

An application for a loan, which had theretofore been removed by said officer Fisk from appellant's wallet when he was being booked at Central Jail, was introduced in evidence as People's Exhibit C, and a key found in the possession of appellant at the time of his arrest and which operated the lock of the front door of the establishment at 3003 Central Avenue was introduced in evidence as People's Exhibit D. Appellant made objection to the introduction of Exhibits B and C, on the ground that B was not connected with him in any way, and that C was hearsay, incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial.

It is here urged as grounds for a reversal of the judgment and the order denying motion for a new trial, that (1) the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment; (2) the court committed error in admitting Exhibits B and C in evidence; (3) the court misapprehended the degree of proof required upon a trial as distinguished from a preliminary hearing.

[1] In connection with his first point, appellant claims that the mere possession of the betting marker (Exhibit A) is not a violation of section 337a of the Penal Code; that the fact that he had a key to the premises in his possession did not establish that he owned, operated or occupied the premises; and that his mere presence in the card room did not prove that he was using the room for any of the acts charged in the information.

While this might be true when each item is considered singly and unsupported by the several other facts and circumstances presented by the evidence herein, nevertheless, when considered together, they constitute sufficient basis for the judgment.

Although no formal proof was presented that either the betting marker (Exhibit A) or the application for the loan (Exhibit C) was in the handwriting of appellant, the trial court apparently was convinced that such was the case, because he made the following comment at the close of the trial: "Well, we have a betting marker in the defendant's own handwriting, at least it compares with the specimen of handwriting of the defendant, and a scratch sheet which anybody could have."

[2] The trial court had a right to determine the author of the writings (Exhibits A and C) by making a comparison (Sec. 1944, Code of Civil Procedure), in the absence of objection or denial by appellant.

[3] In People v. Kabakoff, 45 Cal.App. 2d 170, 173, 113 P.2d 760, 762, referring to People v. Manning, 37 Cal.App.2d 41, 98 P.2d 748, the court stated: "It was there declared that the offense was complete when it was shown that the accused occupied a room with papers and paraphernalia for the purpose of recording bets on horse races; that it is not the actual making of bets but the occupancy of such a room with the necessary equipment used for recording bets which constitutes the offense denounced by subdivision 2." It was further held (People v. Kabakoff, supra): "It is the law that when the corpus delicti of a crime has been established, in order to justify a conviction of the accused, it is necessary only to prove his participation in the crime. * * * It is not our duty to retry the case and to make inferences from the facts proved. That is the function of the trial court. The duty of the appellate court is to decide only whether upon the face of the evidence it can be held that sufficient facts could not have been found to warrant the inference of guilt. People v. Newland, 15 Cal.2d 678, 104 P.2d 778. To warrant a reversal of the judgment on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, we must be convinced that upon no hypothesis is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached by the trial court. Ibid."

Division 2, California.

July 12, 1944.

With respect to appellant's possession of the key to the card parlor (Exhibit D), he urges that this "is as consistent with his being the janitor, as the operator or occupant."

[4] Considerable importance must be attached to the fact that the key found in appellant's possession was one which operated the lock and turned the bolt of the front door of the premises at 3003 Central Avenue, which appellant is charged with having kept or occupied. People v. Roseberry, 23 Cal.App.2d 13, 14, 71 P.2d 944, citing People v. Parkinson, 138 Cal. App. 599, 611, 33 P.2d 18. The key was a substantial link in the chain of established facts, from which the court was warranted in making an inference that appellant was guilty of the offense charged against him, i. e., keeping or occupying premises with papers and paraphernalia for the purpose of recording a bet. Although the Daily Turf Reporter (Exhibit B) was found on the counter in front of another man and not in the immediate possession of appellant, it must be conceded that it constituted an item of paraphernalia set up in the premises for the use of patrons, and therefore admissible in evidence as such.

[5] Exhibit C is appellant's application to the Bank of America for a loan and was used by the trial court to compare the writing thereon with that on the betting marker (Exhibit A) in order to connect appellant with the act of recording bets. This paper was taken from appellant's wallet while he was being booked at Central Jail, and as heretofore stated, he made no effort to deny that either the application for the loan or the betting marker was in his own handwriting, and made no attempt whatever to explain his presence on the premises at 3003 Central Avenue.

The record discloses sufficient substantial evidence to support the judgment of conviction and the trial court did not commit prejudicial error in admitting in evidence the documents complained of.

For the reasons stated the judgment and order are, and each of them is, affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Newcomb Condee, Judge.

Leslie Roberts Nunn and Harry Navarre were convicted of a conspiracy to violate the Business and Professions Code, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., Bayard Rhone, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Fred N. Howser, Dist. Atty., and Jere J. Sullivan, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Ward Sullivan, of Los Angeles, for appellant Leslie Robert Nunn.

W. O. Graf, of Los Angeles, for appellant Harry Navarre.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

Defendants were accused by indictment of three felonies; to wit: by counts (1) and (2), manslaughter, by count (3), a criminal conspiracy to violate Division II, Chapter 5, Article 3 of the Business and Professions Code. A mistrial was declared as to the first two counts following the disagreement of jury. Defendants appeal from their conviction on the third. The grounds of appeal are (1) that the superior court lacked jurisdiction of the offense charged and (2) the refusal of certain proposed instructions constituted prejudicial error. The chapter involved is regulatory of the practice of medicine and its allied arts. The entire chapter comprises some 189 sections, the majority of which are wholly regulatory while others declare violations of the provisions of the chapter to be misdemeanors.

The offense charged is that on or about January 22, 1943, the defendants willfully conspired to cause the defendant Navarre who was a licensed chiropractor to advertise, practice and attempt to practice as a surgeon and to prescribe for diseases and physical conditions of divers and sundry persons and to administer various dangerous drugs specified in the indictment, during which time the said Navarre had no license for such practice. The overt acts alleged are that the two men entered into the conspiracy; that in pursuance thereof defendant Nunn, a licensed osteopathic physician, frequented, and remained during business hours in, the office of Navarre in the city of Los Angeles; that during the period from January 22 to April 9, 1943, together they administered drugs by means of hypodermic devices and performed surgical operations upon divers and sundry persons.

The facts established by the witnesses at the trial and by the statements of the defendants given before the grand jury are that several patients were treated in the office by Navarre in Nunn's presence. Navarre owned the entire office equipment, surgical instruments and a black bag containing drugs, narcotics, ethyl chloride, labeline and other materia medica. With the knowledge and co-operation of Dr. Nunn, Navarre diagnosed and treated numerous patients who were ignorant of his being an unlicensed physician and surgeon. He introduced Nunn to many as his "assistant" or "my new associate." He made arrangements for a number of throat operations which he advised, administered thyroid treatments and throat medicines. He administered the anaesthetic to Nancy Kenny, Tommy Richmond and Johnny Booker as Nunn performed their tonsillectomies. In the course of the several operations Nancy's lower front teeth were knocked out and both Tommy and Johnny died. He took blood tests, lanced boils and used the hypodermic needle on many persons.

Dr. Nunn's testimony given before the grand jury proved his agreement to work for Navarre for $75 a week and twenty five per cent of operation fees; that he knew Navarre was a chiropractor only; that he saw Navarre diagnose and treat the patients and make arrangement for their surgery. Nunn had nothing to do with them until the time for operations which were prescribed by Navarre. All diagnoses were Navarre's. Nunn witnessed Navarre's application of ethyl chloride; observed his injections of atropine preliminary to the operations, as in the cases of the Richmond and Booker children, and knew that Navarre had no license to administer the anaesthetic, apply the hypodermic needle or give any drug that comes within materia medica.

Navarre verified to the grand jury his contractual arrangements as stated by Nunn; stated that he continued to diagnose some of his patients after employing Dr. Nunn and that in some instances had recommended surgery; had given treatments of cold vaccines and whooping cough injections; had administered the anaesthetic for operations for which he fixed the price, made arrangements and took the sole responsibility. Dr. Nunn had nothing to do with the examinations, the diagnoses or the price in the cases of the two little boys who died under operation. Navarre administered injections of atropine in both cases.

The Superior Court Had Jurisdiction

The crime charged is that of a conspiracy to violate the provisions of Division II, Chapter 5, Article 3 of the Business and Professions Code. St.1937, p. 1258. The conspiracy constituted an understanding or an arrangement whereby Navarre was to hold himself out and to practice as a physician and surgeon and to administer drugs. The contention of defendants is that the practice of medicine without a license is nothing more than a misdemeanor under the provisions of Article 3, Section 2141; that since section 2378 provides that a conspiracy to violate any provision of this Chapter constitutes unprofessional conduct and since section 2426 makes it a misdemeanor on the part of any one who violates the latter section, it must follow that there is no basis for accusing defendants of a felony based upon such conspiracy to violate the provisions of Chapter 5. It is also argued that Chapter 5 controls the general provisions of the Penal Code relating to conspiracies to violate the terms of Chapter 5.

[1] Such contentions are based upon a misconception of the breadth and scope of section 182 of the Penal Code. Sections 2137 and 2138, 2141 and 2426 of Chapter 5 all forbid the practice of surgery and medicine by one who is unlicensed by the state, with specific exceptions noted in 2138. While it is true that Chapter 5 does not by its terms make it a felony to enter into a conspiracy to violate any provision of that chapter, yet there is no language to be found there which may be reasonably construed as a repeal of the provisions of the general law on conspiracy. Section 182, Penal Code, declares that those persons who conspire:

"5. To commit any act injurious to the public health, to public morals, or to pervert or obstruct justice, or the due administration of the laws.

"They are punishable as follows:

"* * * When they conspire to do any of the other acts described in this section they shall be punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or state penitentiary not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or both, and cases of such conspiracy may be prosecuted in the superior court of any county in which any overt act tending to effect such conspiracy shall be done."

The quoted language of section 182 specifically confers jurisdiction upon the superior court. This construction is supported by the case of People v. Buchchiere, 57 Cal.App.2d 153, 134 P.2d 505, and by the case of People v. Vanderpool, 20 Cal.2d 746, 128 P.2d 513. In the Vander- pool case, 20 Cal.2d at page 748, 128 P.2d at page 514, it was pointed out that by virtue of the designation of the phrase "in this code" the first penal paragraph of section 182 of the Penal Code is referable to conspiracy to commit felonies and acts injurious to the public morals only when the punishment for the commission of such felony or acts is prescribed by some provision of the Penal Code. But under all other circumstances the second penal paragraph of 182 controls. It was reasoned, therefore, that since the lending of money at excessive rates without a license is made a misdemeanor by the Small Loan Act, Gen. Laws Supp.1939, art. 7700, and it is not made punishable by any provision of the Penal Code, then a conspiracy to commit it is punishable under the second penal paragraph of section 182 as either a felony or a misdemeanor and is one within the jurisdiction of the superior court. The conviction of Bucchierre was upheld upon the same reasoning and by the same authority after the defendant had been accused of a conspiracy to violate the Employment Agency Act, St.1937, p. 230 et seq., by operating an agency without procuring a license therefor. Conducting an employment agency without first procuring a license was declared to come within the provisions of section 182. The Vanderpool case was reversed because of the failure of the Small Loan Act to specify the punishment for a violation of its terms. However, in the Bucchierre case it was held that the Employment Agency Act specifically defines a violation of the substantive act to be a misdemeanor and prescribes the punishment (Labor Code, § 1648, St.1937, p. 240) without reference to any section of the Penal Code. The court there declared (57 Cal.App.2d at page 165, 134 P.2d at page 511) that the provision for punishment in the Employment Agency Act differentiates it from the Small Loan Act and the holding in the Vanderpool case and concluded that inasmuch as punishment for a conspiracy to violate the Employment Agency Act was within the second penal paragraph, Section 182, the superior court had jurisdiction of the offense alleged in the indictment. In his concurring opinion in the Bucchierre case Mr. Justice Peters emphasizes that the Vanderpool case holds that if the conspiracy is to commit misdemeanors injurious to public morals that are made punishable by statute other than those contained within the Penal Code, the conspiracy can constitute a felony.

No Error in Refusing the Instructions Proposed by Defendants.

Defendants contend that they were prejudiced by the court's refusal to read certain proposed instructions with reference to the doctrine of circumstantial evidence. They erroneously argue that the judgment was based upon circumstantial evidence. It may be conceded that if all the proof had been circumstantial, instructions embracing the doctrines included in the proposed instructions might without any impropriety have been given. But they are met at the threshold with the proposition that the evidence was not wholly circumstantial but on the contrary was largely direct, as already shown by our abridgement of the testimony.

[2,3] No conspiracy can be established unless some overt act thereof be expressly alleged and proved, although other overt acts not alleged may be given in evidence. Section 1104, Penal Code. The indictment in the instant case alleges three overt acts. Those alleged and many others were proved. The contention made by defendants is that there is no direct evidence to establish the crime charged. But the summary of the testimony shows that Nunn agreed to work for Navarre on a percentage basis knowing that Navarre had no license to practice surgery and medicine; that Nunn knew before he operated on the little boys that Navarre had administered atropine injections and that he had no license to do so or to use a hypodermic needle to administer drugs named in materia medica. Navarre admitted that while he had Nunn associated with him he gave cold vaccines, whooping cough and atropine injections and knew that he was not authorized to do these things as a chiropractor. The presence of the office with its surgical appliances, the black bag filled with medicines, narcotics, hypodermic needles and syringes and the stipulation that they all belonged to Navarre were direct and irrefutable proof. The testimony of Mesdames Richmond, Booker, Tieman, Griep, Blair and of the Longuevans is direct and positive proof that the defendants knowingly worked together in the practice of medicine, with Navarre taking the lead, making the diagnoses, perfecting the arrangements, charging the fees. The case is not one of circumstantial evidence only. The overt acts were established by direct proof. While a conspiracy may be proved by circumstances from which it may be fairly inferred that the parties tacitly came to a mutual understanding. People v.

Yeager, 194 Cal. 452, 484, 229 P. 40), yet if the prosecution relies for conviction upon direct evidence and circumstances are shown as corroboration, an instruction on the law of circumstantial evidence need not be given. In fact the jury should not be told that the cause of the people is one of circumstantial evidence. In such cases it would be most mischievous to intimate to the jury that the state relies for conviction upon circumstantial evidence. People v. Lapara, 181 Cal. 66, 70, 183 P. 545. If indeed there is direct evidence against one accused of a conspiracy the defendant has no right to demand an instruction on circumstantial evidence. People v. Clark, 145 Cal. 727, 728, 79 P. 434. The mere fact that there is some circumstantial evidence in the record in corroboration of the direct testimony renders unnecessary and improper the giving of an instruction on circumstantial evidence. People v. Lonnen, 139 Cal. 634, 73 P. 586. In the case of People v. Williams, 134 Cal.App. 232, 236, 25 P.2d 259, the court approved of the rejection of an instruction on circumstantial evidence such as proposed by these appellants because there was direct evidence showing that the defendant had committed the offense. From the foregoing authorities it is clear that the court below properly rejected the proposed instructions with reference to circumstantial evidence.

[4, 5] By Chapter 5, Division II of the Business and Professions Code, a chiropractor cannot legally practice surgery. His practice is limited to the arts taught in the school of the chiropractor. He may not invade the field of medicine or surgery or administer drugs or medicines included within materia medica. He is limited to the use of mechanical hygienic measures incident to the care of the body which do not invade the field of medicine and surgery. People v. Fowler, 32 Cal.App.2d Supp. 737, 84 P.2d 326. The practice of medicine becomes unlawful when done or attempted by one not legally licensed. Pacific Employers Insurance Company v. Carpenter, 10 Cal.App.2d 592, 52 P.2d 992; Painless Parker v. Board of Dental Examiners, 216 Cal. 285, 14 P.2d 67.

The Proposed Instructions Were Erroneous

[6-9] The first of the proposed instructions rejected by the court authorizes an acquittal "if any facts or circumstances of this case can by any reasonable construction" be explained consistently with innocence. The second proposed instruction directs an acquittal in a case of circumstantial evidence where the incriminatory circumstances are either denied by the accused or were explained in such a way as to render his guilt doubtful. Neither of the two instructions stated the law. The guilt of a defendant may be shown by either direct proof or circumstantial evidence which excludes every hypothesis except that of guilt. When reliance is placed upon circumstantial evidence only it is not essential that the inculpatory facts be absolutely incompatible with innocence in order to justify the inference of guilt. It is sufficient if the jurors are convinced by the evidence of his guilt to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Borrego, 211 Cal. 759, 764, 297 P. 17.

[10] As to the second proposed instruction, the defendant may be so contradicted by circumstances alone as to render his testimony incredible. As between his denials and the circumstances in proof it is for the jury to determine which is true. People v. Kiser, 24 Cal.App. 540, 141 P. 1078.

[11, 12] The third proposed instruction required that each circumstance in a chain must be established to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt. Such is not the law. A reasonable doubt that would warrant an acquittal must arise from a "consideration of all the evidence." Sections 1096, 1096a, Penal Code; People v. Shimonaka, 16 Cal.App. 117, 125, 116 P. 327; People v. West, 34 Cal.App.2d 55, 59, 93 P.2d 153.

[13] All of the other proposed instructions which are the bases of assignments of error are either repetitious or argumentative and were therefore properly rejected.

The purported appeal from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment is dismissed.

The judgments of conviction of both defendants and the order denying the motion of defendant Nunn for a new trial are affirmed.

KEATING v. BASICH BROS. CONST. CO.*

Civ. 3362.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Aug. 3, 1944.

Rehearing Granted Aug. 29, 1944.

Subsequent Opinion 151 P.2d 892.

1. Appeal and error ⇨562

Counsel desiring to have exhibits before reviewing court have duty of having exhibits transmitted to court. Rules on Appeal of the Court of Appeal, rule 10.

2. Trespass ⇨46(1)

In action for damages for unauthorized use of real property by defendant corporation while engaged in roadbuilding, testimony of defendant's counsel, who was also a director, that corporation on or about April 2, 1943, took over all the equipment of copartnership, sustained finding that equipment placed on property was in possession of corporation and not partnership between May 5 and September 5, 1943. Code Civ.Proc. § 2055.

3. Evidence ⇨543(3)

In action for damages for placing roadbuilding equipment on property without authority, testimony as to rental value of property by witness who testified that he had been engaged as a roadbuilder for several years, had rented property for plants and machinery in Southern California, and had gone across property in question and knew installations on it, was not inadmissible on ground that witness was incompetent because he had rented no property in that area, since objection went to weight of evidence rather than to admissibility.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨133(3)

$1,915 to lessee of half section of unimproved desert land for use thereof for roadbuilding equipment without authority for about four months was not excessive, although land was of little value and rented for $50 per year.

5. Trespass ⇨45(1)

In action for damages for placing roadbuilding equipment on property without authority, testimony as to rentals subsequently obtained from another construction company was erroneously admitted.

150 P.2d—31

6. Evidence ⇨317(5)

In action for unauthorized use of property by corporation, testimony as to conversation with a watchman to establish that corporation and not a partnership was using the property was hearsay and inadmissible.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1170(7)

In action for placing roadbuilding equipment on property without authority, error in admitting testimony introduced to establish that defendant was using property was not prejudicial where that point was established by other evidence. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1170(7)

In action for damages for unauthorized use of property, tried by court without a jury, error in admission of evidence as to rent subsequently obtained from another construction company was not prejudicial, where there was other evidence on question of rental value which supported judgment. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

9. Appeal and error ⇨1170(7)

Where there is competent independent evidence in record supporting judgment without recourse to testimony erroneously admitted, generally error is not prejudicial. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

10. Appeal and error ⇨931(5)

Where testimony is erroneously admitted in trial by court, but there is competent independent evidence supporting judgment, it will be presumed on appeal that trial judge relied upon competent evidence in making his findings and rendering judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Elmer W. Heald, Judge.

Action by Hugh L. Keating against the Basich Brothers Construction Company to recover damages for the unauthorized use of property which the plaintiff held under lease. From a judgment for the plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Whitelaw & Whitelaw, of El Centro, for respondent.

* Subsequent opinion 151 P.2d 892.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment awarding plaintiff $1915 for damages for the unauthorized use of property which plaintiff held under lease.

The property involved was something more than one-half of a section of unimproved desert land (except improvements placed thereon by Basich Brothers, defendant's predecessor) lying along the Mexican border. Plaintiff's lessor held the property under a desert location and had leased it to plaintiff for $50 a year.

[1] The record is typewritten and contains references to various exhibits which are not included. Counsel have neglected to have any of the exhibits transmitted to this court as required by rule ten, Rules on Appeal. The duty of having exhibits, which counsel desire to have before the reviewing court, transmitted to that court is placed on them. In this case they have neglected to perform that duty so we will assume that they do not consider any of those exhibits necessary for the decision of the case and will rely on the very sketchy description of some of them contained in the briefs. Were this neglect to have the exhibits sent up confined to this case we would not mention it here, but lack of observance of the rule is very general among members of the bar, and has resulted in delays and loss of time in deciding numerous cases. The rule is honored more in its breach than in its observance. Counsel should familiarize themselves with that rule and follow it.

Basich Brothers Construction Company is a corporation organized under the laws of California and was engaged in the contracting business. In about 1932, due to differences among its stockholders, it ceased active business and became inactive. Its physical assets were taken over by Basich Brothers, a partnership, which continued its former operations and took over its physical assets. The corporation became active again early in 1943, and took over the physical assets of the partnership.

In 1942 the partnership entered into a contract for the construction of a Marine Corps base at El Centro, California. In performing this contract, which was completed early in 1943, it went into possession of and used the property involved here without the consent of plaintiff or his lessor.

After the completion of the Marine base the partnership entered into a contract with the Highway Department of the state to improve highways. The use of the land of which plaintiff was the lessee during the performance of this contract gives rise to this action. A road had been constructed across the property and two cement mixing plants, bunkers and bins, what is called in the record a "black top plant", other structures, and heavy road building machinery were on the property during the performance of this contract.

[2] Defendant first argues that there is no evidence that it, as a corporation, was in possession of the property instead of the partnership; that the finding that defendant was in possession of and used the property between May 5th and September 5th, 1943, is without evidentiary support, as is the finding that the reasonable rental value of the property was $500 per month during that time.

Counsel for defendant was director as well as attorney for the corporation. He was called as a witness by plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He testified that he was familiar with the business affairs of the corporation. We quote the following from his testimony:

"Q. The corporation then took over all the business of the Basich Brothers, is that right? A. They later took over the business of Basich Brothers. They didn't take over the business, they made arrangements to buy the equipment and carry on the contracts. All contracts now are being performed by Basich Brothers Construction Company, a corporation.

"Q. When was it the corporation, what definite date,—if you have something there you can refer to,—what definite date was it the corporation took over the partnership business? A. It was about April 2nd, 1943. * * *

"Q. Did the corporation take over all the operating equipment of Basich Brothers, a copartnership, on or about, or subsequent to April 2, 1943? A. They agreed to take over the equipment.

"Q. They took it all over, did they? A. Yes, sir."

The foregoing is sufficient to support the finding that the corporation was in possession of and used the property during the time in question. No contention is made that it had authority to occupy the property.

Defendant argues that there is no evidence in the record supporting the judgment of $1915 and that a judgment for that amount is excessive. It points to evidence to the effect that plaintiff rented the property for $50 per year and that it could not have been sold for more than five dollars an acre.

[3] Plaintiff called James A. Pascoe as his witness. For a number of years Pascoe had been engaged as a contractor or subcontractor building "highways, county roads, airport construction and anything else that comes with dirt moving"; that he had rented property as locations for his plants and machinery in various parts of Southern California and knew their rental value; that he had a job in Imperial Valley, went across the property in question every day for a time, and knew the installations on it; that its rental value was between five and six hundred dollars a month.

Defendant argues that as this witness had rented no property in Imperial Valley he was not competent to testify as to the rental value of the property in question here.

[4] This objection goes to the weight of the evidence rather than to its admissibility. While the judgment seems generous, it is supported by this evidence.

Defendant argues that prejudicial error was committed in overruling its objections to the admissibility of evidence and in denying its motions to strike out inadmissible evidence.

[5] Plaintiff was permitted to testify on direct examination, over objections, that after defendant had vacated the property, he leased it to the Macco Construction Company for $500 a month, and received a conditional offer of the same rental from another prospective tenant.

The objections to this evidence should have been sustained as the price agreed upon between an owner and a stranger to the action does not tend to establish reasonable market value or reasonable rental value. Ramish v. Kirschbraun & Sons, 90 Cal. 581, 27 P. 433; Estate of Ross, 171 Cal. 64, 151 P. 1138; Thompson v. Stoakes, 46 Cal.App.2d 285, 115 P.2d 830. Also, parts of this evidence were hearsay.

[6] Plaintiff was permitted to testify, over objection, to a conversation between himself and a watchman who was on the property on Labor Day of 1943. The purpose of this evidence was to establish that defendant and not the partnership was in possession. There is nothing in the record to indicate that this watchman had any authority to speak for the corporation or to represent it. This evidence was hearsay and was inadmissible. Ford v. Lou Kum Shu, 26 Cal.App. 203, 146 P. 199.

There are other similar rulings complained of by defendant which need not be separately considered.

We must next consider the prejudicial effect of these rulings under the provisions of section 4½ of Article VI of the Constitution.

[7] The evidence of Mr. Monteleone, to which we have already referred, rather clearly established that the corporation and not the partnership was in possession of and using this property during the time in question here. The testimony of the caretaker would neither add to nor detract from this other evidence. Therefore, we do not regard its admission as prejudicial. The trial court was probably convinced, as we are after studying the record, that this corporation occupied the property.

[8] In considering the effect of the erroneously admitted evidence as to the rental of the property to the Macco Construction Company after the cause of action in the instant case arose and the conditional offer to rent it, we must bear in mind that the case was tried by the court without a jury and that there is competent evidence in the record on the question of the rental value which supports the findings and judgment.

[9, 10] The general rule prevailing in California on this subject is this: Where there is competent independent evidence in the record which supports the judgment without recourse to the testimony erroneously admitted, generally the error is not prejudicial as it will be presumed on appeal that the trial judge considered and relied upon the competent evidence in making his findings and rendering the judgment. Evans v. Gibson, 220 Cal. 476, 31 P.2d 389; Roy v. Salisbury, 21 Cal.2d 176, 130 P.2d 706; Frazure v. Fitzpatrick, 21 Cal.2d 851, 136 P.2d 566; Ford v. Lou Kum Shu, supra; Watt v. Copeland, 92 Cal.App.

161, 267 P. 928; Cordi v. Garcia, 56 Cal. App.2d 584, 132 P.2d 887.

As the judgment is supported by competent evidence we cannot regard the admission of incompetent evidence as sufficiently prejudicial to result in its reversal.

We have considered the other questions argued by defendant and do not consider them of sufficient importance to require detailed discussion as they are without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

INS. CO.

Civ. 12635.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

July 14, 1944.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 12, 1944.

Hearing Denied Sept. 11, 1944.

1. Insurance ☞668(15)

In action on life policy, where plaintiffs sought to establish a past course of conduct over six year period on part of defendant in accepting premiums after grace period, testimony of defendant's cashier, based upon his recollection as to whether remittances of premiums over the six year period all bore postmarks which were prior to expiration of grace period, was for jury. Code Civ.Proc. § 2055.

2. Insurance ☞388(4)

In absence of fraud, where insured makes timely effort to transmit life policy premiums, substantial objections should be required to defeat it as a payment when there are acts and conduct of insurer which would induce insured to omit to follow strict letter of policy.

3. Insurance ☞388(4)

A past course of conduct of acceptance by insurer of payment of premiums after grace period may establish a waiver by insurer of right to declare forfeiture for failure to pay premiums at stipulated time or insurer may be estopped from asserting forfeiture where insured has been reasonably led to believe that payments made within a reasonable time after grace period will be acceptable.

4. Insurance ☞388(4)

Where for six years insured's assignee had paid premiums to soliciting agent without receiving receipt therefor signed by insurer's president or secretary as required by life policy and all such payments were made while insured was in default, and in only one instance had insurer demanded and received application for reinstatement, insurer was estopped from insisting upon a strict compliance with policy until it had given reasonable notice of its change in policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

Action by Bernice Taylor Gleed and another against the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company on a life policy. From a judgment for plaintiffs, the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Prior opinion, 149 P.2d 75.

Keesling & Keil, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Nathan G. Gray, of Berkeley, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

In a trial by jury the plaintiffs had a verdict for the sum of $3,000 based upon a policy of insurance on the life of F. C. Gleed, deceased. The plaintiff Gleed was the widow and the plaintiff Boggs was an assignee of deceased.

The appeal from the judgment is based upon the ground that the policy lapsed prior to the death of the insured because of nonpayment of the premium then due. The respondents defend the judgment on the ground that the time and manner of payment under the strict terms of the policy was waived, and that defendant is estopped from contesting the policy on that ground.

The contested policy was issued on May 12, 1936, through one Hansen, a duly authorized soliciting agent, and by him delivered to the insured. Thereafter, until the death of the insured, Mrs. Boggs paid all the premiums to Hansen—sometimes in cash and sometimes by her personal check. For each payment Mrs. Boggs received a receipt signed "Edward F. Hansen, Agent" and containing the policy number and the amount received. On June 12, 1942, in accordance with her usual custom, Mrs. Boggs gave to Hansen her check drawn in his name to cover the premium due on May 12, 1942. Hansen deposited the check in his own bank and drew his check in favor of appellant which was deposited for collection by appellant and returned unpaid because of insufficient funds in the Hansen account. On June 18th the appellant notified Hansen that his check had been dishonored, and that the company would hold it until it received a new remittance. On the same day appellant mailed a letter to the insured advising him that the policy had lapsed and requesting an application for reinstatement. The insured died early the following morning and this letter was found unopened in his home.

Appellant now contends that Hansen was not its agent, but that he was acting in the capacity of broker only for Mrs. Boggs, that the express terms of the policy permitted payments of premiums to be made "to an authorized agent of the Company only in exchange for the Company's receipt therefor signed by the President or the Secretary," that the check of Hansen was received for collection only, and did not constitute a payment of the premium. In the opening brief the appellant states: "From the facts in the instant case it is clear that no payment was made to the insurance company by the insured or his assignee in the manner specifically set forth in the policy for the payment of premiums, and that in the absence of a specific waiver of this provision of the policy, the policy lapsed on May 12, 1942, for non-payment of premium." Respondents concede the statement as to the manner in which payments of premiums were made, but defend the judgment upon the ground that the appellant waived these terms of the policy and is estopped to deny that Hansen was its authorized agent to collect and receipt for the premiums as paid.

On the issue of waiver and estoppel the evidence is that for a period of six years all premiums had been paid by Mrs. Boggs to Hansen, either in cash or by her personal check, and that no one of these payments was exchanged for the company's receipt signed by the president or secretary as required in the policy. It is also in evidence that each and all of these payments were made in this manner while the insured was in default, and in many cases after the period of grace had expired. During this period of six years eighteen separate premiums became due. Fourteen of these were accepted by appellant after the period of grace had expired. In only one instance—September, 1940—the appellant demanded and received an application for reinstatement.

[1] The appellant directs attention to the testimony of its cashier relative to the date of mailing of these remittances from Hansen. Called under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure this witness testified from records of the office covering the dates when "premium was paid" or "premium was received" over the six year period. On cross-examination by the appellant this witness testified that he personally inspected each one of the envelopes containing these remittances and knew that they all bore postmarks which were prior to the expiration of the grace period. The jury was at liberty to accept or reject this testimony based upon the witness' recollection of events occurring during a period of six years. And it was at liberty to accept or reject the positive testimony of the same witness, based upon the books of the company, showing when "payment" was made. The appellant vigorously contends that, since it is the common practice of insurance companies generally to treat premiums which are placed in the mail "as being paid within the grace period" provided the envelope of enclosure is stamped within such period, we should hold as matter of law that no one of these payments was in default. But if such is the common practice the record here casts doubt as to whether it was followed in this instance. The appellant's books show that the premiums were "paid" after the expiration of the grace period. These books are the only documentary evidence showing the date of payment. The envelopes bearing the postmarks have all been destroyed. If the custom had been followed and "payment" was acknowledged as of the date of mailing, the inquiry rises why the insured was not credited as having "paid" the premiums within time rather than having been charged on the books as being in default. However, the conflict in the evidence is apparent, and the jury's verdict cannot be disturbed on that ground.

Respondents also argue that the appellant is estopped to deny the authority of Hansen as its agent to accept payments of premiums within the grace period. At the special request of appellant, Hansen was licensed by the State Insurance Commissioner to "act as its agent", and for the full period he collected from the insured every premium that accrued. All these premiums were paid by Mrs. Boggs, as assignee of the insured. Some were paid in cash and some by check. All were made on the last day of grace, or the day before. In some instances Hansen mailed his check to appellant on the last day of grace. It was a fair inference for the jury to draw that during the entire period the appellant held out to the respondents that Hansen was its agent for all purposes and that payment of premium made to him within the grace period would be treated as payment within the terms of the policy.

[2] In Huber v. New York Life Ins. Co., 18 Cal.App.2d 269, 274, 63 P.2d 318, 320, which is a case similar to this in many respects, the District Court of Appeal said: "In the absence of fraud, where a party makes an effort to transmit his premium in time, it seems to us that substantial objection should be required to defeat it as a payment when there are acts or conduct on the part of the Insurance Company which would induce the insured to omit to follow the strict letter of the policy * * *."

[3] In Page v. Washington Mut. Life Ass'n, 20 Cal.2d 234, 239, 125 P.2d 20, 23, the Supreme Court said: "It is clear that a past course of conduct of acceptance by the insurer of payments of premiums after the grace period may establish a waiver by the insurer of the right to declare a forfeiture for failure to pay premiums exactly at the stipulated time, or the insurer may be said to be estopped to assert the forfeiture where the insured may be said to have been reasonably led to believe that payments made within a reasonable time after the grace period would be acceptable. Nelson v. National Guaranty Life Co., 131 Cal.App. 669, 21 P.2d 1022; Vinther v. Sunset Mut. Life Ins. Co., 11 Cal.App.2d 118, 53 P.2d 182; Turner v. Redwood Mutual Life Ass'n, 13 Cal.App.2d 573, 57 P.2d 222." To the same effect is Bryson v. National Travelers Cas. Co., 206 Cal. 475, 479, 274 P. 957.

[4] Upon these authorities we conclude that the course of conduct in relation to the payments of premiums running over a period of six years was such that the respondents were entitled to assume that the terms of the policy need not be adhered to strictly, and that the appellant was estopped from insisting upon a strict compliance with those terms until it had given the respondents reasonable notice of its change in policy.

The judgment is affirmed.

4. Venue 36

A mandamus proceeding was subject to same right to change of place of trial to county of defendant's residence, as would have been the case in any other civil action. Code Civ. Proc. § 395.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Alfred L. Bartlett, Judge.

Mandamus proceeding by the Liberal Catholic Church against Sarah Peacock Rogers, to compel the defendant to return certain books, records, property and moneys of the petitioner. From an order granting the defendant's motion for change of venue, the plaintiff appeals.

Order affirmed.

Charles A. Thomasset, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henderson & Churchill, of Ventura, for respondent.

SHINN, Justice.

This proceeding in mandamus was instituted in Los Angeles County and, upon demand and motion of Sarah Peacock Rogers, defendant in said proceeding, was transferred to Ventura County as the county in which said defendant resided at the time the proceeding was instituted. Plaintiff, Liberal Catholic Church, appeals.

The plaintiff, a corporation, in its petition for a writ of mandamus alleged in substance as follows: that petitioner is a non-profit corporation with its principal place of business in the City of Los Angeles, County of Los Angeles, whose corporate powers have been exercised by its board of directors, denominated trustees in its articles of incorporation. Prior to November 29, 1941, respondent Sarah Peacock Rogers was elected by said trustees as secretary, treasurer, and registrar of petitioner, and manager of St. Alban Press, under which name petitioner publishes books, literature and disposes of and distributes the same, and that on approximately the 29th day of November, 1941, the said trustees discharged said respondent from all of said offices, declared the same vacant, and elected others to said offices in her place, and respondent has had neither power nor authority to act as such since said date, and that respondent was again discharged from said office in the same manner on approximately June 1, 1943, and the same persons were re-elected thereto. That while holding said offices on or about the 29th day of November, 1941, respondent came into possession of certain books, records, property and monies of petitioner appertaining to the holding of said offices, and has withheld the same from petitioner's principal place of business since said date against the consent and without the wish of petitioner. Demand has been made by order of petitioner's board of trustees through its chairman for the return to said principal place of business of all of said personal property on November 29, 1941, and again on June 7, 1943; and on the 7th day of March, 1943, respondent was ordered to return the same by a special convocation of the petitioner. Respondent has at all times failed and refused to turn over said property to her successors in office, and she has no right, title or interest in and to the same. Among the books and papers so held by respondent were certain missals of the reasonable market value of $2277, which while being so withheld by respondent lost their entire value by reason of being superseded by a later edition, to petitioner's damage in the sum of $2277.

It was alleged that petitioner did not know and was unable to state the exact amount and nature of said property withheld by the respondent, although much of it was described in detail, and the petition prayed for judgment against respondent for the return of all of said property, for an accounting as to the same, and for the recovery of the sum of $2277 with interest thereon from November 29, 1941, and for general relief.

Defendant's demand for change of place of trial was supported by her affidavit that she was a resident of the County of Ventura at the time of the institution of the action and her application was in due form. This showing as to her residence was not controverted. Plaintiff filed a counter affidavit of the president and chairman of the board of trustees of plaintiff, in which it was stated that defendant was appointed secretary, treasurer, and registrar of plaintiff and manager of St. Alban Press "in the City of Los Angeles, County of Los Angeles, State of California, and accepted and took over said offices in the said city, county and state; that at the time of accepting and taking said offices of secretary, treasurer, registrar and manager of St. Alban Press respondent agreed and promised to abide by the orders and directions of the said board of trustees of petitioner and the members thereof gathered in provincial convocation; that said agreement was made and entered into by respondent in the said City of Los Angeles, County of Los Angeles, State of California," and the affidavit repeated allegations of the petition with reference to demands made upon defendant to return all of the property of plaintiff to it at its headquarters and principal office for the transaction of business in the City of Los Angeles.

[1-4] Under section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure defendant was entitled to a transfer of the action to the county of her residence unless the instant proceeding was founded on an obligation which she contracted to perform in Los Angeles County, or upon a contract entered into in Los Angeles County. It is the contention of plaintiff that the counter affidavit of its president proved that defendant entered into a contract to abide by orders duly made and given to her by plaintiff's governing board and officers and that she thereby incurred an obligation to return the property to plaintiff at its office in Los Angeles County. Defendant's answer to this contention is that the proceeding is not founded upon a contract or an obligation arising out of contract but that it is to compel the performance of a duty enjoined by law. We think the trial court did not err in making the order of transfer. It is provided by section 1085 of the Code of Civil Procedure that a writ of mandate may be issued "* * * to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station * * *." The action is founded upon defendant's legal duty as a former officer of plaintiff corporation. The claim for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of defendant's retention of the missals until they had been rendered valueless was purely incidental to the principal remedy sought through the extraordinary writ of mandate. The incorporation of this demand could not change the essential nature of the proceeding. Neither could it be changed by the averments of the counter affidavit by which it was attempted to substitute as the foundation of plaintiff's cause of action a contract which was in effect no more than a voluntary recognition and affirmance of defendant's legal duties as a former officer of plaintiff. If it should be granted that in some circumstances proof made by affidavit might be controlling in determining the nature of the foundation of the action, where it was not definitely established by the complaint, this could not be true in the instant case where plaintiff has invoked the remedy of mandamus in preference to an action based on the alleged contract. When section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure speaks of the performance of obligations, it has reference to contract obligations and not to duties imposed by law. This apparently was conceded by plaintiff when it filed the counter affidavit setting up the contract. And it is not contended here that the proceeding was improperly transferred to Ventura County if it is founded upon a duty imposed by law and not upon an obligation arising out of contract. It was said in Work v. Associated Almond Growers, 1926, 76 Cal. App. 708, 710, 245 P. 790, 791: "In determining the nature of an action, resort must be had to the averments of the complaint, and the character of the judgment which might be rendered upon a default. McFarland v. Martin, 144 Cal. 771, 78 P. 239." It cannot be questioned that if the proceeding had not been defended and the facts alleged had been proved, a peremptory writ of mandate would have issued commanding defendant to restore to plaintiff the corporate books and records and other property with which she had been entrusted as the secretary and treasurer of plaintiff. This would have compelled the performance of a legal duty, and the question of contract would not have entered into the case as the basis of the recovery or as an element of the proof. The court therefore properly construed the petition as the statement of a cause of action founded upon a legal duty and not upon a contract obligation. The proceeding in mandamus was subject to the same right to a change of place of trial as any other civil action. Bloom v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irr. Dist., 1939, 34 Cal.App.2d 102, 93 P.2d 164.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Raymond McIntosh, Judge.

Action by Dr. D. S. Murdock against Otto A. Gerth for malicious prosecution. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Otto A. Gerth and Stephen Monteleone, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Moidel, Moidel, Moidel & Goldsmith, by Isadore Moidel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

This is an appeal by defendant from an adverse judgment rendered in an action for malicious prosecution. The case was tried before the court without a jury, resulting in a judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $100 general damages and for the further amount of $775 special damages. The special damages were awarded for "required legal services caused by the action * * * of the defendant herein, Otto A. Gerth."

Defendant Gerth has practiced law since 1912, and since 1922 has been and now is an active member of the State Bar of California. Since the last named date he has been engaged in the practice of his profession in the City of Los Angeles.

In connection with the factual background which gave rise to this litigation, the record discloses that for some time prior to 1937 plaintiff herein and one Dr. H. H. Wolf, both veterinarians, were associated in the maintenance and operation of a dog and cat hospital in the city of Los Angeles, upon premises for the occupancy of which Dr. Wolf had a lease. The business was apparently a profitable one, for the record discloses that the net proceeds therefrom, after paying operating and other expenses, totaled $16,000 per year and that Drs. Wolf and Murdock each received in profits approximately $8,000 per annum.

On June 14, 1937, plaintiff herein, Dr. Murdock, commenced an action in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County against Dr. Wolf for dissolution of partnership and to quiet title. Attorney Gerth, defendant in the instant action, was attorney of record for Dr. Wolf in that proceeding. However, on June 21, Drs. Wolf and Murdock apparently got together themselves and without the aid of counsel prepared and executed the following agreement:

"June 21, 1937

"This agreement entered into between Dr. H. H. Wolf, party of the first part, and Dr. D. S. Murdock, party of the second part, wherein Dr. Murdock agrees to pay Dr. Wolf $7250 for his interest in the dog and cat hospital located at 1713 W. Slauson Avenue, at the rate of $200.00 per month for the first year, beginning June 17, 1937, and $175.00 per month for the second year, and $100.00 per month thereafter until the $7250.00 has been paid. This is to be a definite bona fide sale of Dr. H. H. Wolf's interests without any provisos whatsoever.

"Signed

"Dr. D. S. Murdock

"Dr. H. H. Wolf

"Witness John M. Smith"

We think from a reading of the record that it is a fair statement to say that upon execution of the foregoing agreement Dr. Wolf turned over to Dr. Murdock the aforesaid dog and cat hospital business. On June 22, 1937, attorney Gerth, the defendant herein, at the suggestion of his client and apparently with the consent of Dr. Murdock, prepared another agreement which was in the nature of a conditional sales contract. By the terms of this agreement Dr. Wolf agreed to sell and Dr. Murdock agreed to buy the aforesaid business for the sum of $7,250, payable in monthly instalments, and Dr. Murdock was to take over and have possession of the business from and after said date of June 22, 1937. Both Drs. Wolf and Murdock signed this contract and there was appended thereto an agreement wherein, by his signature, the owner of the leased premises approved the aforesaid agreement and consented to the transfer of responsibility under the lease from Dr. Wolf to Dr. Murdock as lessee.

On the morning of June 23, 1937, Dr. Wolf again consulted his attorney, defendant herein, informed the latter that Dr. Murdock, plaintiff herein, was dissatisfied with the agreement of June 22nd. Thereupon, Dr. Wolf wrote a letter to Dr. Murdock advising that, the latter having stated to Dr. Wolf that he was "on the advise of your attorney, rescinding the agreement" of June 22, that "we will consider the contract mutually cancelled and terminated".

Following negotiations and correspondence between defendant herein, as counsel for Dr. Wolf, and the attorney representing Dr. Murdock, a final agreement was entered into under date of July 6, 1937, duly executed by Drs. Wolf and Murdock, under the terms of which it was agreed between them that the former sold to the latter all right, title and interest in and to the dog and cat hospital hereinbefore referred to. The agreed purchase price was $7,000, payable at the rate of $200 per month for the first year; $175 per month for the second year; and $100 per month for the third and final year. The purchaser was to take over immediate control and operation of the business. By its further terms, the agreement provided that, at the expiration of one year, this last mentioned agreement might be "terminated and abrogated should the party of the second part (Dr. Murdock) so elect." Such termination could be effected by Dr. Murdock giving notice in writing to Dr. Wolf 60 days prior to the expiration of one year from the date of execution, of his "desires that this agreement be terminated." In the event Dr. Murdock exercised his option to terminate the contract, it was provided that all future payments thereunder should cease and the business be returned to Dr. Wolf; that "as of such date (date of termination on election) each of the parties will be restored to their respective rights in and to the subject matter of the sale herein that each has on the date hereof."

On May 5, 1938, after the lapse of 10 months from the date of execution of the last named agreement, Dr. Murdock elected to and did by due notice to Dr. Wolf rescind and terminate the sales contract of July 6, 1937. After receipt of such notice of termination and rescission, the defendant in the instant action, as attorney for

Dr. Wolf, on May 31, 1938, directed a letter to Dr. Murdock which, after acknowledging receipt of such notice, reads in part as follows:

"Your notice confirms information which was recently given us that you had no intention of fulfilling the agreement of July 6, 1937, when you entered into it and that you did so simply for the purpose of relieving yourself from a purchase which you made from Dr. Wolf and from a sale which Dr. Wolf made to you on June 21, 1937. No doubt you and your advisers felt you were clever in resorting to this ruse, yet you have not accomplished any such result.

"In the first place, your action in connection with the contract of July 6, 1937, is fraudulent and you induced Dr. Wolf to enter into that agreement through fraud and that agreement is hereby rescinded on the ground that it was a fraudulent transaction practiced by you upon Dr. Wolf.

"Even though the agreement of July 6, 1937, should be held to be a valid one, your termination of that agreement simply places both you and Dr. Wolf back in the position which you occupied prior to July 6, 1937, and reinstates your then status and such rights as each of you have * * *.

"The contract of July 6, 1937, was and is conditional, giving you the right to terminate it, but not in any way affecting any other agreement entered into between you and Dr. Wolf or changing any status which either one of you had prior to July 6, 1937. * * * I am now definitely informing you that Dr. Wolf stands upon his agreement with you under date of June 21, 1937, whereby he sold you his place of business, lease, equipment and good will for the sum of $7,250.00 payable according to its terms and he hereby demands fulfillment of that agreement."

The letter also informed Dr. Murdock that the payments made by him under the terminated agreement of July 6, 1937, amounting to $2200, would be credited on the original agreement of June 21, 1937.

On July 6, 1939, defendant herein, as attorney for Dr. H. H. Wolf, caused to be filed in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County a civil action against plaintiff in the instant action, Dr. D. S. Murdock, predicated upon the original agreement of June 21, 1937, by which action it was sought to enforce the terms and conditions of the last mentioned contract.

By his answer in the action just referred to, Dr. Murdock admitted execution of the contract of June 21, 1937, but denied any liability thereunder for the reason "that said document was never acted upon by the parties herein and was mutually cancelled by them within 24 hours of its execution." As affirmative defenses in the same action, the defendant therein, Dr. Murdock, alleged cancellation of the contract of June 21, 1937, by and through the hereinbefore mentioned agreement of June 22, 1937, known as the "conditional sales agreement"; that on June 23, 1937, "the plaintiff and defendant did mutually cancel and terminate and end any and all obligations arising out of the written agreement and documents dated June 21, 1937 * * * and June 22, 1937." Defendant Dr. Murdock in said action also filed a cross-complaint for declaratory relief.

Following trial of the action instituted by Dr. Wolf through defendant herein, attorney Gerth, against Dr. Murdock, the court filed the following conclusions of law:

"I. That the plaintiff, H. H. Wolf, is entitled to judgment against the defendant, D. S. Murdock, in the sum of Two Hundred ($200.00) Dollars, together with interest at the rate of 7% per annum from June 17, 1938.

"II. That the plaintiff, H. H. Wolf, is not entitled to judgment against the defendant, D. S. Murdock, for costs.

"Let judgment be entered accordingly."

Based thereon judgment was rendered as follows:

"It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the contract of June 21, 1937, between the parties hereto and set out in plaintiff's complaint was cancelled and rescinded by said parties on or about June 23, 1937; that no obligation or liability ever accrued under said contract from the defendant to the plaintiff, or otherwise, and that the plaintiff herein, H. H. Wolf, take nothing by his complaint against the defendant, D. S. Murdock, upon that certain agreement dated June 21, 1937, and set forth in plaintiff's complaint herein;

"It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff, H. H. Wolf, do have and recover against the defendant, D. S. Murdock, the sum of $200.00, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7% per annum from June 17, 1938, on that certain agreement set forth in the amendments to the answer of D. S. Murdock and dated July 6, 1937, but without costs." (Emphasis added.)

On December 20, 1940, Dr. Murdock as plaintiff commenced the action with which we are here concerned in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County against defendant Otto A. Gerth, who acted as counsel for plaintiff Dr. Wolf in the last above mentioned action. The instant proceeding was for malicious prosecution of the above named action by which it was sought to enforce the provisions and terms of the agreement of June 21, 1937. By his complaint in the case at bar plaintiff alleged that the defendant, Otto A. Gerth, acting as attorney for Dr. Wolf, prepared and caused the above mentioned action to be filed in the Superior Court and alleged in the complaint therein that Dr. Murdock was indebted to Dr. Wolf in the sum of $5,050 pursuant to the terms and conditions of the contract of June 21, 1937; that in preparing, filing and prosecuting said action against Dr. Murdock defendant herein, as attorney for Dr. Wolf, "acted maliciously and without probable cause * * * and the plaintiff is informed and believes and upon such information and belief alleges that the defendant herein Otto A. Gerth knew that the allegations in the complaint were false"; and further that defendant attorney was aware of the fact that his client who verified said complaint knew that the allegations thereof were false; that in preparing, filing and prosecuting said action defendant attorney Gerth "intended to harm, harass, vex, annoy and injure plaintiff herein"; that said complaint was prepared, filed and prosecuted by defendant attorney "with malice, and premeditation, and without any cause whatsoever, against the plaintiff herein, Dr. D. S. Murdock".

Following trial of the malicious prosecution action, the court rendered judgment as aforesaid in favor of plaintiff and against defendant attorney. From such judgment the latter prosecutes this appeal.

[1-3] Before an action for malicious prosecution can be maintained, it is essential that the proceeding complained of should have been finally terminated, and terminated in favor of the plaintiff. Respondent urges that the judgment in favor of appellant was not predicated upon the contract of June 21, 1937, upon which appellant relied but was based upon another agreement set forth in amendments to the answer filed by plaintiff in the instant action, viz., the agreement of July 6, 1937. While it is true that the judgment was not based upon the allegations of the complaint prepared by appellant, nevertheless, we are persuaded that, in determining whether a proceeding alleged to have been maliciously prosecuted has been terminated in favor of the party injured by such proceeding, consideration should be given to the judgment as a whole. To hold otherwise would defeat the purpose of the rule which seeks to prevent collateral attack upon judgments of duly constituted courts. Hence, the decree or judgment itself in the former action is the criterion by which to determine who was the successful party in such proceeding. In the instant case, it is at once apparent that the plaintiff in the action complained of actually obtained a judgment against Dr. Murdock, plaintiff in the instant malicious prosecution case for $200. True, such sum was only a small part of the amount sued for. Nevertheless, it is conclusive proof that there was an obligation on the part of Dr. Murdock to Dr. Wolf that was due and unpaid. The situation is not altered by the fact that the theory of plaintiff in the prior action was not adopted by the trial court. The fact remains that the judgment, framed upon the pleadings filed and the issues raised thereby, was not in favor of the defendant therein. By said judgment the defendant was required to pay plaintiff the sum of $200, and such judgment in favor of plaintiff was satisfied of record. Plaintiff in the prior action having obtained a judgment therein against the defendant, it must be held that there was probable cause for instituting the action. Therefore the plaintiff in the instant action has not sustained the indispensable burden cast upon him in a malicious prosecution action to prove that defendant herein when he prepared and filed the prior suit acted without probable cause.

Furthermore, on the issue of probable cause, the record herein reveals that defendant Gerth, as attorney for Dr. Wolf in the prior action, took the position that in none of the subsequent agreements was there any declaration that such agreements were made with the intent to extinguish the contract of June 21, 1937, upon which the law suit was based. In that connection it is noteworthy that in the agreement of June 23rd it is expressly provided that said agreement would cancel the contract of the preceding day, while the agreement of July 6, 1937, was specifically rescinded by Dr. Murdock.

Prior to filing the action complained of, appellant herein prepared a lengthy brief in which he reviewed the legal aspects of the contemplated action based upon the validity of the original contract of June 21, 1937. This brief was introduced into evidence at the trial of the malicious prosecution action with which we are here concerned. The authorities therein contained lend strength to appellant's claim that he honestly believed that the validity of the agreement of June 21, 1937, presented at least a debatable legal question in view of the contents thereof and of the disposition that was made of subsequent agreements. Defendant attorney in the instant action also contended that the contract of July 6, 1937, abridged the provisions of sections 1709 and 1710 of the Civil Code, in that Dr. Murdock negotiated and entered into said contract without any intention of complying with the terms and conditions thereof.

[4-7] "Probable cause" for the institution of an action does not mean "legal cause" therefor, because, if it did, every plaintiff who failed to recover in his law suit would be liable to an action for malicious prosecution. "Probable cause" has sometimes been defined as "reasonable cause"; and in the case of both civil and criminal prosecutions has been further defined to be an honest suspicion or belief on the part of the instigator thereof, founded upon facts sufficiently strong to warrant the average person in believing the charge to be true. The existence of probable cause is a question of law for the court, and in the case at bar, aside from the fact that plaintiff therein did not, as we have held, obtain a judgment in the original action, which fact is of itself conclusive evidence of probable cause for instituting the action, we are not impressed that there was otherwise, sufficient evidence to support an inference of lack of probable cause. The motives for instituting the prior action become unimportant if probable cause existed for the commencement of the suit in question.

[8] It would be inimical to the administration of justice if an attorney were to be held liable to a malicious prosecution action where, after an honest, industrious search of the authorities, upon facts stated to him by his client, he advises the latter that he has a good cause of action, although the courts upon a trial of such action decide that the attorney's judgment was erroneous. If the issue which the attorney is called upon to decide is fairly debatable, then under his oath of office, he is not only authorized but obligated to present and urge his client's claim upon the court. And if it subsequently is determined that the position honestly taken by the attorney was erroneous he should be relieved from responsibility.

[9] In the instant case we find no substantial evidence that the defendant attorney did more than in good faith urge upon the court the claims of his client, and the view of the law favorable to the interests of his client. Indeed, at the trial of the malicious prosecution action, the plaintiff therein did not take the witness stand and the only oral evidence with reference to motive and intent was given by the defendant attorney himself. Because, by the decision of the court, defendant attorney's theory of the law was held to be erroneous, but his client obtained a judgment upon another theory framed by the pleadings and sustained by the evidence the attorney may not be held answerable for malicious prosecution of the action in question. It is undoubtedly for this reason that, in determining whether the plaintiff or prosecutor in a given action acted with requisite belief, knowledge and prudence in the institution thereof so as to absolve him from the charge of want of probable cause, the law prescribes as one of two main facts, the existence of either of which, if proven, is held to be sufficient to establish probable cause, the following: That such plaintiff acted in the institution of the complained of action upon the opinion and advice of counsel to the effect that he had a good cause of action after laying all of the facts of the case, in good faith, before said counsel. If a plaintiff acting upon such advice commences his action, it has been held that probable cause therefor is established. Johnson v. Southern Pac. Co., 157 Cal. 333, 107 P. 611. However erroneous, from a legal standpoint, such advice might subsequently prove to be, its solicitation, based upon an honest statement of the facts, would be a complete defense for the attorney's client in a malicious prosecution action. When the advice to the client is honestly, though mistakenly given by an attorney, the same immunity from liability for malicious prosecution should attach to him.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment quieting plaintiffs' title to a lot in Cuyamaca Resort Unit No. 2 in San Diego County. Plaintiffs' title depends on the validity of a tax title under a deed to the State dated September 1, 1933, and another from the State to them dated August 12, 1941. Plaintiffs argue the question of the insufficiency of the answer to raise certain necessary issues but owing to the conclusion we have reached on the merits it will be unnecessary to decide this question. We will assume that the answer put all necessary questions in issue.

Defendant urges that the notice of sale for delinquent taxes for the fiscal year 1926-1927 is defective in form and affords no legal basis for the deed to the State. Subdivision 1 of section 3764 of the Political Code in effect when the sale to the State was made (Stats.1921, p. 107) provided that the notice of sale contain the statement that the property would be sold for the nonpayment of "taxes, assessments, penalties, and costs due, and which are a lien thereon." (Emphasis ours.) The published notice omitted the word "assessments" and the phrase "and which are a lien thereon", but did contain the statement that the "real estate upon which said taxes are a lien * * * will be sold." It is argued that this departure from the language of the code section is fatal to the proceedings and rendered the resulting sale void.

[1,2] There is nothing in the record indicating there were any "assessments" on the property. The word "assessments" has a well-defined meaning in the law of this State and usually refers to a charge levied on property to pay for a local improvement. If there were no delinquent assessments, no good purpose could be served by requiring that word to be included in the published notice. If used under such circumstances it would imply a mistake of fact and would only serve to confuse the taxpayer. In the absence of proof that there were delinquent assessments that were a lien on the property we cannot regard the omission of the word "assessments" from the notice as material here.

[3] We regard the words "and which are a lien thereon" as a direction to the tax collector to correctly compute and state the amount of the delinquencies and not as a requirement that those words be made a part of the notice which did contain the statement that the property upon which the taxes were a lien would be sold which we believe should be held to be a sufficient compliance with the statute as there is no claim that the amount of the taxes, penalties and costs was not correctly given in the notice.

Further, the quoted words appearing in subdivision 1 of the section do not appear in the form of the notice set forth in subdivision 2.

[4] If we understand them correctly, counsel for defendant argue that the notice is defective because, in the delinquent list, instead of segregating the items of taxes, penalties and costs, the total of the three was given in the notice. He relies on the case of Gottstein v. Kelly, 206 Cal. 742, 276 P. 347, and other cases of similar import as supporting this argument.

In 1929 the legislature amended sections of the Political Code which were construed as follows in Clayton v. Schultz, 4 Cal.2d 425, 50 P.2d 446, 448:

"There is no merit in respondents' claim that the notice of sale was fatally defective in failing to separately state the items of 'taxes, penalties and costs,' as required prior to 1929—this on the theory that the applicable law is the law as it stood in 1926 which controls the period of redemption. Risso v. Crooks, 217 Cal. 219, 220, 17 P.2d 1001; Teralta Land, etc., Co. v. Shaffer, 116 Cal. 518, 48 P. 613, 58 Am.St.Rep. 194. It is true that prior to 1929, following decision in the case of Gottstein v. Kelly, 206 Cal. 742, 276 P. 347, the possible construction to be placed upon the provisions of sections 3747 and 3764 of the Political Code was that taxes, penalties, and costs should be separately shown on the publication of delinquent lists and notices of sale under sections 3771 and 3771a. In that year, however, the Legislature amended these provisions by requiring that the delinquent list show only 'an amount equal to the total amount of all taxes, assessments, penalties, and costs due' (section 3764), and in passing the amendatory act (St.1929, p. 742), specifically declared that the amendments were 'not a change in, but a statement and declaratory of the law as the legislature intended it to be by the terms of those sections prior to' the amendment (section 4). Section 4 further provided: 'All publications of delinquent lists or notices of sale under sections 3771 and 3771a of the Political Code failing to enter taxes, penalties and costs as separate entries but entering the foregoing amounts in one total sum and all sales * * * tax deeds * * * based upon such entries * * * are hereby confirmed, validated and legalized.' * * *

"Respondents contend that so much of the 1929 amendment as is declaratory of the meaning of the said statutes, with intent to give them a retrospective operation, is unconstitutional. In view of the nature and purpose of the amendment, so far as here applicable, we see no reason to declare it unconstitutional."

Defendant argues that the tax collector lacked the necessary authority to issue the tax deed to the State because of jurisdictional defects in the publication of the notice and the addenda thereto.

Section 3764 of the Political Code, in effect in 1933, provided that the notice should contain the provision that the property would be sold upon which "five years will have elapsed from the date of the sale of said property to the state." The published notice provided that the property would be sold "upon which five years or more will have elapsed * * *." The code section also contained the provision that the notice should contain the statement that the property was sold to the State "in the year 19— for the taxes of the year 19—."

The notice which was published on August 8, 1933, contained the usual notice of sale for delinquencies for the year 1932-1933, to which was added: "Addenda to Delinquent Tax List—Notice of Sale of Property at Public Auction for Delinquent Taxes of 1927. Also Property Delinquent for Taxes of 1925 and 1926 for which sale was postponed under Section 3817a of the Political Code", after which appeared the notice of the time and place of the sale.

Then appeared the following in the addenda: "Delinquent Taxes of 1927", followed by descriptions of the various parcels and the other appropriate information. Next then appeared: "Delinquent Taxes of 1925. For which sale was postponed in 1931 and again in 1932 in accordance with Section 3817a of the Political Code." This was followed by numbers, the names of those to whom the parcels were assessed, with descriptions and the amount of the least acceptable bid, an index and also "Delinquent Taxes of 1926—For which sale was postponed in 1932 in accordance with Section 3817a of the Political Code", followed by the same information.

Defendant maintains that this variance in the notice from the provisions of the statute is fatal to the proceedings. It should be noted that section 3764 of the Political Code in 1933 provided that the notices "shall be in substance, and may be in form, as follows:", after which appeared the form to be used.

The variance in the published notice from the prescribed form was made necessary by the tax moratorium statute under which delinquent tax sales were postponed beyond the five year period. With the moratorium in force, and the sales postponed, it was impossible for the tax collector to give a notice of the date of a sale when only five years had elapsed from the first date of the sale to the State. Because of these postponements it was also impossible for him to state, in a single notice, a single year in which various parcels had been sold to the State for taxes of a single year.

[5,6] We must construe the various code sections together and harmonize them if possible. While it might have been proper for the legislature to have amended section 3764 of the Political Code at the time of the passage of the moratorium act to make the form of the notice conform to the new conditions made necessary by that act, this was not done, and the assessor had to modify the form to conform to those new conditions. No taxpayer who studied the notice which was published could have been misled by it. He could have gained all the information to which he was entitled under the law. In view of these facts, and of the further fact that the Political Code provided that the notice "shall be in substance, and may be in form", set forth, there was a substantial compliance with the law and defendant may not complain.

[7] The final objection raised by defendant is that the deed from the State to plaintiffs was void because it set forth that the property was sold for $250 when $258.29 was the actual price paid for it.

The same contention was made in Smart v. Peek, 213 Cal. 452, 2 P.2d 380, 382, and was held unsound for the following reasons: "And, further appellant contends that even if the sale was for the proper amount, a deed which misrecites a sale for a smaller amount is void. The deed in the instant case recited a sale for $2,219.87. When a tax deed founded upon a valid sale is defective in form or misrecites the true facts, the sale is not rendered void, but the purchaser may compel the issuance to him of a conveyance in due form. Morton v. Sloan, 96 Cal.App. 747, 275 P. 223, and cases cited. In Morton v. Sloan, supra, in which a hearing was denied by this court, the District Court of Appeal considered the validity of a tax deed issued under section 3785b, Political Code, which recited that all taxes levied and assessed prior to 1919 had been paid, instead of reciting that all taxes prior to sale had been paid. Although a corrected deed had been filed in the Appellate Court under section 956a, Code of Civil Procedure, the court held that the original deed was not void, but sufficient to pass title, and merely irregular. A similar decision was made in Schainman v. All Persons, 96 Cal.App. 753, 275 P. 225, 276 P. 113, decided the same day. We regard the rule of said decisions as equally applicable to a deed issued under section 3898, Political Code, and to an error in stating the amount bid for the property. The misrecital does not destroy the effect of the deed as prima facie evidence of the other facts recited therein."

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 14400.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

July 14, 1944.

Hearing Granted Sept. 11, 1944.

1. Appeal and error ⚡1010(1)

Where a judgment is attacked on ground that it is not supported by evidence, power of appellate court ends when it once determines that there is substantial evidence which will support conclusions of trial court.

2. Money lent ⚡
Trusts ⚡1

Transaction by which one advances money to enable another to purchase a house is a "loan", not a "trust".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Loan" and "Trust".

3. Trusts ⚡95

Where lender advances money to enable borrower to purchase a house and takes title as security for loan, subsequent repudiation by lender of relation of borrower and lender operates as a legal fraud upon borrower and gives rise to a "resulting trust" in property in favor of borrower.

150 P.2d—32

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Resulting Trust".

4. Trusts ⚡102(1)

Equity will not permit a trustee to take advantage of an existing confidential relation out of which trust arose and by repudiating such trust obtain an unconscionable advantage of confiding beneficiary.

5. Trusts ⚡95

Where lender advanced money to enable borrower to purchase a house and took title as security for loan and thereafter repudiated relationship of borrower and lender, it was unnecessary to the establishment of a resulting trust that borrower have expressly promised to repay lender since loan created implied promise to repay which was only promise necessary to constitute trust relation.

6. Trusts ⚡95

Where lender advanced money to enable borrower to make down payment on purchase of a house and took title as security for loan, the fact that lender subsequently advanced additional money to pay on purchase price and on improvements did not prevent establishment of resulting trust when lender repudiated borrower-lender relationship and claimed title.

7. Trusts ⚡361

Where lender advanced money to enable borrower to purchase a house and took title to secure loan and upon repudiation of borrower-lender relationship declined to render a statement of amount advanced, the establishment of a resulting trust was not defeated by failure of borrower to tender borrowed money since under circumstances tender would have been an idle act.

8. Trusts ⚡110

Substantial evidence supported finding of fact that defendant advanced money to plaintiff to enable plaintiff to purchase a house and took title to secure loan and thereafter repudiated borrower-lender relationship and claimed ownership and supported conclusion that a resulting trust in plaintiff's favor existed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Roy V. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by Betty Ruth L. Viner, a married woman, Business Women's Association, and Western States University against Mary Untrecht, also known as Mary Holdstein, to enforce a resulting trust and for other relief, wherein defendant cross-complained. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Arthur E. Briggs and J. B. Mandel, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

S. L. Kurland and W. L. Pollard, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

This action was brought to enforce a resulting trust. All of the material allegations of the complaint were found to be true and those of the cross-complaint substantially contrary to the complaint were found to be untrue. Also, the court found that defendant's maintenance of her claims of ownership of the realty and of her claims of lien upon certain movables of plaintiffs was in bad faith by reason of which plaintiffs were awarded punitive damages in the sum of $500 and attorney's fees in the sum of $1,000. From the ensuing judgment defendant has brought this appeal upon seven grounds which may be summed up in one phrase: Insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and the judgment.

Prior to November 15, 1940, plaintiff, Betty Ruth L. Viner, herein at times referred to as Ruth, was president of the Business Women's Association, a non-profit California corporation. She and her corporation were associated with the Western States University, also a non-profit California corporation. The two corporations having interests in the several properties involved in this action joined with Mrs. Viner as plaintiffs to establish their respective claims against a common adversary. Inasmuch as the right of each of the plaintiffs as against one another is immaterial to a decision, no effort will be made to keep distinct their respective interests in so far as they relate to defendant.

Prior to November 1, 1940, Ruth had become associated with Mary Untrecht. About that date, having investigated and negotiated for the acquisition of a house on behalf of the association, Ruth decided to undertake the purchase of a 14-room residence, herein referred to as "La Brea house," for the sum of $6,300, on terms, 10 per cent payable in cash, the balance in deferred payments. In order to effect such purchase, Ruth, on behalf of the association, agreed with Mary that if the latter would lend the association as much as $1,500 in order to consummate the transaction, to make certain improvements, to buy certain furnishings and to pay the accrued taxes and assessments, she should be repaid her advances with interest at 7 per cent per annum compounded; receive instructions in comptometry and bookkeeping; and have the use of a residential room free of charge. As security for the repayment of her loan, it was agreed that the title to the property should be vested in appellant. Arrangements for the purchase were concluded on January 3, 1941, when Mary deposited in the escrow the sum of $715, and she was named grantee in the conveyance of La Brea house. The association installed its furniture and furnishings, leased to Mrs. Viner certain residential rooms, which lease was ratified by appellant, and, pursuant to the loan agreement had Mary occupy the room she had selected for herself. Ruth moved her furniture into the house, and both women continued to reside there until the repudiation of the loan contract by Mary. In the following month appellant advanced an additional $200 to the association and thereafter made other payments on account of the property.

Simultaneously with the foregoing events the association leased certain space in the building to the University for the storage of its 165 law books, comptometer and other equipment, and this tenant agreed to carry out the association's contract with appellant by giving her the promised technical training. For 15 months Mary continued to reside in the house and to receive instructions from the University which tuition was of the reasonable value of $300. After the occupancy of the house by the two women Ruth made practically all of the installment payments on the purchase price, paid the taxes and assessments, the utilities and expense of operation. This continued until January 3, 1942, when the association extended Ruth's lease for another year in consideration of her continuing the same payments. This she did until July 15, 1942.

On July 4, 1942, appellant informed the association that she was the owner, demanded possession of the property; declared the association had no interest therein, and repudiated all agreements theretofore made with Ruth. The association requested a statement of its indebtedness on account of moneys advanced by Mary but that lady denied the existence of any such indebtedness. Following her oral and written demands for possession of the realty, Mary asserted a lodging-house lien upon the furniture and furnishings of Ruth and of the association and on September 10 she posted notice of sale of such effects pursuant to section 1861, Civil Code, for the purpose of satisfying her demand for moneys advanced in the sum of $3,142. The total of all moneys advanced by Mary in connection with the purchase and improvement of the property was $1,679.62. Besides her own occupancy, after her repudiation, Mary received net rentals as income from the house $623.55. The University owns the movables it had placed in the house under its lease from the association. Although Mary had no interest in them she took them away and held them without any claim of right. Their value is $3,000. That corporation and Ruth were both required to employ counsel to effect a recovery and the reasonable value of such service to each of them is the sum of $500.

The foregoing facts having been found to be true the court's conclusions logically followed:

(1) At all times the association was the equitable owner of La Brea house. (2) Appellant held title for the association, subject to her lien for advances; but (3) she had no right to the possession of the property to the exclusion of respondents. (4) By virtue of their leases, Ruth and the University were entitled to occupy certain rooms which they entered as tenants of the association and occupied February 1, 1941;

(5) neither was Mary a boarding-house keeper, nor was Ruth her guest, but on the contrary, (6) she was herself a mere lodger in the house. (7) She had no lien upon, claim to, or legal interest in, the law books and bookkeeping machines taken by her from the University or to any of the chattels claimed by Ruth, therefore Mary should pay to Ruth and the University the $1,000 counsel fees and (8) Mrs. Viner is entitled to punitive damages in the sum of $500 for the arbitrary, wrongful and oppressive taking and holding of her belongings and for appellant's wilful maintenance of her unjust contentions. (9) The association is entitled to all moneys heretofore collected as rentals on the La Brea house and to an accounting of all moneys paid her as rentals therefor after July 4, 1942, besides the $623.55 she accounted for prior to judgment.

[1] It is fundamental that where a judgment is attacked on the ground that it is not supported, the power of the appellate court ends when it shall once have determined that there is substantial evidence which will support the conclusions of the trial court. Drabkin v. Bigelow, 59 Cal. App.2d 68, 74, 138 P.2d 750; Crawford v. Southern Pacific Co., 3 Cal.2d 427, 45 P.2d 183.

The proof found to support the findings and judgment consists of two classes, to-wit: (1) the declarations and affidavits of appellant and (2) the testimony of respondents and their witnesses. Appellant testified that she purchased the La Brea home for herself and that the association was never mentioned in reference to the property. However, on October 29, 1940, she executed an affidavit to be filed in her divorce action in the superior court in which she averred that her sole possession was a $200 interest in a life insurance policy. On June 19, 1941, six months after taking title to the La Brea property she filed her verified complaint in the same action alleging that she was indigent. In the same case she testified that she was holding title to the La Brea house and its furnishings as trustee for the association and that she had no interest therein. In the verified divorce pleading she alleged that she was so ill from October 1940 to June 1941 that she was unable to do any work. In the present action she alleged under oath (1) that during the same period she acted as secretary, office attendant, and instructor for the association in its downtown office and that such services were worth $1,540; and (2) that during the same period she was acting as house keeper for respondent and did all of the work for the roomers and for respondents in the upkeep of the 14-room house with its six bedrooms, and that such services were reasonably worth $1,690.

The testimony of Mrs. Viner established that she located the La Brea house as a desirable property and that Mary accompanied her to visit the premises. They had many meetings at which the house was shown to certain members of the association and Mary finally agreed to lend to the association funds not to exceed $1,500 in order to complete the purchase and repairs. Ruth conducted all negotiations; dictated all letters for Mary's signature and told the agent of the grantor that the title would be taken in the name of appellant in order to comply with the requirements of the bank which declined to convey to an eleemosynary corporation. Mary was present at all of the conferences had with the seller or its agent; was present at the time the escrow was opened; advanced $715 for the down payment and other outlays and later gave Ruth $200 as a part of the sums she had promised to advance. At the time the escrow was opened Mary stated to her that she hesitated to take title to the property in her own name by reason of the pendency of her divorce action.

The witness Ware, licensed real estate broker, testified that, in his presence at about the time the escrow was opened, appellant stated that they could not buy the property under the name of the association on account of its credit standing and that it was taken by her in trust for the association to be conveyed to it at the proper time. The witness Kohan, sister of Ruth, established that in the summer of 1942 Mary told her that the property belonged to the association; that she desired to collect the moneys she had loaned to make the purchase; that it could be sold at a profit if she and Ruth could share in it; that if it were not sold "she would use any means possible to make her sell it so she could get her loan therefrom." One Shoup made a contract for the painting of the house with Mrs. Viner and Mrs. Snyder, president and secretary of the association. He testified that he never discussed the painting with appellant during the several weeks he was there employed. No proof has been designated to show that appellant at any time prior to July 4, 1942, ever made claim to ownership of La Brea house and we find none. When she gave notice of her repudiation her language was that "all agreements between you and Mrs. Utrecht are hereby terminated and cancelled." From such language of her counsel, in the light of other proof, it is a reasonable inference that appellant acknowledged that she had made a contract with Mrs. Viner on terms advantageous to the latter.

[2-7] Contrary to the contention of appellant there is no express trust alleged. Neither was one proved. The only agreement expressed was one for the loan of moneys by appellant to the association to enable it to effect the purchase of the house and lots. There is no more trust involved in the transaction with the association than it would have been had the money been borrowed from Mrs. Snyder or any other member of the association. After an agreement to lend the money to the association the legal effect of the actual payment to the bank was the transfer of the money from Mary to the association. Brown v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 589, 126 P. 493. A transaction such as that in the case at bar is denominated as a loan by the grantee to the beneficiary. The vesting of title in the lender as security for her loan and the subsequent repudiation by the grantee of the relation of borrower and lender operates as a legal fraud upon the beneficiary and gives rise to a resulting trust in the property in favor of those to whom the loan was made. Webb v. Vercoe, 201 Cal. 754, 759, 258 P. 1099, 54 A.L.R. 1200. Equity will not permit a trustee, such as appellant is shown here to have been, to take advantage of an existing confidential relation out of which the trust arose and by repudiating such trust obtain an unconscionable advantage of the confiding beneficiary. Bradley Co. v. Bradley, 165 Cal. 237, 240, 131 P. 750; Lauricella v. Lauricella, 161 Cal. 61, 118 P. 430. The contention that there was no promise made to repay appellant is immaterial. The loan of the money created an implied promise to repay it. No other promise was necessary to constitute or accentuate the trust relation between the parties. Brown v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 589, 126 P. 493, supra. Neither does the fact of the advancement of moneys to pay on the purchase price and improvements prevent the establishment of the resulting trust. Watson v. Poore, 18 Cal.2d 302, 115 P.2d 478. Nor is it defeated by the failure of the association to tender the borrowed moneys. Mary's declination to render a statement and her repudiation of the loan agreement and the trust rendered further tenders idle and unnecessary. Penziner v. West American Finance Co., 133 Cal.App. 578, 586, 24 P.2d 501.

No other equitable ground is alleged or proved that would justify a judicial defeat of the trust relationship. Appellant was free to make the loan. She received a valuable consideration for it. She continued to enjoy the relationship for 18 months at the expiration of which she was free to enforce her lien for the moneys she had advanced.

[8] It is thus demonstrated that the findings with reference to the La Brea property find abundant and substantial support in the record leaving this court without power to alter the conclusions derived by the court below.

We have examined the authorities cited by appellant in support of her numerous points. Wittenbrock v. Cass, 110 Cal. 1, 42 P. 300; Donohoe v. Mariposa Land & Mining Co., 66 Cal. 317, 5 P. 495; Holtze v. Holtze, 2 Cal.2d 566, 42 P.2d 323; Fee-ney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 21 P. 984, 4 L.R.A. 826, 12 Am.St.Rep. 162; Barr v. O'Donnell, 76 Cal. 469, 18 P. 429, 9 Am. St.Rep. 242; Lincoln v. Chamberlain, 61 Cal.App. 399, 214 P. 1013; Dimity v. Dixon, 74 Cal.App. 714, 241 P. 905; 65 C. J., p. 423, §§ 184, 185; Kirk White & Co. v. Bieg-Hoffine & Co., 6 Cal.App.2d 188, 44 P.2d 439. These authorities merely restate old rules and familiar principles. Nothing in them is contrary to the decision we have derived. For a case to be of guiding value its facts must parallel or assimilate those under review.

[9] The evidence is equally abundant to support the findings that the University owns the personal property which it claimed, that Ruth was not a guest of Mary; that appellant is not the owner of the chattels used by the association in the La Brea house and that the only moneys advanced by Mary to the association were those used for the purchase and for taxes and improvement of the property. Appellant witnessed the conversation whereby Ruth was employed to operate the house. The latter engaged a number of employees to do the menial tasks from February 1941 till May 1942. By her own testimony and that of Mrs. Munson, Mrs. Schneider and Miss Yaryan, Ruth established that Mary neither brought any furniture into the house nor made a payment on that which was purchased, and that she did no work either as a domestic or as an instructor for the respondents. Because of such proof and its acceptance by the court, appellant's asserted claims of a lien as an innkeeper upon the personal property in the La Brea house are utterly without right (Fox v. Windemere Hotel Apartment Co., 30 Cal. App. 162, 157 P. 820), and the award of punitive damages and counsel fees is justified. Sec. 3294, Civil Code.

[10] Finally, appellant complains that the amount of her award should have been $2,489.31 instead of $1,679.62, allowed by the judgment. In support of this she cites her own testimony with reference to a payment she made to the painter, the "constant tendency of Mrs. Viner to exaggerate," and the misstatement of Exhibit 39. For reasons heretofore recited we cannot retry the comparative veracity or accuracy of the witnesses. On the contrary, the findings and decision determined that Mary is entitled to a total of $1,679.62, the full amount of her loans, but that she is indebted to respondents for net rentals collected, $623.55; punitive damages, $500; counsel fees, $1,000, aggregating $2,123.55, besides costs in the sum of $208.35. It is thus shown that if her contentions as to the computations of the court should be adopted, she would have but an inconsequential amount in her favor. Of course we cannot go behind the findings under the circumstances.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edward J. Kelly, Judge.

Action by Annie L. Ambrose and Joe Alioto against Mary Alioto to compel the defendant to convey to plaintiffs certain interests in a boat. From an adverse judgment, the defendant appeals.

Judgment modified and as modified, affirmed.

Sloane & Steiner, of San Diego, for appellant.

Gray, Cary, Ames & Driscoll and John M. Cranston, all of San Diego, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

The plaintiffs brought this action to compel the defendant to convey to them, respectively, certain interests in a boat. The defendant owned a fishing boat which had been losing money and which was mortgaged to the Bank of America for $31,200. She desired to convert it into a tuna boat at an estimated cost of $23,500. With this end in view she entered into a written contract on April 30, 1938, with Wiley V. Ambrose, who was a fish canner and president of Westgate Sea Products Company. This corporation will be referred to as "Westgate".

So far as material to this discussion, this contract provided that $6500 of the cost of conversion should be paid by the defendant and $17,000 by Ambrose; that if the cost of conversion was less than the estimate the defendant could use the balance for maintenance and operation; that any excess cost over the estimate should be paid equally by the parties; that as security the defendant should give to Ambrose a note for $17,000, payable on or before three years, without interest, with a second mortgage on the vessel; that all fish caught with the boat for five years should be delivered to Westgate; and that, after paying certain operating expenses, Westgate should apply the balance of the proceeds in payment of the bank's first mortgage.

Paragraph 8 of the contract then provided that the defendant should manage the boat so long as its earnings were sufficient to pay all amounts coming due on the mortgage to the bank; that otherwise Ambrose might assume control and appoint his own master and crew; that if the earnings of the boat after a reasonable time were still insufficient to cure any default under the bank's mortgage the vessel should be sold; that the net proceeds of the sale should be divided equally between the parties and any indebtedness of the defendant to Ambrose should be deemed satisfied and discharged; and that if his operation of the boat proved successful Ambrose should continue to manage the boat until the bank's mortgage was paid.

Paragraph 9 provided that when the bank's mortgage was paid Ambrose should have the option either (a) to receive a new note for $17,000 plus one-half of the principal amount paid to the bank during the life of the agreement (payable on or before two years with interest at 6% secured by a first mortgage on the boat), or (b) to receive a bill of sale to an undivided one-half interest in the vessel. In either event, the original $17,000 note and second mortgage was to be cancelled and satisfied.

Paragraph 12 provided that at any time after two years from the time Ambrose received such a bill of sale, the defendant should have the option of repurchasing his half interest by paying him the amounts mentioned in subdivision (a) of paragraph 9, with interest at 6% from the date of the bill of sale.

The work on the boat was completed at a cost of about $5000 in excess of the estimate, which amount was advanced by Westgate. Mr. Ambrose died and his interest in this contract, and in Westgate, passed to his wife Annie L. Ambrose, so far as material here. The boat was operated for some two years at a loss and on June 15, 1940, the debts against the boat amounted to over $65,000, exclusive of the $17,000 Ambrose had advanced on the project. The bank was threatening to foreclose its first mortgage and on June 27, 1940, Mrs. Ambrose's son, acting as her agent, gave the defendant written notice that pursuant to paragraph 8 of the contract he had taken over the management of the boat and appointed a new captain and crew, that he had appointed Joe Alioto as captain and, in order to secure his full cooperation, had agreed to give him a one-fifth interest in the boat when all of the existing liabilities had been paid. The notice then informed the defendant that under this agreement with Joe Alioto "when and if said liabilities are paid off completely, it will then be in order for both of us to deed to Joe Alioto enough of our interest in said vessel to give him an undivided one-fifth interest", and asked the defendant for her approval. The defendant signed this notice as "Accepted: 7-2-40" before two witnesses.

The operation of the boat with Joe Alioto as master proved successful and by May, 1943, the $65,000 indebtedness above referred to had been reduced to about $9000, the bank's first mortgage having been fully paid. Mrs. Ambrose then notified the defendant in writing that she elected to receive an undivided one-half interest in the vessel and offered to deliver up and discharge the note and mortgage for $17,000 given under the original agreement. The defendant refused to convey any interest in the vessel but offered to pay to Mrs. Ambrose the amounts mentioned in subdivision (a) of paragraph 9 of the agreement.

In this action which followed, Mrs. Ambrose recognized the right of Joe Alioto to a one-fifth interest in this boat and a judgment was asked for requiring the defendant to specifically perform the agreements above mentioned and directing her to execute a bill of sale to Mrs. Ambrose for an undivided two-fifths interest in this boat and another to Joe Alioto for an undivided one-fifth interest therein. The court found in all respects in favor of the plaintiffs and entered a judgment directing the defendant to convey an undivided two-fifths interest to Mrs. Ambrose and an undivided one-fifth interest to Joe Alioto. From this judgment the defendant has appealed.

With respect to the judgment as affecting Mrs. Ambrose, appellant's sole contention is that the transaction covered by the contract of April 30, 1938, constituted a loan of $17,000 by Ambrose to the appellant; that subdivision (a) of paragraph 8 of the contract provides for a bonus of $15,600 for making this loan; that subdivision (b) of paragraph 8 carries the same bonus provision which must be eventually paid before the appellant may redeem the property and clear the boat; that these bonus provisions are usurious and unenforceable; that Mrs. Ambrose is, therefore, legally entitled only to a return of the $17,000 originally advanced, without interest; and that it follows that the judgment giving her an interest in the boat should be reversed. Cases are cited in which it has been held that where the transaction is purely a loan the lender may not contract for more than legal interest through any device or scheme intended to evade the usury law or to obtain more interest under another name.

[1] We think it rather clearly appears from its terms that this contract was something more than, and quite different from, a mere loan of money and that the provision for the giving of a note and mortgage as security was but an incidental part of the transaction. Mr. Ambrose was engaged in the fish canning business and was undoubtedly interested in getting fish for his cannery. The inference would seem reasonable that his main purpose was to get this boat in operation and secure the fish it produced for his cannery. In any event, he was willing to advance $17,000 and to risk that amount, as well as any return thereon, on the success of the venture. It makes no difference by what name the relationship created by this contract is called. Whatever else it does, the contract provides for a form of joint enterprise in which he was to participate and through which he might well lose all or a part of the amount he agreed to advance. The appellant did not agree to repay the $17,000 in any event. It was clearly provided in paragraph 8 that if the operation of the vessel proved unsuccessful Ambrose's recovery should be limited to half of the net proceeds of the sale of the boat, and that he should cancel any obligation on the part of the appellant.

Ambrose was to receive nothing unless and until the bank's mortgage was paid in full. In the meantime, he was not only interested in having the boat produce that result but he was authorized to take over its full management to that end, which he later did. When the bank's mortgage was paid he was to surrender and cancel the $17,000 note and second mortgage, which had never called for any interest. He then had the option to ask for and receive a note and mortgage for his $17,000 plus what amounted to one-half of the profits up to that time, or to receive a conveyance of a half interest in the boat, subject to appellant's right to take over the entire boat two years later at a price which included his share of the profits up to the time the mortgage was paid.

In a very real sense Ambrose was hazarding his investment on the success of the enterprise and was to receive a share in the earnings of the boat, and finally and possibly in the boat itself, rather than any interest on his investment or any flat obligation to repay the same. Even the appellant concedes that at the time of the transaction "Actually the $17,000 loan was a poor risk."

[2] The general rule here applicable is thus stated in 11 Cal.Jur. 10-yr. Supp., page 112:

"When the whole sum advanced is put in hazard—as where one advances money under a contract that may be satisfied by delivery of property of uncertain or speculative value or the payment of an increased amount by a specified date—the amount to be repaid may be considered a price set for the surrender of an investment, rather than a usurious loan."

The principles pointed out in Jameson v. Warren, 91 Cal.App. 590, 267 P. 372; Lamb v. Herndon, 97 Cal.App. 193, 275 P. 503; Miley Petroleum Corporation v. Amerada Pet. Corp., 18 Cal.App.2d 182, 63 P.2d 1210; Westman v. Dye, 214 Cal. 28, 4 P.2d 134, and Van Noy v. Goldberg, 98 Cal.App. 604, 277 P. 538, are applicable and controlling here insofar as this respondent is concerned.

The claims and rights of the respondent Joe Alioto rest upon his agreement for taking charge of this boat and upon its confirmation through the written notice of June 27, 1940, and the acceptance thereof signed by the appellant. It was thereby agreed that he was to be given a one-fifth interest in the boat when and if certain liabilities were paid. A list of these liabilities against the boat and which were to be "paid off" was furnished. This list totaled $80,512.26 and included a balance of $27,706.24 on the bank's mortgage and an item "due W. V. Ambrose Estate on note $17,000."

Joe Alioto acted as master of the boat for something over two years, during which time the debts against the boat were largely reduced but not entirely paid off. The appellant then discharged Joe Alioto and put another master in charge of the boat. The trial court found that Joe Alioto was wrongfully discharged by her and this finding is not questioned.

This action was filed after the bank's mortgage had been paid in full. At the trial, following an opening statement by counsel for the plaintiffs, the defendant moved for judgment, as to this part of the action, on the pleadings and on that statement, which was denied. This motion was apparently based on the contention that all of the debts against the boat had not been paid. During the trial evidence was admitted showing that after the action was filed the boat in question had made two trips and that the profits therefrom had been sufficient to pay all outstanding debts against the boat (disregarding the alleged debt of $17,000 to Mrs. Ambrose), and to leave a surplus of a little over $6000.

The appellant contends that Joe Alioto was not entitled to specific performance since the contemplated debts were not fully paid at the time the action was brought, and that the bringing of this part of the action was premature. It is contended that the $17,000 originally advanced by Ambrose is a debt which has not yet been paid since she must pay that amount and more before she can clear her title to the boat, and that other debts of about $9000, although subsequently paid, had not been paid at the time the action was brought.

[3] With respect to the $17,000 item, Mrs. Ambrose was entitled to a conveyance of an interest in the boat, and was then under obligation to cancel the note and second mortgage which had been given. That amount then represented an interest in the ownership of the boat and not a debt against the boat. Any possible obligation in this respect, as a debt against the boat, had then been discharged. The appellant could not alter the legal situation then existing by refusing to convey. This particular "debt" had been sufficiently paid and discharged within the meaning and effect of the second agreement in which Joe Alioto was interested.

[4,5] There remains for consideration the other debts against the boat in the approximate amount of $9000, which were subsequently paid through the operation of the boat pending the trial, but which had not been paid when the action was filed. Joe Alioto's performance of this part of the agreement was prevented by his wrongful discharge by the appellant. An incomplete performance is not necessarily a defense to an action for specific performance. This is true where there has been a substantial performance and a full performance is prevented by the action of the other party. Lucy v. Davis, 163 Cal. 611, 126 P. 490. This principle is peculiarly applicable here since the operation of the boat pending the trial demonstrates that all these debts would have been paid by the profits from the boat and that Joe Alioto would have been entitled to a one-fifth interest in the boat had he not been wrongfully discharged by the appellant. A supplemental and amended complaint was filed with the permission of the court to cover the subsequent happenings and to conform to the proof. The action was one in equity, there had been not only a very substantial performance but a full performance had been prevented by the action of the appellant, and it was within the equitable powers of the court to dispose of the entire matter in this one action without compelling the parties to bring and defend another action which would necessarily lead to the same result.

Moreover, the exact conveyance that should be made to Mrs. Ambrose could not be determined without considering the rights of Joe Alioto. For this reason, as well as those above indicated, it cannot be held that this part of the action was premature.

[6] The appellant further contends that Joe Alioto's contract was not specifically enforceable since it was not mutual in that he could not have been compelled to render personal services as master of this boat. It may be conceded that this contract could not have been specifically enforced in the beginning, but when it was fully performed it would be specifically enforceable. Civ.Code, Sec. 3386. His further performance having been prevented by the appellant, this principle is applicable and it must be considered to have been sufficiently performed, within the meaning of section 3386, to enable him to maintain this action and to enable a court of equity to grant the relief which was appropriate under the circumstances.

The judgment appealed from contained a paragraph reading as follows: "Now, therefore, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the defendant, Mary Alioto, and all persons under her control, at her direction or on her behalf be, and said defendant and all such persons are hereby, enjoined and restrained from delivering to Sun Harbor Packing Company or to anyone other than Westgate Sea Products Co., any fish caught on any fishing voyage made by the vessel 'Dependable.'"

[7] There is nothing to support that part of the judgment, since the period had expired during which it was agreed that all fish caught from this boat should be delivered to Westgate. Moreover, the complaint asked for such an injunction only with respect to "the present voyage" of this boat. That voyage was completed before the trial. There was neither pleading nor proof justifying a continuing injunction, under the new ownership of the boat, much less one covering all future time.

The respondents argue that the appellant has no right to raise such a point for the first time on petition for rehearing. Assuming that this is true, where such an obvious error comes to the attention of the court, it may be corrected on the court's own motion.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the paragraph above quoted, and as so modified the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; A. K. Wylie, Judge.

Action by Lillian M. Locke against the Red River Lumber Company and Bennett's, Inc., for injuries sustained when plaintiff stepped into an open crack in the concrete floor of a store operated by defendant Bennett's, Inc., as lessee of the premises. From a judgment for plaintiff, Bennett's, Inc., appeals.

THOMPSON, Justice.

The defendant Bennett's, Inc., a corporation, has appealed from a judgment which was rendered against it in a suit for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff as a result of stepping into an open crack in the concrete floor of a store at Westwood, California, operated by the appellant as lessee of the premises. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury. Findings were adopted favorable to the plaintiff to the effect that the appellant was guilty of negligence in knowingly permitting the dangerous crack to remain in the floor for a period of more than two years, and that plaintiff was free from contributory negligence. A judgment for the sum of $3,045 was accordingly rendered in favor of the plaintiff. It is not contended that the judgment is excessive.

The appellant contends that the plaintiff, as a customer in the store, was a mere licensee toward whom it was merely liable for wilful and wanton neglect, and that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to observe the hole which was plainly visible to one who exercised ordinary care. In other words, it is asserted the proprietor is not liable for injuries sustained to a customer on account of obvious defects in the store.

The defendant Red River Lumber Company owned a store building at Westwood, which was leased October 15, 1935, to the appellant, Bennett's, Inc., a corporation, and operated as a mercantile establishment. The store contained various departments on the ground floor. In the men's furnishing department of that portion of the store where the accident occurred, goods were displayed on tables adjacent to a main aisle leading to the front entrance. The aisle was about eight feet in width. The floor was constructed of concrete which was marked in squares and painted a gray color, although the concrete was mixed with pigment of a pink color. For more than two years prior to the accident a crack was permitted to exist in the concrete floor, along the middle of that aisle. During that period of time the crack increased in size until it became three or four feet in length, four inches wide at the center of the defect, and three-fourths of an inch in depth. Along one side of the crack the wall of the depression was nearly perpendicular. On the other side the concrete was broken and crumbled and receded gradually. The janitor who was employed by the appellant testified that the hole "got quite good-sized" and that he had "spoken" to his boss, Mr. Piedmont, about it several times.

The plaintiff, a woman sixty years of age, was required to use glasses only for the purpose of reading. She had occasionally traded at that store for about two months before the accident occurred. She had no previous knowledge of the existence of that hole in the surface of the concrete floor. She had never observed it until after the accident occurred. In the forenoon of November 6, 1939, she went to the store to make several purchases. She bought some meat and selected a dress which she left for alterations with Mrs. Phyllis Taylor, an employee of the appellant in the ladies' ready-to-wear department, with a promise of delivery of the dress about four o'clock that afternoon, but it was not then completed. She filled an engagement at the beauty parlor in that store, and ate her lunch at the fountain counter. At six o'clock at night, when the whistle blew as a warning for customers to depart, in company with her friend, Mrs. Taylor, she hastened along the main aisle toward the front entrance on her way out of the building. While doing so she stepped into the hole in the surface of the concrete floor, at a point near the cash register, and was thrown violently to the floor. As a result of the fall, she sustained serious injuries to her knee, her hip and the lower extremity of her spine. She suffered intense pain, and was confined to a hospital for several months. The amount of the judgment which was rendered is not challenged as excessive.

After the accident occurred the plaintiff was placed in a chair about eight feet from the point where she fell. She testified at the trial that she could plainly see the hole in the concrete floor from the point where she sat, but that she had never seen it before the accident and did not previously know that it existed, although she had formerly traversed the various aisles in the store on several occasions.

At the time of the accident the lights were burning. The plaintiff was a healthy, vigorous woman and her eyesight was good. She then wore shoes with moderate height Cuban heels.

The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury. Findings against the appellant were adopted to the effect that plaintiff, as an invitee in the appellant's store, was injured as alleged in her complaint on account of its negligence in knowingly permitting a defective and dangerous crack to remain in the concrete floor of the aisle for a period of more than two years without repairing it and without notifying plaintiff of that danger; that the floor in the aisle in question was not in a reasonably safe condition, but on the contrary was defective and dangerous to customers, and that the plaintiff, as an invitee and customer of the appellant, "while walking along said aisle suddenly, without fault on her part, without warning, or knowledge, previous or present, of the existence of said crack," stepped into the hole and fell to the floor seriously injuring herself as previously related. Judgment was accordingly rendered in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $3,045, together with her costs. From that judgment this appeal was perfected.

The appellant's contention that the plaintiff was a mere licensee to ward whom it was merely liable for wilful and wanton neglect is without substantial merit. The plaintiff went to the store for the purpose of purchasing goods from that mercantile establishment. She remained in the store until the closing time at six o'clock in the evening for the purpose of procuring the dress after it had been altered. While hastening down the main aisle to the entrance door, she unwittingly stepped into the hole she did not know existed and was injured.

[1,2] Under such circumstances plaintiff was clearly an invitee toward whom the merchant was bound to exercise ordinary care to keep the aisles in reasonably safe condition and to warn her of existing dangers. Hodge v. Weinstock-Lubin & Co., 109 Cal.App. 393, 293 P. 80; Brinkworth v. Sam Seelig Co., 51 Cal.App. 668, 197 P. 427; Thompson v. B. F. Goodrich Co., 48 Cal.App.2d 723, 120 P.2d 693; Sanders v. City of Long Beach, 54 Cal. App.2d 651, 129 P.2d 511; Buckingham v. San Joaquin Cotton Oil Co., 128 Cal. App. 94, 98, 16 P.2d 807; 19 Cal.Jur. 621, sec. 55. The relationship of an invitee as distinguished from a mere licensee has been held to exist when it appears that the injured person enters the building or premises of another for a purpose which is of mutual interest to himself and the owner or occupant of the property. Aguilar v. Riverdale Cooperative Creamery Assoc., 104 Cal.App. 263, 266, 285 P. 889; Young v. Bates Valve Bag Corp., 52 Cal. App.2d 86, 92, 125 P.2d 840. Clearly the mission of the plaintiff in this action in visiting the mercantile establishment of the appellant at the time of the accident was that of a customer with the purpose of purchasing goods, which rendered her an invitee and not a mere licensee.

[3] The chief contention of the appellant is that the plaintiff may not recover damages for injuries received as a result of stepping into the hole in the surface of the concrete floor of the aisle because the defect was plainly visible and that she was therefore guilty of contributory negligence in failing to exercise reasonable care. It is asserted that the finding of the court that plaintiff was injured, "without fault on her part," is not supported by the evidence. We are of the opinion this court is bound, under the circumstances of this case, by the finding of the trial court in that respect.

[4] In several California decisions it has been held, under circumstances somewhat similar to those of the present case, that a failure to observe an object or defect, which might have been seen by close scrutiny, does not necessarily constitute contributory negligence on the part of one who, without previous knowledge of its existence, is injured thereby. Those authorities hold that the question of contributory negligence should be determined from all of the facts and conditions surrounding the accident complained of; that the issue of contributory negligence is usually one of fact to be determined by the jury or the trial judge, with which solution a reviewing court may not interfere unless it appears as a matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of a lack of ordinary care. Neel v. Mannings, Inc., 19 Cal.2d 647, 655, 122 P.2d 576; Hodge v. Weinstock, Lubin & Co., supra; Walsh v. Maurice Mercantile Co., 20 Cal.App.2d 45, 66 P.2d 181; Brinkworth v. Sam Seelig Co., supra; Thompson v. B. F. Goodrich Co., supra; Sanders v. City of Long Beach, supra; 19 Cal.Jur. 735, sec. 141. In the Sanders case the court appropriately said [54 Cal.App.2d 651, 129 P.2d 515]: "In each of those cases it was held that the question of contributory negligence was for the jury where the plaintiff invitee tripped and fell over an unexpected but plainly visible obstruction on the floor of fully lighted premises to which the invitation extended, but which obstruction the plaintiff had failed to see."

The principle expressed in the foregoing language is applicable to the present case.

[5] The cited authorities further hold in that regard that if the facts and circumstances of the particular case are of such a nature that reasonable minds might differ with respect to the question of the exercise of due care on the part of the plaintiff the conclusion of the jury or the trial court in that regard will not be disturbed on appeal. In 38 American Jurisprudence, at page 870, § 191, it is said that while one is ordinarily required, in the exercise of reasonable prudence, to use his senses of sight and hearing with due diligence, the mere failure to observe a visible defect which causes injuries does not necessarily constitute contributory negligence. The failure to see an obvious defect may be otherwise reasonably accounted for by the circumstances of the case. The text last cited declares that "It is not contributory negligence to fail to look out for danger where there is no reason to apprehend danger."

In the Neel case, supra, an order of the trial court rendering judgment for the defendant, notwithstanding the verdict for damages in favor of the plaintiff, as a result of striking her head against a board negligently fastened across the top of a stairway, was reversed by the Supreme Court. In that case, unlike the present one, the plaintiff had previous knowledge of the dangerous condition of the stairway by reason of the existence of that board. The court said she was "familiar with the existing condition [19 Cal.2d 647, 122 P.2d 581]." With respect to the principle previously announced regarding the province of a jury or the trial court to ordinarily determine the question of the existence of contributory negligence, even when a dangerous object is visible, the Supreme Court said in that case:

"Even though the evidence did establish that the alleged defect in the construction of defendant's premises was patent and observable to any one using the stairway, and that in addition plaintiff by reason of her past visits to the restaurant was familiar with the existing condition, there would still be the question for the determination of the jury as to whether or not it was a want of ordinary care on the part of plaintiff not to have kept in mind such element of danger. * * *

"Where different conclusions may be reasonably drawn by different minds from the same evidence, the decision must be left to the jury."

We may not hold as a matter of law that the plaintiff in this case was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to see the hole in the concrete floor of the aisle. We cannot say she did not use that degree of care which should have been exercised by a reasonably prudent person under such circumstances. That being true, we may not interfere with the finding of the court in that regard. The plaintiff had no previous knowledge of the defect in the floor. She had no reason to anticipate that the main aisle to the front entrance in that general mercantile establishment would be in a dangerous condition for customers to use. She had a right to assume the proprietor of the store would provide his invited customers with safe aisles in which to walk. The circumstances in that regard are similar to those in the Hodge case, supra, and other previously cited authorities in which the courts held that the plaintiffs were not guilty of contributory negligence for failure to see obvious defects. The plaintiff in this case testified that she did not know of the defect in the floor; that, in response to the whistle warning customers of the closing of the store, she was hastening down the aisle toward the front entrance for the purpose of departing; that the lights were on, "the store was full of customers," and tables were placed on either side of the aisle upon which goods were displayed. Under such circumstances we are bound by the finding of the trial court that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. New trial ⇨23

In suit to recover money paid upon oral contract to purchase dairy ranch because of vendor's alleged fraud and misrepresentations, where vendor was willing to fulfill his portion of contract and issues of fraud were determined against plaintiffs, but judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs, trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting a new trial.

2. Appeal and error ⇨979(2)

New trial ⇨6

Trial court is invested with broad discretion to grant or deny motion for new trial, and when evidence is conflicting order may not be disturbed on appeal where there is substantial evidence which would support judgment in favor of moving party.

3. Frauds, statute of ⇨132

Vendee of realty under oral contract within statute of frauds may not recover partial payment of purchase price paid pursuant to agreement, in absence of fraud, while vendor is ready, able and willing to perform.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨21

Where vendor and purchasers of dairy ranch orally agreed upon terms of sale and purchasers made a deposit, but thereafter when written agreement of sale was submitted purchasers refused to accept it on ground of fraud, and brought suit to Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Donald Geary, Judge.

Action by Harvey J. Thompson and another against Carl Schurman to recover $1000 paid upon an oral contract to purchase a dairy ranch on ground that the contract was void because of fraud and misrepresentations. From an order granting a new trial because of lack of evidence to support judgment for the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs appeal.

Order affirmed.

Douglas A. Nye, of San Francisco, for appellants.

L. R. Lambert, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice.

The plaintiffs have appealed from an order granting a new trial in a suit to recover $1,000 paid upon an oral contract to purchase a dairy ranch, together with live stock and equipment. The action was commenced without a tender of further performance on the part of plaintiffs on the theory that the contract was void on account of alleged fraud and misrepresentations of the grantor. The statute of frauds was not pleaded. The court adopted findings adverse to the plaintiffs on the issue of fraud. A new trial was granted for lack of evidence to support the judgment. It is contended the court abused its discretion in granting the new trial.

The defendant owned a 260 acre dairy ranch near Santa Rosa in Sonoma County, together with 70 milk cows, 40 calves, farming machinery and equipment. In July, 1941, the plaintiffs, after a personal inspection of the property, orally agreed to purchase it for the sum of $52,000 to be paid in specified installments. The contract was subsequently orally modified by mutual consent. All of the terms and conditions of the sale of properties were stipulated. August 6, 1941, pursuant to that contract, the plaintiffs paid defendant $1,000 "to apply on conditional contract of sale of ranch", for which payment the defendant signed his receipt. The contract provided for the further payments of $9,000 on September 1, 1941, and $750 every three months thereafter, at 6% interest per annum, until $42,000 had been paid on the purchase price, at which time the defendant agreed to execute and deliver a good and sufficient deed of conveyance and bill of sale, free and clear of encumbrance, upon delivery of a first deed of trust on the real property to secure the balance of $22,000, with 6% interest per annum, also payable in installments of $750 every three months until the balance of the purchase price was fully paid. On September 1, 1941, the defendant executed and delivered to plaintiffs a written agreement of sale drawn in accordance with the previous terms and conditions orally stipulated. The plaintiffs refused to accept or execute the written agreement claiming that they had been defrauded by defendant's alleged misrepresentations to the effect that the dairy buildings were not constructed in accordance with sanitary dairy rules and regulations and that some of the milk cows were diseased. Plaintiffs thereupon repudiated their contract and demanded repayment of their deposit of $1,000, which was refused. This suit was commenced August 29, 1942. No tender of further performance of the contract was made by the plaintiffs. The asserted invalidity of the oral contract on account of the statute of frauds was not pleaded.

The amended complaint is couched in two counts. The first cause alleges that plaintiffs paid the defendant the sum of $1,000 on the purchase price of the property, relying upon false representations which were made by the defendant to the effect that the "milking barn and buildings" were constructed in accordance with the California statutes regulating dairy industries, and that the milk cows were free from disease, while, upon the contrary, the "barn used for containing cars and barn used for feeding and containing cattle were attached to and contiguous with barn used for milking cows, and that said dairy herd was diseased." The second cause in assumpsit merely alleges the payment of said sum of $1,000 with a promise on the part of defendant to repay it on demand; that demand for repayment of the money was duly made and refused. The prayer of the amended complaint merely demands judgment for the sum of $1,000, together with interest and costs of suit.

Neither count of the complaint alleges a tender on the part of plaintiffs to perform the terms and conditions of the contract. Nor is the statute of frauds specifically pleaded.

The material allegations of the amended complaint were denied by the answer which the defendant filed. He affirmatively alleged the terms and conditions of the oral contract under which said sum of $1,000 was paid on the purchase price of the dairy ranch and personal property; that he had fully complied with all the terms of that contract, and that he was "ready and willing to complete said deal in accordance with the terms and conditions agreed upon by plaintiffs and the defendant."

The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury. Findings were adopted adverse to the plaintiffs on their alleged charges of fraud and misrepresentations. Judgment for money had and received by the defendant in the sum of $1,000, together with interest and costs, was rendered on the second count in favor of the plaintiffs. On motion of the defendant a new trial was granted on insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and decision. In that order the court said: "At this time [when the sum of $1000 was paid] the parties had entered into an oral contract for the sale and purchase of defendant's dairy farm and herd; their directions to Lambert [the attorney] as to the terms and conditions were definite and certain, there was a complete meeting of their minds and—as stated—plaintiffs had paid $1000 to bind the bargain thus made. Thereafter the vendor, defendant herein, executed the formal contract as thus agreed upon."

The order granting the new trial concludes by saying that "since defendant was at all times ready and willing to fulfill his portion of the contract, plaintiffs cannot recover the money paid thereon. * * * For the reasons stated defendant's motion for new trial must be and the same is hereby granted."

[1] The record adequately supports the conclusions of the trial court. Having determined the issues of alleged fraud against the plaintiffs, and it satisfactorily appearing that the $1000 was paid to defendant on the purchase price of the dairy ranch and personal property in accordance with the terms and conditions of the oral contract of purchase, which the defendant was ready and willing to fulfill, we are unable to perceive how the court could have decided the motion for new trial otherwise, since plaintiffs were in default and failed to tender fulfillment of their contract. Even though it be conceded there is a conflict of evidence regarding the terms and conditions upon which the properties were agreed to be purchased, there is substantial evidence which would support a judgment in favor of the defendant. The court therefore did not abuse its discretion in granting the motion for new trial.

[2] The authorities are uniform to the effect that a trial court is invested with a broad discretion to grant or deny a motion for new trial, and that when the evidence is conflicting the order may not be disturbed on appeal where there is substantial evidence which would support a judgment in favor of the moving party. Tweedale v. Barnett, 172 Cal. 271, 156 P. 483; Charles Lomori & Son v. Globe Laboratories, 35 Cal.App.2d 248, 95 P.2d 173; 20 Cal.Jur. 31, sec. 13. In the Tweedale case it is said [172 Cal. 271, 156 P. 485]: "It is a rule so well understood that discussion of it seems almost superfluous, that the discretion of the court granting such a motion [for a new trial] is very broad, and the order will be upheld by the court to which an appeal is taken if it may be supported upon any of the assigned grounds. (Citing authorities) We may not disturb such an order where there was at the trial a conflict of evidence upon material issues, unless we can say that a verdict in favor of the moving party would not have found sufficient legal support in such evidence. Empire Inv. Co. v. Mort, 169 Cal. 732, 147 P. 960."

We may assume that if the defendant had procured plaintiffs to pay $1,000 on the purchase price of the dairy ranch and personal property by means of fraud and misrepresentations, the transaction would be voidable and plaintiffs would be entitled to disaffirm the contract and recover judgment for that amount, on the theory that the law implies a promise to repay the money thus obtained. Fitzhugh v. University Realty Co., 46 Cal.App. 198, 188 P. 1023; McCall v. Superior Court, 1 Cal. 2d 527, 36 P.2d 642, 95 A.L.R. 1019; 12 Cal.Jur. 785, sec. 51; 24 Am.Jur. 25, sec. 202. But in the present case the court adopted findings against the plaintiffs on the issues of fraud. The record contains evidence to support those findings. For the purpose of determining whether the court abused its discretion in granting a new trial, we may not hold as a matter of law that the defendant was guilty of the alleged fraud and misrepresentations.

[3] According to the great weight of authorities, including those found in the California jurisdiction, the vendee of real property under an oral contract which is within the statute of frauds may not recover partial payment of the purchase price which he has paid pursuant to the agreement, in the absence of fraud, while the vendor is ready, able and willing to fulfill the terms and conditions of the contract. Laffey v. Kaufman, 134 Cal. 391, 66 P. 471, 86 Am.St.Rep. 283; Walbridge v. Richards, 212 Cal. 408, 413, 298 P. 971; Kroger v. Baur, 46 Cal.App.2d 801, 117 P.2d 50; 12 Cal.Jur. 922, sec. 92; 2 Williston on Contracts, Rev.Ed., 1562, sec. 538; 2 Restatement of the Law of Contracts, 618, sec. 355[e]; 132 A.L.R. 1489, note; 27 Cal. Law Rev. 475. In the authority last cited it is said: "The more reasonable view seems to be that the unenforceable oral contract is a good defense to an action for the value of the services until the contract is broken. * * * Although the California Statute of Frauds [Sec. 1624, subdivision 4, Civil Code, and Sec. 1973, subdivision 4, Code of Civil Proc.] declares such an oral contract 'invalid,' it is not void, but only voidable, and is 'effective as to all the purposes for which it has been made * * * until its enforcement is voided upon the ground that it is not in writing.'" Producers' Fruit Co. v. Goddard, 75 Cal. App. 737, 755, 243 P. 686; Long v. Rumsey, 12 Cal.2d 334, 344, 84 P.2d 146; 12 Cal.Jur. 921, sec. 91. (Italics added.)

It is further said at page 475: "Where the vendee [of land] has paid part of the purchase price, the great weight of authority is that as long as the vendor is able and willing to perform, the oral contract is a good defense to an action by the vendee to recover the money paid; whether or not the vendee is in possession."

The text of 2 Williston on Contracts, supra, at page 1562, reads: "Where money has been paid by the plaintiff as the whole or part of the price under an oral contract to buy land and he then fails or refuses to perform further, recovery of the money paid is almost universally disallowed if the seller is ready and willing to convey as he orally agreed."

To the same effect it is said in 2 Restatement of the Law of Contracts, Section 355[e], at page 618: "Contracts within the Statute of Frauds are neither illegal nor void, even though the requirements for direct enforcement are not complied with. A party who is not in default and who is willing to perform is not in any sense a wrongdoer; no legal remedy is available against him, except to the extent that is indicated in section 357."

The California cases last above cited support that doctrine.

The cases of Jackson v. Ratterree Land Co., Inc., 123 Cal.App. 165, 11 P.2d 8, Ellis v. Clear Lake Beach Co., 124 Cal.App. 175, 12 P.2d 26, and Carter v. Fox, 11 Cal.App. 67, 103 P. 910, upon which the appellant relies, are not in conflict with the principle heretofore announced. In the Jackson case the court said [123 Cal.App. 165, 11 P.2d 9]: "The failure or refusal of the vendor to perform his part of the contract entitles the purchaser, if not in default, to treat the contract as at an end and to recover any money which he has paid thereon."

In that case the vendor breached his contract. He was not able and willing to convey the land according to his agreement. He failed to grade adjacent streets or install sidewalks as he promised to do. In that rescission suit the court determined that the grantor, having defaulted in the covenants of his agreement to sell the land, could not retain the purchase price since the consideration failed.

In the Ellis case the plaintiffs were employed by the owner of land in Lake County to sell subdivided lots therefrom in consideration of commissions consisting of "all sums collected by them as first payments upon sales of the lots." [124 Cal.App. 175, 12 P.2d 27] Plaintiffs sold certain lots and took notes from the purchasers thereof which they credited on their earned commissions. The defendant who owned the land, however, "without the consent or concurrence of plaintiffs, carried on separate negotiations with the makers of the notes," as a result of which, as the trial court found, "The defendants retained the sum of $856 for which the consideration had failed." The District Court of Appeal therefore affirmed the judgment for said sum of money which was rendered in favor of plaintiffs. In other words, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover commissions pursuant to the terms of their contract because the defendant retained those payments in violation of its contract.

In the Carter case, similar to the two cases last mentioned, judgment for recovery of a portion of the purchase price of land was affirmed in favor of the vendee on the following ground [11 Cal.App. 67, 103 P. 911]: "Defendant having failed and refused to convey the property within the time specified and in accordance with his covenant, and as to which covenant time was expressly made the chief factor of importance, and plaintiff not being in default, the latter had a legal right to disaffirm and insist upon the repayment of the money."

It thus appears that the vendor in the Carter case was in default and unwilling to convey the property according to the terms of his agreement, and for that reason the vendee was entitled to recover the purchase money which he had paid pursuant to the contract.

In the present case the vendor was at all times ready and willing to convey the property in strict accordance with the terms of his agreement. He was not guilty of failure to perform any covenant of the agreement. The preceding cases relied upon by the appellant therefore have no application to the facts of this case.

[4] Finally, the appellant asserts that the court erred in granting the new trial because the contract to purchase the property would not become effective until the terms and conditions were subsequently reduced to writing and signed by the parties. It is true that a written contract was subsequently prepared and executed by the vendor in accordance with the terms and conditions orally agreed to by the parties on August 5th, which the purchaser refused to accept or sign on account of the alleged fraud. In support of the foregoing contention the appellants rely on the cases of Stoddard v. Goldenberg, 48 Cal.App.2d 319, 119 P.2d 800, and Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset Road Oil Co., 176 Cal. 461, 168 P. 1037. Those cases, however, may be readily distinguished from this case.

[5, 6] The rule is well established and uniformly followed that when the respective parties orally agree upon all the terms and conditions of a contract with the mutual intention that it shall thereupon become binding, the mere fact that a formal written agreement to the same effect is to be thereafter prepared and signed does not alter the binding validity of the original contract. Nolte v. Southern Cal. Home Bldg. Co., 28 Cal.App.2d 532, 82 P.2d 946; Fly v. Cline, 49 Cal.App. 414, 426, 193 P. 615; 17 C.J.S., Contracts, p. 390, § 49; 122 A.L.R. 1217, note; 6 Cal.Jur. 226, sec. 149. The question as to whether an oral agreement, including all the essential terms and conditions thereof, which according to the mutual understanding of the parties is to be subsequently reduced to writing, shall take effect forthwith as a completed contract depends on the intention of the parties, to be determined by the surrounding facts and circumstances of a particular case. 17 C.J.S., Contracts, p. 391, § 49; 122 A.L.R. 1233, note. In the present case there is substantial evidence to support the determination of the trial judge that the terms and conditions of the oral contract agreed upon by the respective parties on August 5th, "were definite and certain; there was a complete meeting of their minds." In support of that conclusion the appellant thereafter paid respondent the sum of $1,000 "to apply on conditional contract of sale of ranch," for which the vendor gave his written receipt, and the purchaser immediately took possession of the property.

Certainly, for the purpose of determining whether the court abused its discretion in granting a new trial we may not say as a matter of law that the oral agreement is not binding upon the parties in this suit to recover a voluntary payment of a portion of the purchase price, merely because it was agreed that a formal written contract, including the same terms and conditions, would be subsequently prepared and executed.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

Where husband made valid gift of life policy to wife prior to securing divorce from her in Arkansas, and Arkansas di-

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment awarding plaintiff $8517.06, and interest, and defendant $665.77, and interest, out of money due from The Travelers Insurance Company in the principal sum of $10,000 on the life of Stephen B. Cooke, deceased, and authorizing the company to retain the amount borrowed from it on the policy. The action also involved another policy issued by the Atlas Life Insurance Company, but no question is raised by counsel on the disposition of the proceeds from that policy made by the judgment so we will give it no further notice.

Plaintiff has also attempted to appeal from an order denying her motion to terminate the proceedings for preparation of the record on appeal. She now admits that the order is not appealable though seeking to have it reviewed as a part of the case in chief.

Plaintiff and Stephen B. Cooke were married in Honolulu on February 18, 1926. There were three children the issue of this marriage. They came to California in October, 1927, and lived in East San Diego for a time. Stephen was an officer in the United States Navy and was killed in an airplane accident on January 4, 1941.

The couple lived together as husband and wife, with various separations caused by his service in the Navy, until some time in 1937, when they separated. In 1939, Stephen returned to his native state of Arkansas and instituted an action for divorce. Marguerite appeared and contested the action which resulted in a divorce being granted to Stephen. While the decree divided certain property of the parties no disposition was made of the policies of life insurance involved in this action.

On July 29, 1939, Stephen married Dorothea Dyer and they remained husband and wife up to the time of his death, at which time they were residing in the city of Coronado. Stephen's will was admitted to probate in San Diego County and Dorothea was appointed executrix.

The Travelers Insurance Company policy was issued on October 1, 1930, naming Marguerite K. Cooke as beneficiary. The premiums were paid, but after the separation, Stephen borrowed money from the insurance company on the security of the policy.

The policy reserved to Stephen the right to change the named beneficiary. On December 11, 1937, he exercised this right and made the policy payable to his executors, administrators and assigns. The company consented to this change on December 13, 1937.

Marguerite K. Cooke testified, and the trial court found, that shortly after the issuance of the policy, Stephen made a gift of and delivered it to her with the promise between them that Marguerite should be and remain the sole beneficiary thereof; that after such absolute gift and delivery of the policy to her, and probably in 1935, Stephen obtained possession of the policy from her upon his statement and representation that he wished to place it in a safety deposit box for safe keeping for her use and benefit. Plaintiff did not regain possession of the policy.

In this action plaintiff sought judgment for the money due under the policy and also attacked the divorce decree rendered by the Arkansas court on the ground that it had no jurisdiction because neither party was then a resident of that state. The trial court found that the Arkansas court had jurisdiction to enter the divorce decree; that plaintiff was the divorced wife of Stephen B. Cooke, and that on and after July 29, 1939, and up to the time of his death, Dorothea Dyer Cooke had been his lawful wife and was thereafter his widow. The money derived from the insurance policy was divided as already indicated. The award to defendant was based on the fact that after their marriage the premiums on the policy had been paid out of the community funds of Stephen and Dorothea Dyer Cooke.

On June 11, 1940, Stephen B. Cooke brought an action in the Superior Court of San Diego County against Marguerite K. Cooke to establish the judgment of the Arkansas court as a foreign judgment, enforceable in the courts of this state. Marguerite was personally served with summons and complaint and appeared by demurrer which was overruled. She failed to answer and her default was entered. A decree establishing the judgment of the Arkansas court as a foreign judgment of a sister state, in full force and effect, was rendered on July 19, 1940, and entered the following day. This judgment has long since become final. After the entry of this judgment, proceedings were had which resulted in changing the custody of one of the sons of Stephen and Marguerite to the father and reducing the monthly payments to be made for the support of the children. After that order was made by the Superior Court of San Diego County the Arkansas decree was modified accordingly.

The question of the jurisdiction of the Arkansas court to render the divorce decree, because of the non-residence of Stephen, was not raised in the California case brought to establish the foreign judgment, nor in any of the supplemental proceedings which resulted in a modification of that decree by both courts.

Although plaintiff has not appealed from any portion of the judgment before us for review, her counsel has spent much time and effort in attacking that portion of it which upholds the divorce decree of the Arkansas court. He urges again that the decree is void because Stephen was not then a resident of the State of Arkansas. It should be sufficient to remark that the trial court, for obvious legal reasons, found against plaintiff on this issue and that such finding is conclusive here. We find no need to further extend this opinion with a detailed consideration of that question.

[1, 2] Defendant argues that the finding to the effect that Stephen made a gift of the policy to plaintiff, and that she thereafter was the owner of it, lacks evidentiary support. Plaintiff testified to facts supporting this finding and there were bits of evidence corroborating her. The attack on the sufficiency of this evidence is directed at her credibility as a witness chiefly as disclosed by her conduct after the purported gift was consummated. Defendant points out that she made no effort to regain possession of the policy after she had delivered it to Stephen for safe keeping, even though their relations had so deteriorated that a divorce action was pending, and that plaintiff made no public claim to ownership of the policy until after Stephen's death. This is an argument on the weight to be given plaintiff's evidence which was properly addressed to the trier of fact. He considered the argument, weighed the evidence, believed plaintiff was telling the truth and found accordingly. The weight to be given evidence and the credibility of a witness are generally questions for decision in the trial court and not on appeal.

Defendant relies on the case of Herbert v. Lankershim, 9 Cal.2d 409, 71 P.2d 220, as supporting her argument of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding. A study of the two cases discloses a marked dissimilarity in the factual situations so that the Herbert case cannot be controlling here but rather the more general rule that the credibility of a witness and the weight to be given her testimony are questions to be decided in the trial court and not on appeal.

Defendant next argues that, assuming a valid gift of the policy by Stephen to plaintiff, it was restored to Stephen under the divorce decree and statutes of the State of Arkansas, which statute we quote from an able opinion of the trial judge, as follows:

"In that connection my attention has been directed to an Arkansas Statute (Crawford & Moses, Code of 1921, Section 3511) which in part provides that:

"In every final judgment for divorce from the bonds of matrimony granted to the husband, an order shall be made that each party be restored to all property not disposed of at the commencement of the action, which either party obtained from or through the other during the marriage and in consideration or by reason thereof
* * *."

"An earlier section (3508) is to the effect that:

"When a decree shall be entered, the court shall make such order touching the alimony of the wife and care of the children, if there be any, as from the circumstances of the parties and the nature of the case shall be reasonable."

[3] It is admitted by both parties that, generally speaking, a husband may make a valid gift of an insurance policy on his life to his wife, and that when the gift is consummated the wife becomes the owner of the policy.

[4] The factual situation other than that already outlined seems to be this: The policy was obtained in 1930 after the effective date of section 161a of the Civil Code, and a considerable part of the premiums were paid from the community income so the wife had a vested community interest in a portion of the policy which could not be taken from her without her consent. Union Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Broderick, 196 Cal. 497, 238 P. 1034; McEwen v. New York Life Ins. Co., 42 Cal.App. 133, 183 P. 373; Lo Presti v. Manning, 125 Cal.App. 442, 13 P.2d 1002. It should follow that plaintiff had a vested interest in that portion of the insurance purchased by community funds and that this interest was not "obtained from or through the other during the marriage and in consideration or by reason thereof" but by purchase from community funds. Thus at least, as to the portion of the policy purchased with the earnings of the husband while the couple were residing in California, if not elsewhere, the Arkansas statute could not be effective as that interest vested under the California statute and not through any gift from Stephen.

The complaint filed by Stephen in the Arkansas court contained no allegation as to property except the allegation that Stephen's sole income was his Navy pay and the allegation "that he also keeps in force a substantial amount of insurance for the protection of the defendant and said minor children". The answer filed by Marguerite merely alleged that she had no income other than that given her by Stephen and that she had no finances with which to defend the case. Thus no issue was presented by the pleadings as to the insurance involved here. The findings and judgment are silent on the question of insurance although the court did divide certain property and provide for the custody and support of the children as well as for the support of Marguerite.

In considering the effect of the Arkansas statute on the insurance policy involved here, we must bear in mind that in the instant case the trial court found that there was a valid and binding gift of the policy by Stephen to Marguerite, which finding we have concluded is supported by the evidence. This, coupled with the further fact that the Arkansas court did not award the policy or any interest in it to Stephen, compels defendant to rely on the Arkansas statute as the sole support of her claim that on the rendition of the divorce plaintiff was divested of her vested property interest in the insurance and that it was ipso facto restored to Stephen as his property.

The Arkansas statute was taken from the statutes of Kentucky (Taylor v. Taylor, 153 Ark. 206, 240 S.W. 6), and the Arkansas courts have held that the interpretation placed on it by the Kentucky courts should be followed in Arkansas. Morgan Utilities, Inc., v. Perry County, 183 Ark. 542, 37 S.W.2d 74. Thus we should examine the Kentucky statute and its interpretation by the courts of that state which are much more numerous than those of Arkansas.

Kentucky has two statutes bearing on this subject. Sec. 425, Civil Code of Practice; Section 2121, Ky.Stats. While not identical in language they have been held to be identical in meaning (Sea v. Conrad, 155 Ky. 51, 159 S.W. 622, 47 L.R.A., N.S., 1074, Ann.Cas.1915C, 318) so it will be sufficient to quote section 425 of the Civil Code of Practice of Kentucky which provides as follows:

"Every judgment for a divorce from the bond of matrimony shall contain an order restoring any property not disposed of at the commencement of the action, which either party may have obtained, directly or indirectly, from or through the other, during marriage, in consideration or by reason thereof; and any property so obtained, without valuable consideration, shall be deemed to have been obtained by reason of marriage. The proceedings to enforce this order may be by petition of either party, specifying the property which the other has failed to restore; and the court may hear and determine the same in a summary manner, after ten days' notice to the party so failing."

While the statutes of Arkansas and Kentucky are not identical, the important difference in them as affecting this case is found in the final sentence of the Kentucky statute which permits the summary restoration of property either in or independent of the divorce action. No such provision appears in the Arkansas statutes which have been cited to us.

Defendant maintains that the Arkansas statute is not only mandatory but self-executing. No Arkansas case is cited which supports this argument, but this seems to be the established law in Kentucky, with two exceptions. See, Sea v. Conrad, supra; Hanks v. Hanks, 282 Ky. 236, 138 S.W.2d 362; Schauburger v. Morel's Adm'r, 168 Ky. 368, 182 S.W. 198, Ann.Cas.1917C, 265; Eversole v. Eversole's Adm'r, 169 Ky. 234, 183 S.W. 494; Hawkins v. Northern C. & C. Co., 145 Ky. 118, 140 S.W. 48; Asher v. Asher, 252 Ky. 664, 68 S.W.2d 32; Meyer v. Meyer, 226 Ky. 278, 10 S.W.2d 844; Walden v. Walden, 250 Ky. 379, 63 S.W.2d 290.

The first exception to the foregoing rule is that when the wife has during coverture contributed anything towards the purchase of the property she is entitled to the return of her contribution. Schauburger v. Morel's Adm'r, supra; Eversole v. Eversole's Adm'r, supra.

The second exception is set forth in the case of Guthrie's Ex'r v. Guthrie, 155 Ky. 146, 159 S.W. 710, 711. This case arose over a controversy between the executor of the estate of James M. Guthrie, deceased, and Mary B. Guthrie, his divorced wife, as to which one was entitled to payment of $1000 insurance under a policy taken on the life of James M. Guthrie while he and Mary B. Guthrie were husband and wife and were residents of Kentucky. Mary B. Guthrie was named as beneficiary in the policy. After the issuance of the policy the couple moved to Illinois where Mary B. Guthrie secured a divorce from James

M. Guthrie. The parties returned to Kentucky after the divorce and became residents of that state, James dying there. The Kentucky courts awarded the money to Mary, the divorced wife, the Court of Appeals of Kentucky summarizing its reasons for its decision as follows:

"The appellants, however, insist that the divorce granted by the circuit court of Cook county, Ill., and which admittedly had jurisdiction of the parties, like a Kentucky divorce decree, of itself operates to bar the right of the divorced wife, and is one of the conditions that divest her of any interest in the policy of insurance; that is, the Illinois decree should have the same effect as a divorce granted in Kentucky. The difficulty is that appellant makes no allegation that there are, or were in force at the time of the divorce in Illinois, any laws of similar import to the Kentucky Statute and Code above referred to.

"Since the Illinois court had jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter, and the record not disclosing that it was the duty of that court under the laws of Illinois to restore any property obtained through the other during marriage, or in consideration, or by reason thereof, and in view of the further fact that James M. Guthrie never attempted to change the beneficiary named in the policy, we are constrained to hold that Mary B. Guthrie named as beneficiary is entitled to the proceeds."

The policy of insurance in the instant case was taken out while the parties were residents either of Hawaii or California. The policy was given to plaintiff while the couple was living in California and a portion of the premiums were paid out of community property while both parties were residents of California. Thus plaintiff had a vested interest in the policy, independent of any gift, of which she could not be divested either by the divorce decree or by operation of the statute under the Kentucky cases already cited as well as under established California law. It would also appear that under these circumstances she could not be divested of her community interest in the policy by a change of the beneficiary (Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Fancher, 219 Cal. 351, 26 P.2d 482) and should be entitled to at least a proportionate amount of the proceeds of the policy paid for with community funds. Modern Woodmen of America v. Gray, 113 Cal.App. 729, 299 P. 754.

[5, 6] Further, the application of the Arkansas statute to the facts of this case would have the effect of depriving plaintiff, without due process of law, of property vested in her by a prior valid gift (Fourteenth Amendment U.S.Const.; Section 13, Art. I, Cal.Const.) and would deprive her of property without her consent and without compensation. Sec. 1, Art. I, Cal.Const. It has been repeatedly and consistently held by the California courts that the legislature has no constitutional power to deprive a person of property by means of a legislative enactment. This principle is so firmly established that we need consider but few of those cases.

In George v. Ransom, 15 Cal. 322, 76 Am.Dec. 490, the court had before it a statute which provided in effect that the rents and profits of the separate property of either spouse should be deemed common property. This was held unconstitutional, the court saying: "We think the Legislature has not the Constitutional power to say that the fruits of the property of the wife shall be taken from her, and given to the husband or his creditors."

The same principle was involved in the case of Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 P. 228, 36 L.R.A. 497, 58 Am.St.Rep. 170. Prior to the amendment of section 172 of the Civil Code (Stats.1891, p. 425) a husband had the management and control of community property with absolute power of disposition, other than testamentary, as he had of his own estate. The amendment prohibited him from giving away community property or conveying it without consideration without the written consent of his wife.

After the effective date of the amendment, Claus Spreckels, voluntarily and without consideration and without the consent of his wife, gave Rudolph Spreckels corporate stock which, it was assumed, had been acquired prior to the effective date of the amendment. The court held that the amended statute could not deprive the husband of the right to give away community property acquired prior to its effective date because it would deprive the husband of a vested right in the property which the legislature could not take away by statute.

The legislature amended the first paragraph of section 164 of the Civil Code (Stats.1923, p. 746) to read as follows:

"All other property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, or both, including real property situated in this state, and personal property wherever situated, heretofore or hereafter acquired while domiciled elsewhere, which would not have been the separate property of either if acquired while domiciled in this state, is community property."

The constitutionality of the amendment was before the court in Re Estate of Thornton, 1 Cal.2d 1, 33 P.2d 1, 3, 92 A.L.R. 1343. The property had been acquired by William M. Thornton and his wife while they were residents of Montana and under the laws of that state was the separate property of the husband subject to the wife's right of dower. The couple moved to and became residents of California bringing their earnings with them. William M. Thornton died and his widow petitioned for distribution of one half of the property to her on the theory that it had been converted into community property by the provisions of the statute when it was brought into California. The Supreme Court held the provisions of the Code section unconstitutional as applied to the facts of that case, saying:

"So long as we are bound by the holding that to limit the right of one spouse by increasing the right of the other in property acquired by their united labors is the disturbance of a vested right, we entertain no doubt of the application of at least two provisions of the 14th amendment to the Constitution of the United States. If the right of a husband, a citizen of California, as to his separate property, is a vested one and may not be impaired or taken by California law, then to disturb in the same manner the same property right of a citizen of another state, who chances to transfer his domicile to this state, bringing his property with him, is clearly to abridge the privileges and immunities of the citizen. Again, to take the property of A and transfer it to B because of his citizenship and domicile, is also to take his property without due process of law. This is true regardless of the place of acquisition or the state of his residence.

"The doctrine that a change of domicile to this state, accompanied by an importation of the personality is an implied consent to a submission to requirements of this statute, cannot be sustained, for to do so would be to give effect to a restriction prohibited by the Constitution. Frost v. Railroad Comm., 197 Cal. 230, 240 P. 26;

The following cases are to the same effect: In re Estate of Perkins, 21 Cal.2d 561, 134 P.2d 231; Boyd v. Oser, 23 Cal. 2d 613, 145 P.2d 312; In re Estate of Bruggemeyer, 115 Cal.App. 525, 2 P.2d 534; Melvin v. Carl, 118 Cal.App. 249, 4 P.2d 954; Scott v. Remley, 119 Cal.App. 384, 6 P.2d 536. Thus it seems to be thoroughly settled that a legislative act of itself cannot deprive a person of vested property and that a person cannot be divested of property without due process of law.

Defendant has filed a supplemental brief in response to the constitutional questions just considered which were raised by the court during the oral argument. She argues that the division of property in a divorce action is incidental to the power to dissolve the marriage and is drawn from statutes; that where the statutes permit, separate property of the husband may be awarded the wife; that in such cases, where the separate property of one person has been awarded to the other in a divorce decree, the requirements of due process have been met. She cites many cases which support this argument.

We may assume the correctness of those decisions under the statutes of the various states where the causes of action arose but fail to understand their applicability to the case before us.

As we have pointed out there has been no judgment of any court restoring the insurance policy to Stephen B. Cooke. It was not made an issue in the pleadings in the Arkansas divorce action and was not mentioned in the decree. As we have said before, the claim of defendant to the proceeds from the policy rests on the Arkansas statute and nothing else. The policy had been given to plaintiff long before the divorce and continued to be her property. She had a vested property right in it and to disturb that property right by statute alone would be a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and section 13 of Article I of the State Constitution, as well as of section 1 of Article I of the latter. This is thoroughly established by the cases already cited.

[7] As we have decided the case on its merits and must affirm the judgment we need not lengthen the opinion by considering the question of the correctness of the order refusing to terminate the proceedings for the preparation of the record on appeal. As such an order is admittedly not appealable the attempted appeal from it must be dismissed.

The appeal from the order refusing to terminate the proceedings for the preparation of a record on appeal is dismissed.

The judgment is affirmed.

POLK v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.*
Civ. 14296.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

Aug. 1, 1944.

Hearing Granted Sept. 28, 1944.

1. Electricity ⚡19(3)

A tree surgeon, injured by contact of pruner with worn space on wires among trees, could not recover from municipality maintaining wires without showing duty to maintain power lines in insulated and reasonably safe condition, failure to perform that duty, and resulting injuries.

2. Electricity ⚡13

An electric utility is not an insurer of public's safety.

3. Electricity ⚡16(2)

Wires of an electric utility are not required to be insulated everywhere.

4. Electricity ⚡14(1)

The standard to be attained by electric utility is "ordinary and reasonable care", meaning care which a reasonably careful and prudent person having in view the dangers to be avoided and the likelihood of injury therefrom would exercise, under circumstances, to prevent injury.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Ordinary and Reasonable Care".

5. Electricity ⚡16(2)

A municipality which placed electric wires 42½ feet above ground among trees on private estate adjacent to highway could have anticipated danger to tree surgeon in trimming trees, and hence could be liable for injuries resulting from permitting insulation to wear.

6. Evidence ⚡13

It is common knowledge that ornamental trees on private estate adjacent to highway must be trimmed and have dead limbs removed from time to time.

7. Electricity ⚡19(7)

Whether municipality was negligent in permitting insulation on wires among trees adjoining highway to become worn, resulting in injury to tree surgeon, was for jury.

8. Electricity ⚡19(12)

Where tree surgeon inspected wires before starting to trim trees, and they seemed well insulated, he was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law in failing to use insulated pruner, rubber gloves, or other device to prevent shock which resulted when pruner touched uninsulated portion of wire.

9. Electricity ⚡18(2)

A tree surgeon could assume, within reasonable limits, from location and insulation of wires among trees adjoining highway, that they would be carefully inspected as often as reasonably necessary, and that worn or deteriorated portions of insulation would be promptly repaired.

10. Appeal and error ⚡996

To establish contributory negligence as against verdict of jury, evidence must enable appellate court to say that there is no substantial conflict on the facts, and that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, which points unerringly to negligence of plaintiff proximately contributing to his injury.

11. Electricity ⚡19(12)

Whether tree surgeon was guilty of contributory negligence in not observing exposed place on wire among trees adjoining highway was for jury.

* Subsequent opinion 159 P.2d 931.

12. Electricity ⇨19(13)

In action against municipality and its water and power department for injuries suffered by tree surgeon from electric shock, instructions that plaintiffs were subject to general order of California Railroad Commission dealing with overhead power line construction and maintenance was erroneous.

13. Public service commissions ⇨6

The California Railroad Commission has no jurisdiction to regulate and supervise municipally owned public utilities.

14. Trial ⇨243

An instruction that not any degree of negligence, however slight, which directly concurred in producing the injury, will prevent recovery, but if plaintiff's negligence shall contribute proximately, in any degree, to the injury, it will prevent recovery, was improper as contradictory.

15. Negligence ⇨141(8)

That portion of instruction which stated that if plaintiff's negligence shall contribute proximately, in any degree, to injury, it will prevent recovery, was improper.

16. Negligence ⇨119(3)

The defense of unavoidable accident need not be affirmatively alleged, but is put in issue by defendant's denial of plaintiff's allegations of negligence.

17. Negligence ⇨121(5)

Defendant does not have burden of proving unavoidable accident.

18. Electricity ⇨19(13)

In action for injuries resulting from electric shock, instruction that unavoidable accident was an affirmative defense, and that defendants had burden of proving it, was erroneous.

19. Trial ⇨295(1)

All instructions must be read together and considered as a whole.

20. Trial ⇨296(1)

If a single instruction omits an essential element of the cause, but is correct so far as it goes, and omitted element is correctly given in another instruction, the omission will ordinarily be cured.

21. Trial ⇨296(1)

An erroneous instruction is not cured by correct instructions, where the effect is simply to produce a clear conflict in instructions and it is impossible to know which instruction jury followed.

22. Trial ⇨296(7)

Error in instructing that defendants had burden of proving unavoidable accident was not cured by correct instruction on contributory negligence and plaintiff's burden of proving proximate cause of injury.

23. Electricity ⇨19(13)

In action by tree surgeon for injuries resulting from contact of pruner with bare place in wire among trees adjoining highway, instruction that plaintiff had right to assume that wires were insulated throughout the trees, and not bound to discover defects in insulation, stated a correct general principle, but should be modified so as to leave extent of plaintiff's reliance to jury.

24. Negligence ⇨68

The right to rely upon due care by another is not absolute, but must yield to realities, in that, if plaintiff observes a violation of duty which imperils him, he must be vigilant in attempting to avoid injury.

25. Negligence ⇨68

Assuming that another will exercise care is not consistent with due care for one's own safety, when relying upon it means ignoring a condition openly fraught with peril.

26. Electricity ⇨18(2)

A tree surgeon, who was unable to see wires at certain places in trees adjoining highway before beginning work, and had seen high-voltage sign and knew that wires were more likely to be worn where foliage was heaviest, could not blindly assume that he was safe.

27. Negligence ⇨68

One may not rely upon assumption that others will not breach duty to avoid injuring him where, under similar circumstances, an ordinarily prudent person would not do so.

28. Negligence ⇨136(26)

Whether reasonable care is used under circumstances in relying upon presumption that another will exercise care is for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action by Earl H. Polk against the City of Los Angeles and another for injuries resulting from electric shock. From a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Ray L. Chesebro, City Atty., S. B. Robinson, Chief Asst. City Atty., and Everard L. McMurrin, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Samuel A. Rosenthal and Burton B. Crane, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FOX, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the defendants, The City of Los Angeles and its Department of Water and Power, from a judgment in the sum of $20,000, entered upon the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff.

The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by respondent. The contentions of appellants may be divided into three groups: (1) That respondent failed to prove any actionable negligence on the part of the appellants; (2) that the evidence shows that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law; and (3) that the trial court committed prejudicial error in instructing the jury.

Appellants, as a part of their business of selling and distributing electricity, erected and maintained power lines along and above the northerly side of Rancho Street which is located in the San Fernando Valley section of the City of Los Angeles. The lines were immediately adjacent to a private estate and were supported by eight-foot cross-arms located near the top of wooden poles, and carried 4800 volts of electricity. The lines were about $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch in diameter, and consisted of No. 6 gauge copper wire insulated with about a quarter of an inch of rubber, about a sixteenth of an inch of fiber, and a wrapping of cloth covered with tar or black paint. They were strung at a height of approximately 42½ feet above the ground and ran through a row of six eucalyptus trees which were rooted on the private estate. Many of their branches, however, extended beyond the property line and over the highway. These trees were from sixty to seventy feet in height and stood six to ten feet apart. On March 28, 1942, the owner of the estate employed respondent to top and trim these trees. Respondent's tree-trimming equipment consisted of an extension ladder of two units, each twenty feet long, ropes, two pruning hooks that were eight feet two inches and twelve feet two inches long, respectively, and a saw. When injured, respondent was using the longer pruner. It consisted of a wooden pole, about one inch square, with a steel hook riveted to the upper end of the pole, and a steel blade that operated within this hook. A steel wire, about $\frac{1}{8}$ of an inch in diameter, extended from the blade to a steel lever about six inches in length which was fastened to the bottom of the pole. One end of a coil spring was attached to the lever, and the other end to the pole. The blade at the top of the pruning hook was opened and closed by manipulating the lever. The metal on the pruner was not insulated. At the time of the accident on March 29, 1942, respondent had already trimmed five of the trees, topped the sixth and cut out the dead limbs and thinned out the excess live branches down to a point where he was standing on the ladder between twenty-five and thirty feet from the ground. He was attempting to trim the outer edge of a branch about midway between trees No. 5 and No. 6. He held the bottom end of the pruner with his right hand, and operated the lever with his left. His right foot was on the ladder, which was leaning against tree No. 6, and his left leg was around the tree. He was leaning out from the ladder, fully extending the pruning hook from him. While in this position, respondent contacted one of the electric wires and was injured.

Respondent was an experienced tree-trimmer and tree surgeon, having been engaged in that line of work for a number of years, both in southern California and elsewhere. He had had considerable experience in trimming trees near high voltage wires. He saw a "High Voltage" sign posted on the cross-arm of a pole and knew it was a warning of danger. Respondent examined the wires running through the trees when he contracted for the work, again just before starting to trim the trees, and finally from each tree as the work progressed. The first and second inspections were made from the ground. These disclosed that the wires "were well insulated," that they were "covered wires," and he "could see no breakage" in the covering. However, respondent could not see the wires at some places where the foliage was heavy. Likewise, there was some interference from the foliage with his inspection of the wires while working in the trees, but as far as he could see the wires were well covered. Actually, however, there was a bare or worn space of approximately three feet in length about midway between trees No. 5 and No. 6.

[1] Respondent bases his right to recover upon the theory that it was the duty of appellants, in the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care, to keep and maintain their power lines through this row of eucalyptus trees in an insulated and reasonably safe condition so that they would not endanger the safety of persons employed by the owner of said trees to work upon, in or among them; that appellants negligently failed to perform that duty; and that injury to respondent resulted from the failure to perform such duty. Respondent cannot recover unless he can sustain these propositions. Minter v. San Diego Consol. Gas, etc., Co., 1919, 180 Cal. 723, 182 P. 749; Monroe v. San Joaquin L. & P. Corp., 1941, 42 Cal.App.2d 641, 647, 109 P.2d 720.

[2-6] Appellants, however, attack the very foundation of respondent's argument by insisting that they violated no duty owed respondent. It is true, as appellants point out, that an electric utility is not an insurer of the safety of the public (29 C.J.S., Electricity, § 38, p. 573; Hayden v. Paramount Productions, Inc., 1939, 33 Cal.App. 2d 287, 293, 91 P.2d 231), and that the law does not require its wires to be insulated everywhere. Anderson v. Southern Cal. Edison Co., 1926, 77 Cal.App. 328, 337, 246 P. 559. "The standard to be attained is that of ordinary and reasonable care, and this means such care as a reasonably careful and prudent person, having in view the dangers to be avoided and the likelihood of injury therefrom, would exercise, under the circumstances, in order to prevent injury." Fairbairn v. American River Electric Co., 1915, 170 Cal. 115, 118, 148 P. 788, 789; McCormick v. Great Western Power Co., 1932, 214 Cal. 658, 663, 8 P.2d 145, 81 A.L. R. 678; Irelan-Yuba, etc., Min. Co. v. Pacific G. & E. Co., 1941, 18 Cal.2d 557, 564, 116 P.2d 611. Appellants take the position that they have met this standard of care by placing their wires some 42½ feet above the ground. The soundness of this position must be tested by the proposition as to whether or not they could reasonably have anticipated the danger. Fairbairn v. American River Electric Co., supra; McCormick v. Great Western Power Co., supra; Hauser v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 1933, 133 Cal.App. 222, 226, 23 P.2d 1068; Irelan-Yuba, etc., Min. Co. v. Pacific G. & E. Co., supra; Monroe v. San Joaquin L. & P. Corp., supra. In our opinion, appellants could reasonably have anticipated the danger. Since the row of eucalyptus trees was on a private estate immediately adjacent to a public highway, it is apparent that they were being maintained for ornamental purposes as well as, perhaps, for other purposes. It is a matter of common knowledge that such trees so located must from time to time be trimmed and have the dead limbs removed. This is necessary to enhance their aesthetic appearance and to protect the traveling public from possible injury from falling branches that might be blown off such trees during a high wind. It was therefore to be anticipated that the owner of the estate would have occasion to send someone, as he did respondent, into these trees to perform for him the very service that respondent was performing when he was injured. Particularly applicable then on the question of the appellants' breach of duty is the statement of the Supreme Court in Minter v. San Diego Consol. Gas, etc., Co., supra, 180 Cal. p. 726, 182 P. 749, 750 quoted with approval in Irelan-Yuba, etc., Min. Co. v. Pacific G. & E. Co., supra, 18 Cal.2d pages 564, 565, 116 P.2d 611, that: "If, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, an ordinarily prudent person would have had reasonable ground to suspect that the wires so placed would cause injury, the plaintiff can be said to have proved a breach of duty. And if reasonable men might fairly differ as to the answer to this question, the verdict for the plaintiff should not be disturbed."

[7] This phase of the problem is further complicated from appellants' point of view by the fact that the wires had been, and appeared to respondent to be, insulated. Appellants knew that there were pretty brisk winds in that particular section in March, April and May—sufficiently strong to make these eucalyptus trees sway as much as from three to six feet at the approximate height where the electric line passed through them—and that the swaying of the trees caused the insulation to deteriorate and wear off. Appellants had this line inspected only every six months—the last time prior to respondent's injury being in the previous October. The purpose of these inspections was to insure continuous service. If the covering on a particular wire was worn or bare in one or more places it was neither repaired nor reported because the service was in no way affected thereby. However, if different wires were worn or bare at places that were opposite each other, a report thereof was made because contact between two such spots might burn down the line. Since appellants could reasonably have anticipated the presence of persons lawfully in the pursuit of their business in these trees the jury might well have concluded that appellants' practice regarding inspection and repairs of said lines constituted a breach of the duty owed respondent. Support for this proposition is found in Tackett v. Henderson Bros. Co., 1910, 12 Cal.App. 658, 663, 108 P. 151, 153, where, quoting from Bourke v. Butte Electric & Power Co., 33 Mont. 267, 83 P. 470, the court said: "The owner or operator of an electric plant is bound to exercise a reasonable degree of care in erecting pole lines, selecting appliances, insulating the wires wherever people have a right to go and are liable to come in contact with them, and in maintaining a system of inspection by which any change which has occurred in the physical conditions surrounding the plant, poles, or lines of wire, which would tend to create or increase the danger to persons lawfully in pursuit of their business or pleasure, may be reasonably discovered." To the same effect see, also, Foley v. Northern Cal. Power Co., 1910, 14 Cal. App. 401, 406, 112 P. 467, and Roberts v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 1929, 102 Cal.App. 422, 431, 283 P. 353.

[8,9] Appellants' contention that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law is not well founded. The first part of this argument is based on the proposition that respondent should have used an insulated pruner, rubber gloves, or some other protective device. The answer to this proposition is that upon respondent's inspection of the wires, when he started the work, they appeared to be "well insulated." Furthermore, respondent had the right to assume, within reasonable limits, from the location of these wires and the fact that they appeared to be insulated that they would be carefully inspected as often as reasonably necessary and that any worn or deteriorated portions of the insulation would be properly and promptly repaired. He could not be expected to know that inspection and repair of the lines was for the sole purpose of maintaining continuity of service. Under such circumstances it cannot be said that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in using the type of pruner that he used in trimming the trees.

[10,11] Appellants also argue that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in his failure to observe the bare or exposed place on the wire between trees No. 5 and No. 6. "To establish the defense of contributory negligence as against the verdict of a jury, the evidence must be such that the appellate court can say that there is no substantial conflict on the facts, and that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, which inference points unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff proximately contributing to his own injury." Crawford v. Southern Pacific Co., 1935, 3 Cal.2d 427, 45 P.2d 183, 184; Bellon v. Silver Gate Theatres, Inc., 1935, 4 Cal.2d 1, 47 P.2d 462; Cooper v. So. Pac. Co., 1941, 43 Cal.App.2d 693, 111 P.2d 689; Matteoni v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 1942, 53 Cal.App. 2d 260, 127 P.2d 574; Demmon v. Smith, 1943, 58 Cal.App.2d 425, 136 P.2d 660. Whether or not in view of the interference of the foliage and the other circumstances here disclosed the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence in not observing the bare or exposed place on this wire was clearly a question of fact for the jury. McCormick v. Great Western Power Co., 1933, 134 Cal.App. 705, 26 P.2d 322; Kerstens v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 1935, 3 Cal.App. 2d 489, 39 P.2d 469.

[12,13] Appellants contend that the court erred in giving instructions Nos. 11, 11a, and 11b. This contention is sound. These instructions advised the jury that appellants were subject to General Order No. 64-A of the California Railroad Commission, which deals with overhead power line construction and maintenance. It was error to give these instructions, because the California Railroad Commission has no jurisdiction to regulate and supervise municipally owned public utilities, and therefore General Order No. 64-A has no application to the case. The principle that such public utilities are not within the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission was first announced by our Supreme Court in City of Pasadena v. Railroad Comm., 1920, 183 Cal. 526, 192 P. 25. This principle has been adhered to in subsequent cases. See Los Angeles Gas & Elect. Corp. v. Dept. of Public Service, 1921, 52 Cal. App. 27, 197 P. 962; Jochimsen v. City of Los Angeles, 1921, 54 Cal.App. 715, 202 P. 902; Water Users', etc., Ass'n v. Railroad Comm., 1922, 188 Cal. 437, 205 P. 682.

Since appellants were not subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, it was prejudicial error to give these instructions because the jury was in effect told that any failure by appellants to maintain their electric lines in conformity with the rules embodied in General Order No. 64-A constituted negligence. This, of course, is not true, because "if the rules of the Railroad Commission were held to establish as a matter of law the measure of ordinary care, it would do away with the principle that negligence is a question for the jury to determine from the facts in the particular case." Winkie v. Turlock Irr. Dist., 1937, 24 Cal.App.2d 1, 5, 74 P.2d 302, 305; see also Langazo v. San Joaquin L. & P. Corp., 1939, 32 Cal.App.2d 678, 684, 90 P.2d 825.

[14, 15] Appellants complain that the court erred in giving instruction No. 23. That instruction reads as follows: "Applicable to the defense of contributory negligence, the rule is not that any degree of negligence, however slight, on the part of plaintiff, which directly concurs in producing the injury, will prevent his right to recover, but the rule is that if the negligence of the plaintiff amounting to the absence of ordinary care exercised by an ordinarily prudent person shall contribute proximately, in any degree, to the injury, it will prevent his right to recover." When considered by itself, this instruction is plainly contradictory. In a single sentence the rule of contributory negligence is first denied and then affirmed. Obviously, both statements cannot be correct. In fact, the negative statement as an instruction is untenable and directly conflicts with the declared law of this state. 19 Cal.Jur., sec. 74, p. 644.

[16-18] The court also erred in instructing the jury on the question of unavoidable accident. In instruction No. 24 the jury was told that: "This is an affirmative defense and the burden of proving it rests entirely upon the defendants, who allege the same." This defense does not need to be affirmatively alleged. It is put in issue by the defendants' denial of plaintiff's allegations of negligence. "The law," says the court in Sitkei v. Ralphs Grocery Co., 1938, 25 Cal.App.2d 294, at page 297, 77 P. 2d 311, at page 313, "is settled that under a general denial by defendant of a general allegation of negligence defendant may rely upon the defense of unavoidable accident and does not waive such defense by failing to specifically plead it * * *." That the burden of proving unavoidable accident does not rest upon the defendant is logically demonstrated in Jolley v. Clemens, 1938, 28 Cal.App.2d 55, 82 P.2d 51. At page 72 of 28 Cal.App.2d, at page 61 of 82 P.2d, the court said: "The dominating consideration in dealing with the whole subject of inevitable accident, as we see the matter, is the elementary requirement that before a plaintiff can recover he must make out his case by the preponderance of all the evidence before the court or jury regardless of the stage of the case at which it may have appeared or the particular party who introduced it. To do this in a negligence case he must show that the defendant was negligent and the negligence was the proximate cause of the injury complained of. But if the accident was inevitable or unavoidable that is the same thing as to say that the defendant was not negligent, or that his negligence, if any, did not cause the accident. In other words, it is to say that the plaintiff has failed in his proof." It was therefore plainly error to give the jury the above quoted portion of instruction No. 24.

[19-22] It should be pointed out, however, with respect to both instructions No. 23 and No. 24, that the jury was elsewhere in the instructions correctly advised on the question of contributory negligence and that the burden rested upon the plaintiff to prove that the negligence of the defendants was a proximate cause of his injury. The rule, of course, is that all instructions must be read together, and considered as a whole. Gaster v. Hinkley, 1927, 85 Cal.App. 55, 258 P. 988. "If a single instruction omits an essential element of the cause, but is a correct declaration of the law so far as it goes, and the omitted element is correctly given in another instruction, the omission will ordinarily be cured thereby." Soda v. Marriott, 1931, 118 Cal.App. 635, 643, 5 P.2d 675, 678; Ferguson v. Nakahara, 1941, 43 Cal.App.2d 435, 442, 110 P.2d 1091. But, "It has been frequently held that the giving of an erroneous instruction is not cured by the giving of other correct instructions, where the effect is simply to produce a clear conflict in the instructions and it is not possible to know which instruction was followed by the jury in arriving at a verdict." Akers v. Cowan, 1938, 26 Cal.App.2d 694, 699, 80 P.2d 143, 145. See, also, Rathbun v. White, 1910, 157 Cal. 248, 253, 107 P. 309; Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 1911, 161 Cal. 176, 185, 118 P. 700; Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 1921, 187 Cal. 270, 280, 201 P. 599. In our opinion it is this latter rule that should govern in this case.

[23-28] Appellants also complain about instruction No. 27. It reads, as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that plaintiff, before undertaking to perform his work of trimming the trees on the property of Norman Levin, exercised reasonable and ordinary care as a reasonable and prudent person in observing defendants' electric wire strung through the said trees, and that in so making his observations of said wires they appeared to him insulated and in a reasonably safe condition so as to permit him to trim said trees without danger of an electric shock to his person, plaintiff was entitled to assume, and act upon this assumption, that defendants' wires were insulated throughout said trees, and he was not imposed with the duty to seek out concealed and hidden defects, if any, in the insulation of said wires, and he cannot be charged with negligence in failing to do so." The principle there stated is in general correct, but "the right to rely upon the performance by another of the duty to use due care is not absolute. The assumption that another will exercise due care must yield to the realities of the situation to the extent that if the plaintiff observes a violation of duty which imperils him, he must be vigilant in attempting to avoid injury to himself. The assumption is not consistent with the exercise of due care for one's own safety, where relying upon it means ignoring a condition which is openly fraught with peril to the person. One may be guilty of contributory negligence in failing to anticipate and act upon the contingency of another's negligence." 38 Am.Jur., sec. 192, p. 873. Here, respondent had seen the "High Voltage" sign and knew that it was a warning of danger, and knew that a contact between a worn or bare place on one of the wires with the metal on his pruner would likely result in serious injury. Respondent had worked in and about these trees some seven hours on the day he was injured and had had an opportunity to observe the wires at close range from positions of vantage in each of these trees. His opportunity to observe the condition of the wires was constantly improved by the removal of dead limbs and the thinning out of those that had foliage on them. Also, he had the opportunity of seeing the wires from different angles and elevations. Respondent knew that the covering on the wires was more likely to be worn where the foliage was the heaviest and where a wire was in close contact with a limb. Furthermore, when respondent inspected the wires from the ground prior to starting the work he was unable to see them at certain places because of the interference of the foliage. Under these circumstances, he was not entitled to blindly assume that he was not exposed to any danger. 19 Cal. Jur., sec. 35, p. 597. In 45 C.J., sec. 512, p. 956, it is said that one "may not rely upon the assumption that others will not be guilty of any breach of their duty to avoid injuring him where, under the same or similar circumstances, an ordinarily prudent person would not do so * * *." "Whether reasonable care is used under the circumstances in any particular case in relying upon the presumption is a question for the jury." Dickinson v. Pac. Greyhound Lines, 1942, 55 Cal.App.2d 824, 828, 131 P. 2d 401, 403; Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., Co., 1908, 152 Cal. 604, 93 P. 677; White v. Davis, 1930, 103 Cal.App. 531, 545, 284 P. 1086. On a retrial, instruction No. 27 should either be modified or supplemented so as to present this question to the jury for its determination.

The judgment is reversed.

JAMES I. BARNES CONST. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
Civ. 14502.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California,
July 25, 1944.

1. Workmen's compensation ⇨1723, 1939

Whether serious and wilful misconduct of employer caused employee's injury is essentially a question of fact, and commission's determination will not be disturbed if it has any evidentiary support. St.1937, p. 281, § 4553.

2. Workmen's compensation ⇨1939

The findings of the Industrial Accident Commission are subject to review only so far as they are without any substantial evidence to support them.

3. Workmen's compensation ⇨1939

The jurisdiction of the appellate court in proceedings to review award of Industrial Accident Commission is limited to determining whether there is any evidence sufficient to sustain the award.

4. Workmen's compensation ⇨941

Order of the Industrial Accident Commission that scaffolds shall be provided for all work that cannot be done safely by workmen standing on permanent or solid construction means that it is the duty of an employer to supply his employees a reasonably safe place in which to work.

5. Workmen's compensation ⇨939

Under Workmen's Compensation Act authorizing an additional award on account of "serious and wilful misconduct" of employer, to authorize an additional award, there must be an intentional doing of something either with the knowledge that it is likely to result in serious injury, or with wanton and reckless disregard of its possible consequences, and to constitute "wilful misconduct" there must be actual knowledge, or that which in law is esteemed to be the equivalent of actual knowledge, of the peril to be apprehended from the failure to act, coupled with conscious failure to act to the end of averting injury. St.1937, p. 281, § 4553.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Serious and Wilful Misconduct" and "Wilful Misconduct".

6. Workmen's compensation ⇨939

Where it was undisputed that when an employee met his death he was engaged in constructing a corbel at a place where a platform or scaffold had been erected to safeguard him and other employees working there, and that helpers had been provided to procure needed material and that decedent left safe place provided for him and went to other place to procure a plank and fell, which resulted in death, employer was not liable for additional award on ground of "serious and wilful misconduct" within statute. St.1937, p. 281, § 4553.

Proceeding by James I. Barnes Construction Company to review and annul an award of additional compensation made by the Industrial Accident Commission to Mabel Rawdon on account of the death of Byron C. Rawdon on ground that death was caused by employer's serious and wilful misconduct.

Award annulled.

Macdonald, Wallace, Cashin & Arrington, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett A. Corten and R. C. McKellips, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

The petitioning employer seeks the review and annulment of an award of additional compensation which was granted on the finding that the death of the employee, Byron C. Rawdon, was caused by the employer's serious and wilful misconduct.

The employee Rawdon met his death while employed by petitioner copartnership as a carpenter in the construction of a Lighter-than-Air Base near Santa Ana, California. The award herein was made after three hearings were had, at which the witnesses used a model and several drawings in an attempt to describe the construction project and the circumstances surrounding the accident, and constantly made reference to "here", "there", "this side" and "that direction", etc., without other identification of the points referred to, with the result that the transcript has proved rather inadequate as a basis from which to make a reliable summary of the evidence. However, aided by the petition for writ of review and the return thereto, it appears that the project involved the construction of two giant hangars near Santa Ana to be used to house dirigibles for the United States Navy. Decedent was working on one of these hangars, the sides of which were to be built of concrete. At the time of the accident, decedent had completed the placement of the topmost of the wooden frames, called a soffit, in which concrete was to be poured to form the sustaining beams or up-rights supporting the semi-circular roof of the hangar which was 185 feet in height. This soffit, 36 inches high, 30 inches wide, 21 feet long and 20 feet from the ground, had been lifted into place by a crane. Seventy-two of such forms had been completed at the time in question. After the soffit was in place, petitioner constructed a scaffolding over each end hereof, and corbels (small protrusions from the finished concrete beam to support another beam extending at right angles to the main beam and connecting the various beams with one another) were then being built on each side of the soffit. Two men were assigned to each end of the soffit for the purpose of constructing these corbels. Decedent was one of the two men assigned to construct the corbels on the slope, or outside end of the beam. The corbels were constructed low on the beam, therefore, in performing a portion of the work, it was necessary for the carpenters to sit on the scaffold. Petitioner provided a laborer at each end of the soffit to procure and draw up from the ground such material as was needed by the two carpenters. The two platforms or scaffolds were connected by a two inch by eight inch plank (referred to as plank A) which was 20 feet in length and 20 feet above the ground and used to brace the "A" frames supporting the soffit.

On the date in question, decedent left the place where he was working at the west end of the beam soffit, and walked easterly on plank A to the other end of the soffit. When he started to return, he stepped off, or fell, death resulting from the injuries sustained in the fall. At the time, decedent had a 2 by 4 inch wedge, 14 or 16 inches long, in his hand.

The award of $2,500 additional compensation was made pursuant to section 4553 of the Labor Code, St.1937, p. 281, upon the ground of employer's wilful misconduct in not providing scaffolding or a railing along the entire length of plank A which connected the two platforms, in disregard of General Construction Safety Order No. 1118, i. e., "(a) Scaffolds shall be provided for all work that cannot be done safely by workmen standing on permanent or solid construction, except where such work can be safely done from ladders."

A safety engineer was employed on the project by petitioner and petitioner's insurance carrier also employed a safety engineer.

Petitioning employer urges that the evidence does not support the purported findings of fact to the effect: (1) that the injury was proximately caused by the serious and wilful misconduct of said employer; and (2) that said serious and wilful misconduct of said employer consisted in the failure to furnish scaffolding within the meaning of Order Number 1118 of the Construction Safety Orders of the Industrial Accident Commission.

In this regard petitioner argues that no dangerous condition existed at the place where the deceased employee was required to work, in that a platform or scaffold with a railing had been erected at each end of the soffit where the corbels were being constructed and helpers were provided to assist the carpenters and to furnish the material as needed by them. Therefore, when decedent left a safe place where he was required to work and went about some other business where he had no right to be, employer could not be charged with the duty of providing scaffolding at the latter place.

What constitutes serious and wilful misconduct within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act so as to entitle the employee to an increased award as therein provided has frequently been discussed by the courts of this state. In E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 184 Cal. 180, 188, 193 P. 105, 108, 16 A.L.R. 611, serious and wilful misconduct is defined as follows:

"The first question presented is, then, Was the commission justified in finding that the petitioner was guilty of 'serious misconduct'? There is no statutory definition of this term. In this connection we may again quote from Beven (Workmen's Compensation) page 401: 'To constitute "serious misconduct," it is probably that the Legislature intended to signify conduct that an average workman in being guilty of, either would know, or ought to know, if he turned his mind to consider the matter, to be conduct likely to jeopardize his own and his fellow-workman's safety.' In our opinion the serious misconduct of an employer under our statute may be similarly defined. There should be no difference in principle between the degree of care required of an employer and that exacted from an employé. 'Serious misconduct' of an employer must therefore be taken to mean conduct which the employer either knew, or ought to have known, if he had turned his mind to the matter, to be conduct likely to jeopardize the safety of his employé. * * *

"Next, as to whether such serious misconduct was 'willful.' It has frequently been said that willful misconduct involves the knowledge of the person that the thing which he is doing is wrong. (Citation of authorities). Conceding that knowledge is required, it seems to us that in order to prove the requisite knowledge, it is not necessary for the evidence to show positively that the person was notified of the unsafe condition of his premises, but that it is sufficient if it appears that the circumstances surrounding the act of commission or omission are such as 'evinced a reckless disregard for the safety of others, and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of.'" (Citation of authorities.)

[1-3] Whether serious and wilful misconduct of the employer caused the employee's injury "is essentially one of fact and the commission's determination will not be disturbed if it has any evidentiary support." Bethlehem Steel Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 23 Cal.2d 659, 665, 145 P.2d 583, 586, citing Parkhurst v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 20 Cal.2d 826, 129 P.2d 113. Moreover, the "findings of the industrial accident commission are subject to review only insofar as they have been made without any substantial evidence whatsoever in support thereof. The jurisdiction of an appellate court in cases of this character is limited strictly to determining whether there is evidence sufficient to sustain the award." Helme v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 46 Cal.App.2d 651, 661, 116 P.2d 658, 663.

"It may be conceded that, generally speaking, the mere failure of an employer to comply literally with the requirement of a safety order of the Industrial Accident Commission does not of itself justify a finding that the employer is guilty of serious and willful misconduct. In the final analysis, the circumstances presented by the evidence in any case will be determinative of the question of whether or not the employer's act may properly be characterized as 'serious and willful misconduct.'" Ethel D. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 219 Cal. 699, 704, 28 P.2d 919, 921.

[4] The safety order, heretofore mentioned, with a violation of which petitioning employer is charged, required that "Scaffolds shall be provided for all work that cannot be done safely by workmen standing on permanent or solid construction * * *." In other words, an employer "is under the duty to supply his employees a reasonably safe place in which to work." Hatheway v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 13 Cal.2d 377, 382, 90 P.2d 68, 71.

In Dawson v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 54 Cal.App.2d 594, 598, 602, 129 P.2d 479, 482, the widow and minor children of a deceased employee were granted a review of an order denying additional compensation for the death of said employee on the ground of alleged "serious and wilful misconduct, in installing and maintaining in the shaft dangerously-defective and inadequate staging and structure upon which the employees were compelled to work, and in neglecting to properly brace, block or wedge the framework in the shaft so as to render it safe and secure." In affirming the order denying the award, the court stated: "It will be observed that the misconduct on the part of the employer which will justify an increase of compensation provided for by section 4553 of the Labor Code must be both 'serious and wilful.' The term 'wilful misconduct,' as it is used in that section, involves the same sort of dereliction of duty on the part of the driver of an automobile which authorizes an individual to recover damages for personal injuries sustained while riding as a guest in the machine of another person, under section 403 of the Vehicle Code * * *. In the case of Norton v. Puter, 138 Cal.App. 253, at page 258, 32 P.2d 172, at page 174, that term is defined as follows: 'Willful misconduct depends upon the facts of a particular case and necessarily involves deliberate, intentional, or wanton conduct in doing or omitting to perform acts, with knowledge or appreciation of the fact, on the part of the culpable person, that danger is likely to result therefrom. (Citing numerous authorities.)' The preceding definition is approved by the Supreme Court in the case of Porter v. Hofman, 12 Cal.2d 445, at page 447, 85 P.2d 447.

[5] "In the case of Helme v. Great Western Milling Co., 43 Cal.App. 416, at page 421, 185 P. 510, at page 512, the court says:

" 'Willful misconduct' means something different from and more than negligence, however gross. The term "serious and willful misconduct" is described by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts as being something "much more than mere negligence, or even gross or culpable negligence," and as involving "conduct of a quasi criminal nature, the intentional doing of something either with the knowledge that it is likely to result in serious injury or with wanton and reckless disregard of its possible consequences." * * * To constitute "willful misconduct" there must be actual knowledge, or that which in law is esteemed to be the equivalent of actual knowledge, of the peril to be apprehended from the failure to act, coupled with a conscious failure to act to the end of averting injury."

While it is true that Francis Reynolds, a carpenter working with decedent, testified that he had seen men walk back and forth on the 2" x 8" plank A prior to the fall, and Fred W. Maas, assistant superintendent, testified that he knew that the workmen used this plank to walk across from east to west, or from the west to the east end of the soffit "on certain occasions", and C. E. Epps, carpenter foreman, who put decedent to work on the beam soffit, in answer to the query: "Had you seen men walking across from east to west and west to east on this 2 x 6?", testified: "Well, I think, I don't know, but I imagine most of the other fellows did"—nevertheless, the record is clear that decedent at the time he met his death was engaged in constructing a corbel at the west end of the said beam soffit; that at the place in question a platform or scaffold had been erected for the purpose of safeguarding him and the other employees working there, and in addition he had been provided with helpers to procure such material as was needed by him and to assist him in the work which he was then doing, i. e., the construction of a corbel at the west end of the beam soffit. But that said decedent left the safe place provided for him and embarked on a mission the purpose of which can only be explained by speculation.

[6] Applying the foregoing principles of law, the undisputed facts do not disclose a sufficient showing of wilful and intentional disregard of the safety of its employees as would suffice to justify the findings and conclusions of the commission that petitioner was guilty of such serious and wilful misconduct as to bring it within the penalty prescribed by section 4553 of the Labor Code which was imposed herein.

For the reasons stated, the additional award of $2,500 is annulled.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

July 19, 1944.

Hearing Granted Sept. 14, 1944.

1. Appeal and error ⇨909(4)

Where evidence taken at hearing on claim of creditor involving a compromise and settlement whereby a bequest to a stranger in preference to that to children and father of decedent was to be used in payment of claim was not brought up in the record on appeal, it must be presumed, in respect of contention that bequest of money to children and father was adeemed because it was transferred from branch bank designated in bequest to another branch of the same bank, that the testator in so transferring the account had no intention of disturbing the bequest of money to his children.

2. Wills ⇨770

Proof of an intention to abrogate bequests under a will was necessary to show an "ademption".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Ademption".

3. Wills ⇨770

Bequest of money on deposit in branch bank was not adeemed because money was in another branch of the same bank at time of testator's death in the absence of evidence that testator in transferring account from one branch bank to another intended to disturb bequest of money to his children.

A legacy is abated when it is used in whole or in part to meet a priority payment, whether of a debt, expense of administration, family allowance, or legacy, since to "abate" means to do away with or nullify or to lessen or diminish. Probate Code, §§ 750-752.

5. Wills Ⓒ807

Legacies to spouse or kindred do not abate until after legacies of same class to nonkindred have abated, whether resort to the legacies be had by reason of debts or by reason of other legacies having priority. Probate Code, §§ 750-752.

6. Wills Ⓒ812

One who makes a will leaving specific legacies to a spouse or kindred and to persons who are not related to him, ordinarily assumes that the estate will be sufficient to pay them all.

Where testator made specific bequest to stranger and also to his children and father, a creditor in case of insufficient assets to pay claims should be paid from legacy to stranger alone instead of charging it proportionately against her legacy and those of the father and children. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the estate of Guy D. Stevens, deceased. From an order granting a petition to compromise a creditor's claim, Edith Lavenbarg, a legatee under the will, appeals opposed by Elva L. Shetrone, administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Guy D. Stevens, deceased.

Affirmed.

Ivan Miller, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Stanley Arndt and Voorhees & Voorhees, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHINN, Justice.

This is an appeal from an order in probate granting a petition to compromise a creditor's claim. Appellant, Edith Lavenbarg, was remembered in the will of Guy D. Stevens, deceased, to whom she was unrelated. Upon a hearing had upon petition of the administratrix-with-will-annexed, at which appellant and all other parties interested in the estate appeared and were heard, the court made an order interpreting the will, which order has become final. Under this interpretation appellant was declared to have the right to use a residence for a period of five years after the date of the death of decedent, with the right to purchase the property at the end of the five-year period for $2,000, payable at the rate of $20 per month, provided that her right to occupy the premises and to purchase them at the end of the five-year period was to terminate if she failed to pay the taxes as they fell due or if she married a man who was able to support her. If she lost the right of occupancy and the right to purchase by reason of the happening of either of these contingencies the property was to go to Earl Stevens and Elva L. Shetrone, children of decedent, in equal shares, and they were also to take the proceeds of the sale of the property to appellant if she concluded the purchase. All funds in the Bank of America in Santa Monica, California, were bequeathed to the two children. The proceeds of a note of $400 due decedent were to be used for the payment of the expenses of last illness and funeral and of administration, and the remainder, if any, was to go one-third to T. G. Stevens, father of decedent, and two-thirds to the two children.

Vera M. Stevens, divorced spouse of decedent, presented a claim against the estate for $990 and interest and it was allowed and approved. The devise to appellant was appraised at $850 and the claim of Vera M. Stevens, with interest, amounted to more than $1,100. There were no assets available for payment of the claim without recourse to one or more of the legacies. The administratrix took the position that recourse must be had to the legacy of appellant for satisfaction of the creditor's claim before the legacies of the children and the father of decedent could be invaded, and arranged a transfer of appellant's legacy to the creditor in satisfaction of the latter's claim. The order appealed from approved this compromise and settlement.

[1-3] The first point made by appellant is that decedent's money at the time of his death was in the Bank of America, Highland Park branch, and not in the Santa Monica branch. It is contended that the bequest of the money was adeemed because there was no money in the Santa Monica branch. Evidence was taken at the hearing but has not been brought up in the record on appeal. It must be presumed that the evidence was sufficient to satisfy the court that the testator in transferring the account from one branch bank to another had no intention of disturbing the bequest of the money to his children. Proof of an intention to abrogate the bequests was necessary to show an ademption (Estate of McLaughlin, 1929, 97 Cal.App. 485, 275 P. 875), and it does not appear that the court committed error in ruling that the money went to the children.

The second question is whether the court followed the law in holding that the creditor should be paid from appellant's legacy alone, because she was a stranger to the testator, instead of charging it proportionately against her legacy and those of the father and children.

The code sections to be examined are sections 750, 751, and 752 of the Probate Code, which read as follows:

Sec. 750: "Order of resort to estate assets for payment of debts, expenses, etc. If the testator makes provision by his will, or designates the estate to be appropriated, for the payment of his debts, the expenses of administration, or family allowance, they must be paid according to such provision or out of the estate thus appropriated, so far as the same is sufficient. If insufficient, that portion of the estate not disposed of by the will, if any, must be appropriated for that purpose; and if that is not sufficient, the property given to residuary legatees and devisees, and thereafter all other property devised and bequeathed is liable for the same, in proportion to the value or amount of the several devises and legacies, but specific devises and legacies are exempt from such liability if it appears to the court necessary to carry into effect the intention of the testator, and there is other sufficient estate."

Sec. 751: "Order of resort for payment of legacies. The property of a testator, except as otherwise provided in this code, must be resorted to for the payment of legacies in the following order:

"(1) The property which is expressly appropriated by the will therefor.

"(2) Property not disposed of by the will.

"(3) Property which is devised or bequeathed to a residuary legatee."

Sec. 752: "Order of abatement of legacies. Unless a different intention is expressed in the will, abatement takes place in any class only as between legacies of that class, and legacies to a spouse or to kindred shall abate only after abatement of legacies to persons not related to the testator."

The sections of the Civil Code and Code of Civil Procedure in effect before the adoption of the Probate Code and which related to the subject of the order in which the property of an estate, as well as the order in which legacies, should be appropriated to the payment of debts and legacies, were considered in Estate of Apple, 1885, 66 Cal. 432, 6 P. 7. Sections 1359, 1360, 1361 and 1362 of the Civil Code then read as follows:

Sec. 1359: "The property of a testator, except as otherwise specially provided in this code and the Code of Civil Procedure, must be resorted to for the payment of debts, in the following order:

"One. The property which is expressly appropriated by the will for the payment of the debts;

"Two. Property not disposed of by the will;

"Three. Property which is devised or bequeathed to a residuary legatee;

"Four. Property which is not specifically devised or bequeathed; and,

"Five. All other property ratably. Before any debts are paid, the expenses of the administration, and the allowance to the family, must be paid or provided for."

Sec. 1360: "The property of a testator, except as otherwise specially provided in this code and the Code of Civil Procedure, must be resorted to for the payment of legacies, in the following order:

"One. The property which is expressly appropriated by the will for the payment of the legacies.

"Two. Property not disposed of by the will.

"Three. Property which is devised or bequeathed to a residuary legatee.

"Four. Property which is specifically devised or bequeathed."

Sec. 1361: "Legacies to husband, widow, or kindred of any class are chargeable only after legacies to persons not related to the testator."

Sec. 1362: "Abatement takes place in any class only as between legacies of that class, unless a different intention is expressed in the will."

The court held that the preference under section 1361 was to be given effect as between legacies of the same class in cases where it was necessary to resort to such legacies for the payment of debts but that it was not to be given effect as between legacies of the same class where such legacies had not been resorted to for the payment of debts but the estate available was insufficient to pay all of them or, in other words, that the preference ran as to the payment of debts but not as to the payment of legacies.

Sections 750, 751 and 752, Probate Code, were considered in Estate of Wever, 1936, 12 Cal.App.2d 237, 55 P.2d 279, and they were construed as giving the spouse and kindred preference over legatees of the same class who were unrelated to the testator, where the available estate was insufficient to pay the legacies in full. The question was not involved and the court expressly refrained from stating whether the preference also existed where resort was had to legacies for the payment of debts. The concluding clause of section 752, Probate Code, at the time of this decision read: "* * * and legacies to a spouse or to kindred are chargeable only after legacies to persons not related to the testator." It was in 1939 that the words "are chargeable" were changed to "shall abate" and the word "abatement" was added.

The conclusion we reach from a study of the Probate Code sections in the light of the decisions is that the legislature intended that the preference in favor of kindred should exist in the payment of both debts and legacies. We cannot read Estate of Apple, supra, and Estate of Wever, supra, without believing that it was the intention of the legislature in adopting the original sections to create a preference in favor of kindred with relation to the payment of both debts and legacies, although it must be conceded that such intention was not expressed as clearly as might have been done. But however that may be, for nearly 50 years after Estate of Apple was decided, it was the settled law that resort was to be had to legacies of non-relatives before those of kindred for the payment of debts; in fact, as declared in Estate of Apple, that had been the law since 1872. The decision was said by two of the participating Justices to be dictum upon that point, but it has been taken as the basis for text in Cal.Jur. and has never been overruled or departed from. In 1931, when the law on the same subject matter was rewritten, there was, in our opinion, no substantial change in the general plan except, as held in Estate of Wever, to make the preference applicable to the payment of legacies.

[4-8] Under section 1359, Civil Code, supra, all property of a testator, except as otherwise specially provided in that code and the Code of Civil Procedure, was liable for the payment of debts. This is also true of section 750, Probate Code. The phrase "except as otherwise specially provided", etc., found in section 1359, supra, is not in section 750, but we attach no importance to that fact. This phrase was not considered as a material one in the Apple decision and, in fact, it was also contained in section 1360 of the Civil Code when that matter was decided. There are other provisions of the code which create exceptions, just as there were before 1931, under which certain of the testator's property may be set apart free from liability for debts. As we read section 750 and former section 1359, we understand that their essential purpose was to direct the order in which the property of the estate should be taken for the payment of debts, expenses of administration and family allowance, which order runs to the several classes of property defined in the sections. All estates come within the scope of this purpose and we would not expect to find in section 750 directions upon the wholly unrelated matter of preference in the payment of legacies to kindred over legacies to others within a single class. Section 751 states the order in which legacies are payable. It differs in phraseology but not at all in meaning from former section 1360 of the Civil Code. Down to this point the law deals with different classes of property and different classes of legacies, giving preference to some classes above others. The legacies we are considering all belong to the class of specific legacies. It is not until we reach section 752, Probate Code, which combines former sections 1361 and 1362 of the Civil Code, that we find a definition of the rights of legatees of a single class as among themselves. Here for the first time the matter of abatement of legacies is dealt with specifically and we find that legacies abate by classes and necessarily ratably within each class but with the exception that "legacies to a spouse or to kindred shall abate only after abatement of legacies to persons not related to the testator." The words "abate" and "abatement" are more appropriate than the word "chargeable," which was used in former section 1361, Civil Code, and section 752, Probate Code, before 1939, and which was held to refer to the payment of debts in Estate of Apple and to the payment of legacies in Estate of Wever. To abate means to do away with or nullify or to lessen or diminish. A legacy is abated when it is used in whole or in part to meet a priority payment, whether of a debt, expense of administration, family allowance, or legacy. The words "abate" and "abatement" are not qualified in any way nor used in a restricted sense in section 752, and we think that legacies to spouse or kindred do not abate until after legacies of the same class to non-kindred have abated, whether resort to the legacies be had by reason of debts or by reason of other legacies having priority. We think this construction follows from a history of the law on the subject, which we have briefly reviewed, and it does not bring section 752 into conflict with section 750. It also follows from the common sense and logic of the situation as well. One who makes a will leaving specific legacies to a spouse or kindred and to persons who are not related to him ordinarily assumes that the estate will be sufficient to pay them all. The preference which the law gives to the spouse and kindred where all the legacies cannot be paid is but the expression of the legislative purpose to do what the testator would naturally have done if he had thought of it, namely, give preference to spouse and kindred above strangers in the contingency that the combined legacies would, for any reason, exceed the estate available for their payment. If the estate of the testator is reduced by the payment of all of his debts during his lifetime to the point where specific legacies to his spouse and kindred and specific legacies to strangers cannot all be paid, the spouse and kindred will be paid first. This is the effect of the holding in Estate of Wever, supra, the soundness of which we think is beyond question. Why then, with debts of the same amount and estate of the same value, should the spouse and kindred lose their preference through the circumstance that the testator neglected to pay his debts and it became necessary for his executor to resort to legacies with which to pay them. If the legislature had intended to change the law, as declared in Estate of Apple, section 752, in providing for abatement of legacies, would have denied the preference to kindred in cases of abatement on account of debts instead of using the new words without any qualification whatever.

We have not overlooked section 753, Probate Code, which reads as follows: "When property given by will to persons other than the residuary devisees and legatees is sold for the payment of debts or expenses or family allowance, all the devisees and legatees must contribute according to their respective interests to the devisee or legatee whose devise or legacy has been sold, and the court, when distribution is made, must settle the amount of the several liabilities and decree the amount each person shall contribute, and reserve the same from his distributive share for the purpose of such contribution." While appellant does not rely upon this section for a reversal of the order, we have considered it and deem it to be inapplicable to the question before us. Manifestly the section must be read in harmony with the other sections we have discussed and, when so read, it does not destroy the preference given to spouse and kindred over other legatees of the same class. A contrary construction would bring it in conflict with the scheme of the three preceding sections as we understand it. The section is in substance the same as former section 1564 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was adopted in 1880. That section has never been construed as affecting in any way the preference to kindred over others in a given class. If it had been the intention to nullify the holding in Estate of Apple by destroying the preference to kindred in the payment of debts, we think section 1564, which was in effect when the Apple decision was rendered, would not have been carried into the Probate Code without the expression of that intention.

The order is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Charles C. Haines, Judge.

Action by Lovell C. Chambers against James A. Duvall and others to quiet title to realty. From a judgment decreeing that plaintiff had no title to or interest in the realty and enjoining him from asserting any such title or interest, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Solon S. Kipp and W. E. Starke, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Herbert C. Kelly, of San Diego, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action to quiet title. The plaintiff claims title to certain land in San Diego County by virtue of a tax deed issued to him on July 29, 1941, by the tax collector of San Diego County following a sale at public auction pursuant to the provisions of section 3476 of the Revenue and Taxation Code, St. 1939, p. 1325, which sale was held on July 2, 1941.

At the trial the plaintiff rested his entire case on this tax deed and produced no other evidence except in rebuttal to certain of the defendants' evidence on a point which is not material to this discussion. The Court found that the plaintiff was not the owner of this property; that his tax deed is void on its face and ineffective to vest title in him; that the amount expended by him for said tax title and in connection therewith was $124.78; that he was entitled to be reimbursed in this amount; and that said amount had been paid into court by the defendants for him. A judgment was thereupon entered decreeing that the plaintiff has no title to or interest in the property, and enjoining him from asserting any such title or interest. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

[1] It is well settled that a plaintiff may not recover in a quiet title action where his only evidence of title is a tax deed which is insufficient under the statutes by virtue of which it was issued. Swann v. Carson, 56 Cal.App.2d 502, 132 P.2d 863; Henderson v. De Turk, 164 Cal. 296, 128 P. 747; Carter v. Chevalier, 100 Cal.App. 567, 280 P. 706.

The appellant contends that the tax deed here in question substantially conforms to all requirements of law at the time it was issued and that it was prima facie evidence of the regularity and sufficiency of all prior proceedings.

While this deed was issued following a sale pursuant to the provisions of section 3476 of the Revenue and Taxation Code it follows the form provided in the old Political Code section 3785b and sets forth only the facts suggested by that form. Under former section 3786 of the Political Code a deed in that form was made primary evidence that the property had been sold as prescribed by law. Both of these sections of the Political Code were repealed as of February 1, 1941, before the sale here in question took place. Sec. 50002, Revenue and Taxation Code, St. 1939, p. 1373. At the time of this sale section 3479 of the Revenue and Taxation Code, St. 1939, p. 1325, provided for the execution of a deed following a sale held pursuant to section 3476 of that code, and section 3480 of that code, St. 1939, p. 1326, provided that such a deed, in addition to the usual provisions, should set forth certain specified facts. These requirements differed in a number of respects from those formerly applicable to such a deed when sections 3785b and 3786 of the Political Code were in effect.

One of the most important of these changes is that whereas formerly such a deed was not required to set forth any statement that the property had been sold to the state and the deed itself was primary evidence of such fact, section 3480 of the Revenue and Taxation Code requires such a deed to set forth "(a) The year of sale to the State." This requirement necessarily includes the fact that the property has been sold to the state. Both the fact that a sale to the state has taken place and the date thereof are extremely important as affecting subsequent procedure in connection with tax delinquent property. Section 3481 of the Revenue and Taxation Code, St. 1939, p. 1326, then provides that a deed containing the recitals required by section 3480 is evidence of the same facts as a deed to the state. Not only is section 3481 not effective for this purpose unless the deed contains the recitals required by section 3480 but section 3513, St. 1939, p. 1326, covering a deed to the state, requires similar recitals and section 3517, St. 1939, p. 1327, makes a deed containing those recitals prima facie evidence that the property has been sold as prescribed by law.

The deed here in question contains no statement of the year the property was sold to the state and no statement of any kind to the effect that it had ever been sold to the state. On the other hand, following the form prescribed by section 3785b of the Political Code, it recited that this real property was duly assessed for taxation in the year 1935 to Jas. A. Duvall and that it was thereafter, on the second day of July, duly sold to L. C. Chambers by the tax collector for the nonpayment of delinquent taxes which had been legally levied in the year 1935 and were a lien upon said real property.

[2-6] The change thus brought about by requiring the setting forth of the year of sale to the state in such a deed, in place of the former requirement, cannot be held to be an immaterial change, and it cannot be held that the setting forth of the fact that the property was assessed for taxation in a different year is a substantial compliance with the requirement that the year of sale to the state be set forth in the deed. It does not necessarily follow from the fact that property was assessed in a certain year that it was sold to the state the following year, or even that it was ever sold to the state, properly or otherwise. The legislature had the right and power to fix the conditions under which property deeded to the state for the nonpayment of taxes might be sold and conveyed to third parties. There are good reasons for requiring such a deed to recite the fact that the property was actually sold to the state and the year when this occurred. For example, this requirement might occasionally avoid an injustice by preventing a sale to third parties when, as a matter of fact, through some oversight the property had never been sold to the state. In the absence of such a recital in the deed, and under the law in force at the time this deed was issued, the fact that the property had been properly sold to the state cannot be presumed in favor of the validity of the deed. In effect, these statutes very specifically provided that instead of presuming a sale to the state from the issuance of such a deed that fact must be set forth in the deed itself. The deed here in question failed to conform to this requirement either substantially or at all, the appellant failed to meet the burden of proof resting upon him, and the trial court correctly held that the deed was ineffective to vest title to the property in him.

In a number of other respects the deed here in question failed to comply with the requirements of section 3480 of the Revenue and Taxation Code and failed to set out certain facts as there required. With respect to these other matters it is argued that the recitals contained in this deed were so similar to those required by that section as to constitute a substantial compliance therewith. Because of the importance we attach to the matter above discussed, we refrain from any detailed discussion of these variances although they emphasize the fact that the deed in question does not comply with the statutes in force at the time the deed was issued. It clearly appears, not only that an old form was used, but that no attempt was made to comply with the new statutes.

[7, 8] The appellant further contends that the law in force at the time the property was originally sold to the state governs the form of such a deed rather than the law in force at the time the property is sold to a third party, and that this deed was therefore entirely sufficient and proper. In support thereof, cases are cited in which it was held that the law existing at the time of the sale to the state regulated the right of redemption and affected certain proceedings dependent upon that sale. It may be observed that this general rule has been considerably modified, to say the least, by more recent decisions. Bray v. Jones, 20 Cal.2d 858, 129 P.2d 357; Campbell v. Woolner, 57 Cal.App.2d 511, 134 P.2d 822; Smith v. Addiego, 54 Cal.App. 2d 230, 129 P.2d 953; Mercury Herald Co. v. Moore, 22 Cal.2d 269, 138 P.2d 673, 147 A.L.R. 1111. Moreover, we are here concerned with the rights of a third party who first enters the picture as the purchaser at an auction sale held by the state or on its behalf. The state may, and does, fix the conditions upon which such property will be thus sold and the purchaser must bid it in, if at all, upon the conditions fixed by the statutes. Insofar as this matter is concerned, the law in effect on July 2, 1941, when this sale was held, is controlling. At that time the only law in effect governing this matter was section 3480 and related sections of the Revenue and Taxation Code, and the deed in question fails to conform to the requirements then in force.

The respondents also contend that even if this tax deed were held sufficient as a prima facie showing of title, the proceedings upon which it was based were irregular and void for a number of reasons which are extensively argued. Under the views above expressed it is unnecessary to consider these other points.

The judgment is affirmed.

RUBATTINO v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION.

Civ. 7054.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

July 28, 1944.

Hearing Denied Sept. 25, 1944.

1. Stipulations ⇨14(10)

A stipulation may be relied upon as evidence, but where the facts contained in such stipulation are either insufficient, or immaterial to a determination of the issues, the stipulation itself cannot endow such facts with materiality or sufficiency. Code Civ.Proc. § 283, subd. 1.

2. Workmen's compensation ⇨1429

Where there was no evidence to support a finding that deceased had contracted silicosis before his last employment, and evidence as to conditions under which he worked for previous employer formed no basis for an inference that his health was impaired or that he had a disease at that time which could have been aggravated by his last employment, a stipulation that deceased had been exposed to silica dust during the entire period of his employment by several employers was insufficient basis for compensation award against all employers rather than against last employer. St. 1937, pp. 269, 284, §§ 3600, 4663; Code Civ. Proc. § 283, subd. 1.

3. Workmen's compensation ⇨1530

To be entitled to compensation for occupational disease of silicosis, exposure alone is not sufficient, but adequate knowledge concerning the quantity and quality of dust exposure as well as the length of the employment period is necessary to establish a distinct causal relationship between the injury and the employment. St.1937, p. 284, § 4663.

4. Workmen's compensation ⇨201

The statute relating to apportionment of liability among successive employers for death or disability resulting from occupational diseases was not intended to create a liability if none existed, but rather a paring down of liability. St.1937, pp. 269, 284, §§ 3600, 4663.

5. Workmen's compensation ⇨1347

An employer, upon whom the facts and the law place responsibility for compensation for silicosis, who would escape a portion of the load on theory that he alone is not responsible, has burden of proving that other employers should share the responsibility. St.1937, pp. 269, 284, §§ 3600, 4663.

6. Workmen's compensation ⇨201

Where it is made to appear that an employment had brought about a case of silicosis which was aggravated by a subsequent employment, the burden of compensating employee for the resulting disability is properly divided among the employers upon whom liability exists. St.1937, pp. 269, 284, §§ 3600, 4663.

Appeal from Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Joanne Rubattino, a minor, by John Delaney, the guardian of her person and estate, against the Industrial Accident Commission. To review an award of the Commission granting compensation and apportioning the liability therefor over the entire period of employment of deceased and imposing a proportionate liability only as against employer before the Commission, the minor brings certiorari.

Award annulled and application remanded for further proceeding.

Donald Gallagher and Edmund J. Thomas, Jr., both of San Francisco, for State Comp. Ind. Fund.

PEEK, Justice.

Petitioner, the minor daughter of Guseppe Rubattino, deceased, by her general guardian John Delaney, seeks a review for the purpose of annulling amended findings and award of the respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

The Commission found that the deceased father of the minor applicant had sustained injury arising out of and occurring in the course of his employment as a miner, the said injury being the disease of silicosis, which proximately caused his death on March 6, 1943.

At the hearing had before the Commission it was stipulated by all parties that the entire period of the decedent's employment as a miner, 199½ months, had been worked under exposure. It was further stipulated that of the period of 199½ months, 15 months had been in the employ of J. F. Knapp Corporation, who had operated the Aetna Mine, and 73 months had been in the employ of Great Western Mine, which had been operated by defendants Richard Deter, and Bumstead Mining Company, respectively. The balance of the period of exposure, other than the 88 months, had been in the employ of other mine operators, who were not before the Commission as parties defendant.

In order to simplify calculation the Commission doubled the figure of 199½ months to 399 one-half months, and correspondingly doubled the total of 88 months to 176 one-half months. Award was made of 176/399 of the maximum benefit allowable ($4159.96 and $150 for burial expenses) or $1577.06 and $54.88 respectively, against the insurance carriers of the employers before the Commission. No award was made for the balance, or any part thereof, against the other employers.

The petitioner challenges such apportionment on the grounds that the Commission exceeded its jurisdiction when it so apportioned the liability over the entire period of the employment during which the decedent was found to have been exposed to dust; that there is no evidence that the decedent was in any way affected by the disease of silicosis prior to his employment at the Great Western Mine during 1928; that in order for the Commission to make a finding as regards the existence of such disease it is necessary that there be scientific evidence to that effect and not conjecture; that the only basis for the apportionment is found in section 4663 of the Labor Code, St. 1937, p. 284, which provides that "In case of aggravation of any disease existing prior to a compensable injury, compensation shall be allowed only for the proportion of the disability due to the aggravation of such prior disease which is reasonably attributed to the injury", and that, therefore, in the absence of any evidence of disease existing prior to his last two employments the award herein cannot be sustained in that the above-cited section calls for findings of the existence of the disease and aggravation thereof by subsequent employments.

The record before this court discloses that decedent's employment as a miner began in 1908, and that from such date until 1942, he worked intermittently at such employment, finally quitting work in January 1942, because of his physical condition which was diagnosed as the disease of silicosis.

It appears from an unverified written statement of decedent, which was received in evidence, that he had no physical examination either before going to work or upon quitting at any of the mines at which he had been employed. His only illness during such time occurred when he was stricken with influenza while working at the Aetna Mine and was off from work for approximately three months. Employment in several different mines followed, and from 1928 to 1935 he worked at the Great Western Mine near St. Helena, which mine was then operated by defendants Richard Deter and Bumstead Mining Company respectively. His work in this mine was both on the surface and underground. Following that the employee did outside work for Union Lumber Company at Fort Bragg.

In 1936 frequent colds and chills caused him to consult a physician. X-rays of his chest, taken by Dr. George J. Wood of St. Helena, disclosed that he was suffering from tuberculosis. As a result of such diagnosis he spent several months in the Silverado Sanitarium on Mt. St. Helena, and was discharged therefrom on December 19, 1937. He did not work again until April 15, 1938, when he was again employed at the Aetna Mine, then operated by defendant J. F. Knapp Corporation, and he worked there steadily until January 1942. He quit because of his weakened condition. An examination by Dr. M. M. Booth of St. Helena, on February 21, 1942, disclosed that he was suffering from the disease of silicosis, and he was so advised by his physician.

On September 1, 1942, decedent filed his application for adjustment of his claim for workmen's compensation with respondent Commission. Additional employers were named as defendants upon the motion of the Commission but no service was had upon any of them because of the lack of information of their whereabouts. Upon the hearing of that claim the Commission found that the date of injury was February 21, 1942; that more than six months having elapsed between the date of injury and the filing of his claim for compensation, and no disability indemnity having been paid or medical treatment furnished, the claim was barred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. Rubattino died on March 6, 1943, the cause of his death being silicosis, and on April 6, 1943, petitioner herein, as the minor and wholly dependent child of the decedent, filed her claim for compensation death benefits.

At the hearing of her petition it was agreed that the record in the proceeding filed by the decedent would be considered as a part of the record in the present case. It also was stipulated as follows:

"Referee: Let the record show that the parties stipulate that the exposure in this case may be taken at a total exposure of 199-1/2 months, of which fifteen months were with J. F. Knapp, insured by Industrial Indemnity Exchange, and seventy-three months were with Great Western Mine, covered by State Compensation Insurance Fund; that the fraction which may be used in calculating the apportionment is 176/399, of which 30/399ths is chargeable to Industrial Indemnity Exchange and 146/399ths to State Compensation Insurance Fund."

At the conclusion of the hearing the Commission found that the decedent, while employed as a miner in certain named mines during the period from 1909 to February 1942, "sustained injury arising out of and occurring in the course of said employment, said injury consisting of the disease known as silicosis as the result of exposure to silica dust during a period of 199.5 months, proximately causing death on March 6, 1943," and that the applicant waived any claim against any of the named mines except the Great Western Mine, which was insured by the State Compensation Insurance Fund, and the Aetna Mine, which was operated by J. F. Knapp Corporation, insured by the Industrial Indemnity Exchange, "due to the fact that she has been unable to ascertain whether said employers were insured, and due to the difficulty in obtaining collectible judgments."

The Commission then made its award in favor of petitioner in the total sum of $1577.06, divided between the two mining companies in the proportions as previously mentioned. A petition for rehearing was filed with the Commission and was denied.

Thereafter a writ of review was sought in this court to annul such award.

The questions herein presented are all involved with and relate to the determination of the one question: In the absence of evidence of demonstrable silicosis due to exposure to silica dust, did the Commission exceed its jurisdiction when it apportioned liability for the death of Rubattino over the entire period of his employment as a miner, or did the stipulation previously quoted furnish sufficient evidence in regard to the dust conditions of his previous employments to substantiate such apportionment?

The petitioner argues that the total lack of such evidence in the record is not cured by said stipulation inasmuch as it merely refers to "exposure", and therefore entirely fails to establish the necessary elements of the quantity and quality of such exposure; that the portions of decedent's testimony and written statement relating to dust conditions in the various mines is not complete; that it refers only to some, not all of said mines; that the medical testimony is likewise of little value; that from the time he first began his employment as a miner in 1909 until 1918 when he was afflicted with influenza, his history shows that of a normally healthy individual; that from 1918 until 1937, when he entered the Silverado Sanitarium for tuberculosis, his history is likewise of the same character, and that it was not until February 1942, when he was so advised by Dr. M. M. Booth of St. Helena, that he had any knowledge of silicosis. A letter from Dr. Wood, upon whose advice he entered the sanitarium in 1937, dated September 25, 1942, and addressed to the Medical Department of the State Compensation Fund, which letter was received in evidence, states: "It is my impression that Mr. Rubattino had bilateral pulmonary tuberculosis and some silicosis at this time."

It is to be noted, however, that the letter from Dr. Wood is dated subsequent to the death of Rubattino, and that the information contained therein relative to the existence of silicosis was not communicated to the decedent at the time he was examined by said doctor in 1937. The only apparent reason for his confinement to the sanitarium at that time was his tubercular condition.

It is further contended by petitioner that as the previously mentioned evidence is all that the record discloses regarding dust conditions, recourse to medical testimony would be necessary to establish the existence of the disease prior to February 1942, and that mere exposure would not be sufficient to warrant a finding that the initial exposure in 1909 was the inception of the disease. In this regard petitioner argues that at the time decedent was admitted to the sanitarium in May 1937 for a tubercular condition, his attending physician was able to discover only "some silicosis".

Petitioner strenuously urged that it was incumbent upon the Commission to find, upon complete evidence, when the disease of silicosis first prevailed; that its general finding to the effect that the disease attached in 1909 merely by exposure to silica dust without evidence in regard to the duration, quality or intensity of such exposure, was without the jurisdiction of the Commission, and for the same reason a finding that the disease prevailed at any time prior to decedent's employment at the Great Western Mine in 1928 (14 years prior to his disability) had no foundation, and therefore cannot be sustained. In support thereof petitioner relies upon the case of Moquin v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 33 Cal. App.2d 511, 515, 92 P.2d 413, 415, wherein the court stated: "Conceding that reviewing courts may not invade the field of the fact-finding body, and that under well settled rules where a conflict in the evidence exists the findings of the triers of fact are conclusive, it is nevertheless equally well settled that the application of the foregoing doctrine is limited to cases where the conflict is substantial and real, and not fanciful or fictitious. We recognize the rule that the burden is upon the applicant to establish the fact of injury; but nevertheless, where, as here, the injury is conclusively proven, but the employer contends it is not a new one and did not occur on the date or under the circumstances alleged, the burden is on such employer to prove his contentions in that regard."

The record discloses evidence that Rubattino worked in various mines over a period of years prior to his going to the sanitarium in 1937 and also prior to his last employment, but there is no evidence to support a finding that he had contracted silicosis before his employment with the Great Western Mine. The character of the conditions under which he worked is revealed solely by his testimony and his unverified statement, which are, at best, most meager, and contain nothing from which even an inference may be drawn that his health was impaired or could have been impaired by such conditions or that he had a disease at that time which could have been aggravated by his last employment, thereby bringing him within the provisions of section 4663 of the Labor Code.

In the case of Moore Shipbuilding Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 70 Cal.App. 495, 233 P. 392, 393, the Commission found that the employee had sustained injury from lead poisoning while employed by his last employer but held that the compensation should be apportioned in accordance with the time worked by the employee "under exposure to lead", thereby including the Moore Company.

On review the District Court stated:

"The power of the Commission to apportion the liability among several employers under the terms of the section cited [Sub. 4, Sec. 3, Workmen's Compensation Act, Stat.1917, p. 831, as amended by Stat.1919, p. 911 (now sec. 4663 of the Labor Code)], is limited to a 'case of aggravation of any disease existing prior to any such injury.'

* * *

"The apportionment of the award against the petitioner was based solely on the conjecture that, while employed by petitioner, the applicant might have contracted the disease to some extent. But the direct testimony of the applicant showed that he had no symptoms of the disease while in the employ of the petitioner. * * * It follows that the Commission exceeded its jurisdiction." (A petition for a hearing before the Supreme Court was denied.)

In the present case respondent Commission, though not directly attacking the conclusion of the two cases last cited, endeavors to evade the effect thereof by predicated its case almost solely upon Marsh v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 217 Cal. 338, 18 P.2d 933, 934, 86 A.L.R. 563, a case wherein two applicants filed claims for death benefits as the result of silicosis, while a third made application for compensation benefits for the same cause. The Commission denied all of the applications upon the sole ground that each was barred by lapse of time under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The only issue on review, as stated by the court, was "the determination of this question."

The respondent Commission acknowledges that the rule established in the Marsh case, supra, was for the sole purpose of applying the statute of limitations to cases of latent disease or latent injury. But it argues that as the date of injury as therein stated is the date of the culmination in the disability of the accumulated effects of the latent disease that therefore death benefits should be apportioned over the entire period of employment. The Commission also admits that "it is necessary, in order to establish liability for compensation, that it be ascertained in what prior employment, or employments, the silica dust, which eventually culminated in disability and death, was inhaled." As we have noted, the record discloses no substantial evidence of the prior employments in which silica dust was fatally inhaled. This omission, the Commission argues, was cured by the stipulation that the decedent had been "exposed to silica inhalation for 199½ months". However, the stipulation does not say "exposed to silica inhalation" nor does it refer to exposure to a particular quantity and quality of silica dust. It is merely that "exposure in this case may be taken at total exposure of 199½ months."

The respondent Industrial Indemnity Exchange raises but one issue and states that inasmuch as it believed its insured, the Aetna Mine, did not represent a silicosis hazard, and as a determination of such question would have necessitated a long drawn out trial, it therefore agreed that "the exposure to silica hazard" was as set forth in said stipulation. Thus it contends there are presented to this court but two questions. (1) "Is the stipulation of counsel of parties of any sanctity; that is, may the Industrial Accident Commission rely upon it in lieu of proof" and (2) "Is a stipulation of facts some evidence on which the Industrial Accident Commission may enter a findings and award and which may therefore not be reviewed by an appellate court. * * *

[1] We are entirely in accord with the contentions made by said respondent and with cases cited in support of its statements that a stipulation may be relied upon as evidence. But where the facts contained in such a stipulation are either insufficient, or immaterial to a determination of the issues presented, the stipulation itself cannot endow such facts with materiality or sufficiency.

[2] Subdivision 1 of Section 283 of the Code of Civil Procedure states that an attorney may bind his client in any of the steps of a proceeding by his agreement filed with the clerk or entered upon the Minutes. Obviously, therefore, such section relates only to the power of an attorney to bind his client. The question of the sufficiency of that to which he attempts to bind his client is a question for the courts. Even assuming that from the wording of such stipulation it may be inferred that it was to cover 199½ months of exposure to silica dust, it still would lack the sufficiency necessary for a proper determination of the causal connection between the disease and the conditions under which the employee worked and the apportionment of the death benefits as is herein presented.

[3] It is well established by all medical authorities that exposure alone is not sufficient. As stated in Sappington: Medicolegal Phases of Occupational Diseases, p. 81: "One may be able to see dust in the air, but the mere observance of it will not give any indication as to the amount of free silica contained in the dust, the particle of dust, nor any fairly accurate estimate of the amount of dust in the air at the time." And again, at page 123, " * * * adequate knowledge concerning the quantity and quality of dust exposure, as well as the length of the employment period, is necessary to establish a distinct causal relationship."

The causal relationship mentioned by Sappington has also found support in this state in the Marsh case, supra, wherein the court stated, 217 Cal. at page 351, 18 P.2d at page 938, 86 A.L.R. 563: " * * * In order to justify an award for disability or death due to an occupational disease, there must always be established an unbroken causal connection between the injury and the employment or the condition under which the employee is required to carry on his work. The connection must be such as to show that the disease or injury was proximately caused by the employment or the conditions of work; and when such unbroken chain of causation is found to exist, then all physical consequences flowing from the disease or injury are proper elements for consideration in determining the merits of a claim for compensation or death benefits. Madore v. New Departure Mfg. Co., supra, 104 Conn. 709, 134 A. 259; Cishowski v. Clayton Mfg. Co., [supra], 105 Conn. 651, 136 A. 472; Kovaliski v. Collins Co., supra, 102 Conn. 6, 128 A. 288;

London G. & A. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 202 Cal. 239, 241, 259 P. 1096, 54 A.L.R. 1392; Singlaub v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 87 Cal.App. 324, 262 P. 411. In the cases under consideration the record sufficiently establishes a chain of causation between the conditions of employment and the physical consequences of the disease contracted." (Italics ours.)

This court also recognized this situation when it stated in the case of Argonaut Mining Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 21 Cal.App.2d 492, 495, 70 P.2d 216, 219: "The contributing cause of silicosis is well known to the medical profession and to mining industries. It is prevalent among employees in mines, potteries, stone and slate factories, and in file-cutting and metal-grinding enterprises, where the air is permeated with minute particles of stone, quartz, slate, or metal dust which is inhaled to the detriment of the tissues, glands, and lungs. Some men appear to be immune from the disease, but a large proportion of those who are engaged in such pursuits are susceptible to silicosis. The incurring and development of this disease depends somewhat upon the constitution of the employee and upon the conditions under which he works. The course of the disease may be rapid or gradual, sometimes extending over a period of several years before the victim is finally disabled for the performance of manual labor. * * *

The respondent Commission further contends that as section 3600 of the Labor Code, St.1937, p. 269, provides that liability for compensation shall exist against an employer for any injury sustained by his employees arising out of and in the course of employment, and for the death of any employee if injury proximately causes death, that in order that such liability shall exist, the injury must be proximately caused by the employment; that therefore as silicosis is a disease which is the accumulated effect of the inhalation of silica dust, it is the employment, or employments, during which silica dust was inhaled, which are the employments proximately causing the injury.

With such contention there can be no disagreement. However, an obvious question immediately presents itself, i. e. what is the factual or evidentiary basis for such a conclusion in the present case? We have already determined that the record is devoid of substantial evidence in this regard. We have likewise found that said stipulation is not sufficient to cure such lack of evidence. The conclusion, therefore, is incapable that no evidence either by stipulation or otherwise was before the Commission upon which it could base its findings.

But the respondent Commission argues that although it is true, as petitioner contends, that "the period of exposure is not controlling", and that "there is no evidence of any silicosis being present in the body of her father prior to his employment at the Great Western Mine in 1928", yet it is contended that as "no examination was made prior to that time", and because of the insidious nature of the disease, this merely meant that "the effects of the inhalation had not progressed to the point at which her father's health was noticeably affected."

Such argument falls squarely within the issues raised by petitioner that the finding and award by the Commission, because of the total lack of evidence of the dust condition of the mines is therefore pure speculation of lay minds upon a question which could be solved only by scientific evidence, but that no such evidence appears in the record whatever.

In the quoted portion of the Argonaut case, supra, this court held to the same effect, that the nature of the disease is such that "Some men appear to be immune * * *. The incurring and development of this disease depends somewhat upon the constitution of the employee and upon the conditions under which he works." The course of the disease is not necessarily slow but may be rapid as was the situation in the Marsh case, supra, where the exposure of the three parties involved was a year and two months, one year and one month, and eleven months, respectively.

The only scientific medical evidence herein, other than the previously mentioned letter of Dr. Wood, was that of Dr. M. M. Booth, who examined the decedent in February, 1942, and in his communication to the Commission under date of September 28, 1942, stated: "There is no doubt in my mind that the silicosis had been existent probably for quite a few years. * * * As far as estimating the period of years that this condition has been existent I feel that it is impossible."

Dr. Jesse L. Carr, pathologist, of San Francisco, who performed a post-mortem examination of the lungs of the decedent, wrote to the Commission on March 11, 1943, in part as follows: "There is considerable age and sequence here and much of the fibrous tissue is extremely old and hyaline."

On March 18, 1943, he further informed the Commission by letter, in part as follows: "The disease sequence as reflected in the slides here is an extremely long and old one and has been developing for a matter of years."

Obviously, therefore, the conclusion of the respondent Commission "that its procedure, as followed in the present case, which is that of apportionment of liability for compensation over all the employments in which exposure to silica dust and its consequent inhalation is proved to exist, is a proper procedure under the statute and the decisions of our courts. Each such employment contributed to the eventual disability and each had a part in proximately causing the resulting injury", is entirely untenable in that the record discloses no actual evidence of inhalation of silica dust—all that appears are the statements of Drs. Wood, Booth and Carr.

The brief of the respondent State Fund argues upon the authority of Blanchard v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 68 Cal.App. 65, 228 P. 359, 360, which it contends first enunciated the rule in this state of "apportionment of liability" among successive employers, and specifically quotes that portion of the decision wherein the court, in commenting upon Subdivision 4, section 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act [now section 4663 of the Labor Code], stated: "Under this section it was plainly the duty of the Commission to apportion the award of compensation among the respective employers."

The Blanchard case involved a question concerning the liability of one who had become afflicted with what is commonly termed "glassblowers' arm." It appears from the report of that case that Blanchard had contracted the disease in his right arm while in the employment of his first employer, and knew it, but continued to work on, though with less efficiency, during his two remaining employments until finally he was compelled to quit. The Commission determined that he had a certain percentage of total permanent disability and awarded him a sum which was apportioned among the three employments. Upon review by the District Court of Appeal, the court stated: "The purpose of this petition is, therefore, to seek the annulment of that portion of the Commission's award which prorates the compensation between the three employers." The court then proceeded with a discussion of the Labor Code, and held as above quoted.

It should be noted from a factual standpoint that there was involved an aggravation of a previous disease which first manifested itself at the time of his original employment and continued on through the remaining employments until he was ultimately forced to stop working. Though the court did state that under such section and such circumstances it was the duty of the Commission to apportion the award, yet, nevertheless, in so doing it was required to "exercise a discretion based upon the evidence of the various periods of employment." (Italics added.)

It also should be noted that in said section 4663 which the court therein quoted, and which it declared made plain the duty of the Commission to apportion the award, contains neither the words "apportion" or "prorate" or any words of similar import.

[4] The purposes for which that section was enacted to accomplish might well be construed to have been a paring down of liability rather than the imposition thereof. This observation is not intended as a criticism of the court's conclusion in the Blanchard case but to emphasize that that conclusion was based on two grounds. As specifically mentioned in the case it was based not alone on the subdivision specifically referred to as its support but also on the facts previously reviewed but not mentioned, which reveal that the liability for compensation rested upon the earlier employers. This court does not interpret the Blanchard case as either holding or declaring that section 4663 authorized the spread of the burden of compensating an employee injured by an occupational disease upon previous employers who, but for the subdivision, would have no liability. Our conviction that said section is not to be construed as creating a liability is fortified by a further decision, Moore Shipbuilding Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra, rendered by the same court six months after the opinion in the Blanchard case.

The balance of the brief of the respondent State Fund is given over entirely to an academic discussion of the disease of silicosis. In such discussion excerpts from various medical books and journals upon medical jurisprudence are quoted. It is the evident intent of such citations to emphasize the progressive nature of the disease. But it must be noted that in each of such authorities emphasis also is placed upon the length of exposure, the degree of intensity of dust during such exposure, or as stated in Cecil, Textbook of Medicine, 4th Ed., page 884, and quoted by respondent State Fund: "As a general rule from 15 to 20 years working exposure to 15 or 20 million particles of pure crystalline silica are required to produce demonstrable silicosis."

While in Gray, Attorneys' Textbook of Medicine, 2d Ed., page 1071, likewise quoted by respondent State Fund in its brief, is found the following statement: "Investigation must be carried out along three lines before it can be determined that a particular employment is at fault; duration and intensity of exposure, true formula of dust, and actual cause of disability must be known."

After a discussion concerning the necessity that the silica must actually exist in the dust as silicon dioxide, formula SiO_2 , called "free silica", the text last quoted states: "It has been established that silica causes silicosis only in the crystalline form * * * combined silica, as silicates, and the host of other chemical substances containing the element silicon, do not lead to silicosis."

It is then stated that:

"Quartz, the principal constituent of sand, is almost universally distributed. We are all exposed to dust containing this compound throughout our lives. Nature has developed a protective mechanism that will care for any ordinary amount, and even excessive amounts for years, before symptoms appear. Russell (3) points out that 10,000,000 particles of dust per cubic foot, with 35% free silica as quartz, is not necessarily dangerous. This produces only a very slight fibrosis of the lung, as occurs in practically all people, but without danger as a cause of tuberculosis.

"The U. S. Public Health Service (20) considers from 10 to 20,000,000 particles under 10 microns of granite, 35% quartz, to be reasonably safe, while probably 50,000,000 particles of anthracite, 5% quartz, fails to produce silicosis. Cummings believes 5,000,000 particles of 100% quartz to be safe.

"Particles larger than 10 microns (1/2500 inch) are rapidly removed from the body. Most of them lodge in the nose and throat, and are either spit out or swallowed, ultimately to be eliminated through the intestine. Thousands of others lodge in the bronchi and bronchioles. The mucus membrane lining the air passages has tiny hair-like projections called cilia. These keep up a continual lashing motion, carrying mucus from the depths of the lung to the throat, where it is either coughed out or swallowed. Most of the silica and other dust is carried along with this stream and leaves the lung.

"The relatively few particles, less than 10 microns (1/2500 inch) in size and thus small enough to pass through the finest bronchioles to the alveoli, and which are not accidentally caught in the sticky mucus on the walls of the air passages are beyond the eliminating action of the cilia. The phagocytic, or 'dust cells' carry some of them to the bronchioles, to be swept out of the lung. Others are carried deeper toward the lymphatic glands near the pleural covering. From here they may be taken still further to the larger bronchial glands."

In summary, Gray concludes that the following points must be specifically investigated:

"1. What degree of exposure to free silicon dioxide was present, making sure that other substances as silicates are not so reported?

"2. How long has exposure continued * * * ?

"3. How long and intensive was exposure during previous employments throughout the patient's life?

"4. Are you sure that a diagnosis has not been made largely on X-ray findings without making certain that other disease is not the real causative factor of symptoms?

"5. Do dust counts show more than 10,000,000 particles per cubic foot, of size less than 10 microns, and containing at least 35% free silica? If a different percentage of silica was present, was there a proportionate number of particles?

"6. Are inhibiting agents present in the dust that will prevent silicosis, as carbon, coal, or clay?"

This court also has noted that the Industrial Accident Commission, by resolution, has adopted a list of "potentially harmful industrial dusts" entitled "Suggested Maximum Permissible Concentrations (Toxic Thresholds)" which parallels the excerpts above quoted, and is as follows:

"Substance	Unit of measurement	Limit
Dusts:	Million particles per cubic foot
*Silica (25-35% SiO ₂)	"	10
	(0.5 to 5.0 microns)
Silica (over 75% SiO ₂)	"	5
	(0.5 to 5.0 microns)

*Dust Count (million particles per cubic foot of air) multiplied by percentage of free silica (silicon dioxide), should be less than 5."

If evidence and investigation of three factors, i. e., duration, intensity and the true formula of the dust inhaled, are necessary, then the conclusion of respondent State Fund "that the existing rule in California is based upon sound principles of medicine" and is a fair and logical rule to follow, is without merit.

Although the apportionment of benefits by the respondent Commission, such as was the case herein, has been the policy of the Commission, yet this so-called rule has never been approved as such by the courts of this state.

To follow the Marsh case in relation to the limitation of actions is one thing, but to adopt the same rule without qualification as determinative of the question of apportionment of liability between successive employments without sufficient evidence upon which to predicate such a finding, is quite another.

We previously have pointed out that the Marsh case, decided purely upon the question of limitation of action, did not depart from the well-established principles of evidence but reiterated the necessity of proof of "unbroken causal connection between the injury and the employment * * * to show that the disease * * * was proximately" caused thereby. Likewise, the Blanchard case, relied upon by respondent State Fund, while it did approve the award therein, it did not, in our opinion, authorize the imposition of the burden of compensation of an employee injured by an occupational disease upon previous employers who, but for section 4663, would have had no liability, and such case also reiterated the elementary rule that an award must be "based on evidence."

There can be no argument with the statement of the respondent State Fund that silicosis is a disease "particularly favorable to apportionment", and so it is, but because that is true it does not follow that courts should go outside of a record and from pure speculation determine an issue wherein there is involved so many questions of a technical nature without the aid of any evidence whatsoever upon such questions.

It cannot be denied that silicosis is such a disease as to warrant special legislative consideration. Respondents, however, because of the peculiar characteristics of the disease, would have this court assume legislative powers and by judicial decision write into the law substantive changes in the well-established and time-tried rules of evidence and procedure. Such changes, if any, must come as the result of legislative action, not by the courts.

We conclude that the finding by the Commission that the decedent, while employed as a miner, sustained certain injuries (the disease of silicosis) arising out of and in the course of his employment as the result of exposure to silica dust in certain named mines from the date of his first employment as a miner in "1909 to and including February 21, 1924", is not supported by substantial evidence except as to the period from 1928 to February 1942, when he was employed by the Great Western and Aetna mines respectively. In fact the record of his employments prior thereto is barren either of any evidence of silica dust of the chemical consistency necessary to produce the disease or of any evidence of the disease of silicosis as such. Therefore, any apportionment of the death benefit among decedent's employers prior to his employment at the Great Western Mine in 1928 was without the jurisdiction of the Commission. If this were not true it otherwise might be held in all reasonableness that the first imperceptible infiltration of silica dust during early childhood could be likewise included.

[5] The same is true of years spent in industry which have passed without that effect upon the bodily health which constitutes a disease; these years are not to be counted in apportioning the burden which the law places upon industry. Where the line is to be drawn between a healthy condition and a diseased one is, of course, a problem of fact, often difficult to solve with definiteness. An employer, upon whom the facts and the law place responsibility for compensation for silicosis, who would escape a portion of the load on the theory that he alone is not responsible, necessarily has the burden of proving that other employers should share the responsibility. Moquin v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra.

[6] Where it is made to appear that an employment had brought about a case of silicosis which was aggravated by a subsequent employment, the burden of compensating the employee for the resulting disability is properly divided among the employers upon whom liability exists. This is not only supported by the Blanchard case, but also by Associated Ind. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 1932, 124 Cal.App. 378, 384, 12 P.2d 1075, where the Blanchard case was cited, and by Argonaut Mining Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra, where such an award was affirmed as a matter of course.

For the reasons herein stated the award is annulled, and the application is remanded for further proceeding in accord with the views herein expressed.

BENNETT v. ROBERTSON.

Civ. 14340.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

July 28, 1944.

1. Automobiles ⇨245(72)

Where pedestrian, who was struck while crossing street in dimmed-out zone by automobile which had only parking lights, either looked and did not see the lights of defendant's automobile, or saw lights but misjudged the speed and distance of automobile, whether pedestrian was negligent was for the jury.

2. Automobiles ⇨245(46, 59)

Where pedestrian while crossing street in dimmed-out zone was struck by automobile which traveled at a speed of 18 miles per hour, though it had only parking lights on, whether motorist was negligent with respect to speed, and whether accident was due to that negligence, was for the jury.

3. Automobiles ⇨245(40)

Proof of speed in excess of one of the prima facie limits set forth in Vehicle Code does not establish negligence of motorist as matter of law in automobile accident. Vehicle Code, § 511, St.1941, p. 2716; § 513, St.1935, p. 177.

4. Automobiles ⇨246(20)

Instruction that fact that injury to pedestrian, who was struck by automobile while crossing street, resulted because automobile was driven at speed greater than was reasonable or prudent, did not in itself show that driver was negligent was erroneous. Vehicle Code, § 511, St.1941, p. 2716; § 513, St.1935, p. 177.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1064(1)

Error in instruction, stating that fact that injury to pedestrian resulted because automobile was driven at a speed greater than was reasonable and prudent did not in itself show that driver was negligent, was not cured by concluding sentence which stated whether driver was negligent was to be determined from the surrounding circumstances, and, where appellate court could not say that instructions did not deter jury from finding that motorist was negligent because of speed, error was prejudicial. Vehicle Code, § 511, St.1941, p. 2716; § 513, St.1935, p. 177.

6. Automobiles ⇨246(22)

An instruction that, if proximate cause of injury to pedestrian by motorist was the lighting condition existing at scene of accident, jury should find the accident was unavoidable regardless of whether pedestrian was in crosswalk, was error, since jurors' attention should have been centered on whether the motorist exercised care not to injure others particularly the pedestrian and not on care exercised by motorist on his own behalf.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Clarence M. Hanson, Judge.

Action by Ben S. K. Bennett against William D. Robertson for injuries sustained when plaintiff was struck by an automobile driven by defendant. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Joel Terrell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Parker & Stanbury, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

The plaintiff and the front of defendant's automobile came together, about nine o'clock on a 1942 October evening, near the middle of a street which was in the dim-out zone along the ocean front. Neither party saw the other until the moment of impact, and the jury could, with reason, have found each guilty of negligence which was a proximate cause of the accident. Plaintiff does not appear to have been negligent, as a matter of law, however, so that erroneous instructions which placed plaintiff's cause in a bad light before the jury require the reversal of the judgment for the defendant.

[1] Plaintiff knew that the dim-out conditions prevailed. He walked rapidly across the street and into the path of defendant's car. Before he started across the street he looked for oncoming cars, so he stated, and as he progressed he looked again, but saw no car approaching. The record reads: "I saw headlights up the street but I saw no white lights." It does not matter whether, as plaintiff claims, for "headlights," there should appear "red lights," for it would appear either that plaintiff looked and did not see the lights of defendant's car, if, as defendant's witnesses stated, they were burning, or saw them and misjudged its speed and distance. In either event, whether the plaintiff was negligent was a question of fact for the jury. Watkins v. Nutting, 1941, 17 Cal.2d 490, 495, 110 P.2d 384; Sankor v. Humborg, 1941, 48 Cal.App. 2d 203, 204, 119 P.2d 431. We cannot with propriety say, therefore, that the jury returned a verdict for the defendant because of plaintiff's negligence.

[2-5] The defendant, according to his own testimony, was driving in the dimmed out zone, with only his parking lights to illumine objects in his path, yet was traveling eighteen miles per hour. As he failed to see the plaintiff until a "second" before he struck him, the jury might well have concluded that the defendant was guilty of negligence in driving at the speed at which he drove, and that the accident was due to that negligence. But the court advised the jury: "The basis speed law of this State reads as follows: 'No person shall drive a vehicle upon a highway at a speed greater than is reasonable or prudent having due regard for the traffic on, and the surface and width of the highway, and in no event at a speed which endangers the safety of persons or property.' The fact, if it be a fact, that the injury to the plaintiff resulted because the car was driven at a speed greater than was reasonable or prudent does not in and of itself show that the driver was guilty of negligence. Whether he was or was not guilty of negligence is to be determined from the surrounding circumstances of which the speed at which he traveled is one of such circumstances." This instruction contains an incorrect statement of the law. Proof of speed in excess of one of the prima facie limits set forth in section 511 of the Vehicle Code, St.1941, p. 2716, does not establish negligence as a matter of law (section 513, Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 177) but to state that driving a motor vehicle "at a speed greater than was reasonable or prudent" is not negligence, is to rob "negligence" of much of its meaning. The concluding sentence, by creating a further conflict of ideas, did not cure the confusion. We cannot say that this instruction did not deter the jury from finding that the defendant was negligent because of the speed at which he drove. The error in its giving must be characterized, therefore, as prejudicial.

[6] The following instruction is also an incorrect statement: "You are instructed that if you find from the evidence that both the plaintiff Mr. Bennett and the defendant Mr. Robertson were exercising ordinary care in their own behalves at the time and place of the accident involved herein, and that the proximate cause of the said accident was the lighting condition and poor visibility existing at the scene of the accident, then you should find that the said accident was unavoidable, and under these circumstances your verdict must be in favor of the defendant Mr. Robertson herein, regardless of whether the plaintiff was in the cross walk or not." In considering whether or not the defendant exercised ordinary care, the jurors' attention should have been centered on whether he exercised care not to injure others, particularly the plaintiff, not on the care exercised by the defendant on his own behalf.

The defendant complains of other matters, but we feel it unnecessary to discuss them.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

Judgment ¶472

Since there can be no direct appeal to the District Court of Appeal from the appellate department of the superior court, its judgment being final and conclusive upon all civil matters within its jurisdiction, a collateral attack upon its judgment rendered three years previously cannot be considered. Const. art. 6, § 5.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. Turney Fox and Clarence L. Kincaid, Judges.

Action by Mildred Lucey against the Municipal Court of the City of Los Angeles and Honorable Lucius P. Green, Judge of Division 14 thereof, for a writ of mandate commanding the Municipal Court to dismiss an action brought by one Joseph F. Malatesta for failure to bring the action to trial, wherein Joseph F. Malatesta filed pétition in intervention as against plaintiff, and "Lucey's", a partnership, and United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Both petitions were dismissed, and Joseph F. Malatesta appeals.

Affirmed.

Ray Howard, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Martin S. Ryan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

On August 5, 1936, one Joseph F. Malatesta filed his action in the Municipal Court of Los Angeles against Mildred Lucey and Antonio Lucey individually and against "Lucey's," a copartnership consisting of Mildred and Antonio Lucey, John Doe and Richard Roe. Mildred and Antonio duly filed their answer. However, the summons was returned showing proof of service on "Lucey's" by serving Mildred Lucey, a member thereof. Inasmuch as the numerous proceedings and appeals of the case prior to January 20, 1938, are not of importance to this discussion, we omit that portion of the narrative with reference to them.

On January 20, 1938, without notice the complaint was amended by substituting the name of Barbara Wallace in lieu of John Doe. The action was then dismissed as against all individual defendants. No service of the amended complaint was made, but on the same day judgment was entered against the firm. Upon appeal to the superior court, February 11, 1938, appellate department, the judgment was reversed on the ground that the amendment was one of substance and therefore opened the default of "Lucey's." Following an unsuccessful attempt to have the municipal court dismiss the action for failure to bring it to trial within three years after filing the remittitur (on July 30, 1938) under Section 583, Code Civil Procedure, on June 12, 1941, Malatesta filed his notice of motion to set the case for trial along with his notice of motion to amend by substituting Barbara Wallace as the partner of Mildred in Lucey's. The motion was heard on June 16 and the case was set for June 25. When the case was called on the latter date the copartnership, being the sole defendant, suggested that the case was not at issue since the default against Lucey's had been opened and set aside by the reversal and the complaint had not been properly amended to include Barbara. The continuance was denied, whereupon Malatesta introduced in evidence a photostatic copy of Lucey's application for a liquor permit, which document showed that Lucey's consisted of Mildred Lucey and Barbara Wallace. The case then went off the calendar, whereupon plaintiff filed his amended complaint alleging that Lucey's consisted of Mildred Lucey and Barbara Wallace. Its demurrer having been overruled, Lucey's filed its answer August 14, 1941. In the following February it filed its second notice of motion to dismiss the action for failure to bring it to trial within three years after the filing of the remittitur in the municipal court. The motion was again on March 2, 1942, denied without prejudice on condition that the cause be set for trial within 14 days. On Malatesta's request filed March 10, it was set for trial on April 2.

Alleging the foregoing recitals Mildred filed her petition in the Superior Court whereby she sought a writ of mandate, commanding the municipal court to dismiss the action by reason of Malatesta's failure to bring the action to trial within the three years following the filing of the remittitur. Malatesta promptly filed his petition in intervention wherein he alleges (1) that at the time of taking its appeal of February, 1938, Lucey's filed an undertaking on appeal with the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as surety; (2) that the judgment was not reversed by the appellate department for the reasons that (a) it was without jurisdiction under Section 4½ of Article VI and Section 22, Article I of the Constitution; (b) the appeal was taken on the judgment roll alone; (c) the reversal purports to have been based upon error in pleading and procedure only and not after an examination of the entire cause and could not have been founded upon a conclusion that any error complained of had resulted in a miscarriage of justice and the appellate department could not have determined whether the evidence showed the amendment to be necessary or whether the amendment in the presence of counsel for Lucey's or their appearance after judgment and before amendment constituted due notice of application to amend or dispense with the necessity for the amendment; (d) the facts assumed by the appellate department were not true but the true facts were such as justified the trial judge in rendering the judgment against Lucey's, in favor of Malatesta. He then recites the story of the proceedings prior to the judgment; his proof of the copartnership; the amendment to conform to the evidence; the continuance at the request of Lucey's; his attempt to reset the case while reserving his objection to the validity of the reversal; his motion for judgment against the surety on the stay bond on the ground that the reversal of the judgment was void; the only party that could move to dismiss the action is Lucey's, the sole defendant. The petitions came on for hearing before Department 22, Superior Court, and after submission both were by order duly entered dismissed.

Appellant makes neither assignments of error nor sets forth in his brief each point separately under an appropriate heading, or any heading descriptive of the subject matter. Rule XV, Rules on Appeal. His only headings are "General Statement of the Case," "Facts," "Legal Principles," "Appellate Departments' Ruling Not Final." However, we have carefully explored the record and appellant's lonely brief in order to ascertain the merit of the contentions alleged in his petition. His demand that we declare the reversal of his judgment by the appellate department is supported by no authority or citation of legal principle within our knowledge. There is no such thing as an appeal from that court. Its judgments are final and conclusive upon all civil matters coming within their cognizance. Article VI, Section 5, Constitution. Since there can be no direct appeal from that court, collateral attack upon its judgment of three years ago cannot be seriously considered. A disappointed litigant cannot enter the back door of an appellate court if admittance be denied him at the front. If the appellate department committed error in reversing the judgment of January, 1938, it did so in the proper exercise of its jurisdiction and constitutional power. It is trite to say that the validity of a judgment is not to be determined by its freedom from error. The appellate department received the appeal of Lucey's from the municipal court, both parties were represented and, unfortunate for Malatesta, his judgment was reversed upon a legal opinion derived from the record and arguments. A discussion of the virtues of that opinion would take us beyond the confines of propriety.

Order affirmed.

Robbery ⇨27(1)

Where evidence in robbery prosecution showed two different fights between defendant and prosecuting witness, in the second of which defendant took knife from witness, instruction that defendant would not be guilty if he took knife only to disarm witness was properly refused as confusing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Hon. Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Roscoe Long and Lovell Barclay were convicted of robbery in the second degree, and defendant Long appeals.

Affirmed.

Willard W. Shea, Public Defender, Alameda County, Cal., of Oakland, for appellants.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., State of California, and David K. Lener, Deputy Atty. Gen., State of California, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

The district attorney filed an information charging the defendants Roscoe Long and Lovell Barclay with the crime of robbery. Separately they entered pleas of not guilty. They were tried together. Both were found guilty of robbery in the second degree, each made a motion for a new trial, the motions were denied, and the defendant Long has appealed.

The facts as stated by the attorney general are as follows. Jacob Gensburg, an employee of the Moore Shipyard, resides at 715 Myrtle Street, between 7th and 8th Streets, in Oakland, California. On the night of June 4, 1943, about 10:05 p.m., he left his place of abode and visited a bar on the northwest corner of 7th and Market Streets in said city, where he ordered and consumed a bottle of beer. Both defendants, whom he knew by sight, were at said bar at the time. He left the bar for his room about 11:20 p.m. and walked west on 7th Street to Myrtle. While walking down 7th Street he looked behind him and observed the defendants walking in his direction, apparently following him. Arriving at the northeast corner of Myrtle and 7th Streets, he crossed over Myrtle diagonally in a northwesterly direction in line with the place where he lived. As he approached the curb of the sidewalk in front of said place, the defendants set upon him, threw him to the pavement and took from him by force and violence a wallet containing $10, a red-handled pocket knife, and other articles of personal property, the latter of which were not made a part of the charge. The defendants upon securing said personal property broke away from the complaining witness who had clung to the jacket of the defendant Long, tearing or ripping it. Upon breaking away from the complaining witness the defendants ran up Myrtle Street in a northerly direction towards 8th Street, the defendant Long in the lead. The defendant Barclay disappeared within the block, which was later found to be 731½ Myrtle Street, and the defendant Long continued his flight to 8th Street, where he turned to his left down 8th Street to Filbert, and down Filbert to 7th, and then in an easterly direction to 7th Street, back to the corner of 7th and Myrtle, where he was apprehended by the police and placed under arrest, as was the complaining witness, the latter for intoxication.

Gene Viola, the owner of a liquor store at the northwest corner of Myrtle and 7th Street, had returned to his store about 11:30 p.m. of said night to get his car, which had been parked in front of his store on Myrtle facing 8th Street earlier in the evening; he had just returned from a wrestling match he had witnessed. He had stopped at the drugstore on the northeast corner of 7th and Myrtle, purchased a newspaper, and crossed the street corner to his car, which he entered. Upon switching his lights on he observed the defendant Long and the complaining witness, who appeared to be fighting or wrestling. He called to them and inquired "What is going on here?" When the defendant Long replied, "This guy is trying to rob me." The complaining witness spoke up and said, "You stole my wallet and my keys." The witness then testified that Long broke loose and ran up Myrtle Street from 7th to 8th, west on 8th, south on Filbert and east on 7th, back to the northwest corner of 7th and Myrtle. Viola, riding in his car, followed him around the block. When Viola returned to 7th and Myrtle, several officers were at the scene of the robbery talking to the complaining witness. Viola pointed to the defendant Long and said to the officers, "Here is the man you are looking for." The police officers then took appellant Long into custody. They searched him and found on his person a razor and the knife with the red handle, the property of the complaining witness. Viola did not recall seeing Barclay.

Alford, an officer in the Oakland Police Department, was on special duty that night with Officer Lilienthal. They cruised about the district in a police car and came upon the scene. They heard the complaining witness shout he was robbed and wanted to go to his room. The defendant Long had returned to 7th and Myrtle and was walking at a fast pace east on the north side of 7th Street just east of the northerly curb of Myrtle, when Viola returned after following the defendant about the block and directed the attention of the officers to Long as one of the holdup men. Long crossed the street, practically running, when the officers placed him in custody and took from his person the razor and the red-handled knife, which Long resisted. Long was acting in a very high state, he refused to meet the demands and requests of the officers. He tried to pull away from them and refused to answer their questions. His eyes were rolling. He had the appearance of a man intoxicated, although there was no odor of liquor upon his breath to any extent. He appeared to be under the influence of drugs. Gensburg was bleeding on the left side of the face, around the ear, and from lacerated lips received by him when thrown against a tree by Long. When he saw the knife the officers took from Long he claimed it as his property and demanded of him the return of his money and keys in the presence of said officers, to which Long made no answer. Long was taken to the City Hall, where he gave his address as Room 4, Sather Hotel, which proved to be the room of a white man and which Long had shared with him for several weeks without the knowledge of the hotel management. The Sather Hotel is situated at 918 7th Street. Long was taken from the City Hall to the Sather Hotel by the officers and on the way to the hotel he told the officers he and "Frisco" (Barclay) robbed Gensburg and after the robbery ran up Myrtle Street to 8th, Barclay to the place where he lived at 731½ Myrtle within the block, Long around the block, as indicated. From the Sather Hotel the officers took Long to Barclay's basement apartment at the address indicated, after midnight, between 1 a.m. and 2 a.m., where they found a young lady by the name of Eula Thompson with him. Long's testimony was similar to that of Alford.

The defendant also states the facts. In his statement he claims that Jacob Gensburg accused him of having possession of his keys and wallet and proceeded to tussle with him. That in the tussle Gensburg drew out his knife and the defendant in the struggle got possession of it and retained it to protect himself. In other words the prosecution claimed the defendants assaulted Gensburg, whereas the defendant Long claimed that Gensburg assaulted him.

In instructing the jury the trial court gave no instruction regarding an assault. The defendant requested an instruction as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that the witness Gensburg attempted to strike the defendant Long with a knife and that the defendant Long took the knife and nothing more, without any intention of stealing it, but only for the purpose of disarming Gensburg, then he would not be guilty of robbery." People v. Sheasbey, 82 Cal.App. 459, 463, 255 P. 836. The trial court refused to give it. The defendant claims that refusal was error. We think not. The record discloses there were two different fights. The first was disclosed by the testimony of the complaining witness Gensburg who testified that Long and Barclay overtook, assaulted him, and robbed him. After that act was completed Gensburg testified that as he got up he grabbed and tussled with the defendant Long. That was the second assault. It was in that second assault that the defendant claimed he took from Gensburg the knife and did so to protect himself from being injured. The requested instruction, if given, would have applied to the second assault only, and would have directed the jury to find that no robbery had been committed. The proposed instruction was confusing and the trial court did not err in refusing to give it. People v. Driscoll, 53 Cal.App.2d 590, 128 P.2d 382.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Insurance ⚡587

Failure of divorced husband to exercise his power to change beneficiary of life policy payable to wife established intent to have insurance money paid to wife, and her right to proceeds was not barred by provision in property settlement agreement that husband could change beneficiary and that wife transferred all interest in policy to husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Myron Westover, Judge.

Action by Clara Grimm against Walter E. Grimm and another, as administrators of the estate of Lewis Grimm, also known as Lewis L. Grimm, deceased, and the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, for declaratory relief concerning rights to proceeds of insurance policy. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant administrators appeal.

Affirmed.

John J. Craig and Rush M. Blodget, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Stephen Monteleone, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DRAPEAU, Justice pro tem.

Husband and wife entered into a property settlement agreement, vesting portions of the community property in each as his sole and separate property. Among the community assets was an insurance policy for $5,000 in favor of the wife, with the right in the husband to change the beneficiary. The following clause with reference to the insurance policy appears in the property agreement: "Said first party shall have the right to change the beneficiary of the life insurance policy, described in Article VIII of Exhibit A, and second party agrees to execute upon request any instrument necessary or convenient to accomplish such change, and second party hereby transfers, releases and relinquishes to first party all interest in and to said policy of insurance and the premiums paid thereunder and the avails thereof."

After the parties were divorced the husband died, without having changed the beneficiary.

In this action the personal representatives of the decedent contend that the property agreement by its terms conveyed to the husband all of the right, title and interest of the wife in and to the insurance policy, and therefore the avails thereof should be paid to them.

The trial court found that the failure of the decedent to exercise his power to change the beneficiary established that it was his intent to have the insurance money paid to his former wife, and that the property agreement alone did not go so far as to bar her right to take the proceeds of the policy.

This view finds support in the following cases: Cook v. Cook, 17 Cal.2d 639, 111 P.2d 322, holding that upon death an insurance beneficiary's right becomes vested, no change having been made by the insured prior to death; Sandrosky v. Prudential Ins. Co., 217 Cal. 578, 20 P.2d 325, holding that there may be drawn from a property agreement and subsequent conduct of the parties an inference that the husband intended that the wife should take under the policy at his death; and Mayfield v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 16 Cal.App.2d 611, 61 P.2d 83, and Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Franck, 9 Cal.App.2d 528, 50 P.2d 480, holding that a wife's right to take as beneficiary under a life insurance policy is an expectancy.

Appellants contend that Sullivan v. Union Oil Co., 16 Cal.2d 229, 105 P.2d 922, requires a reversal of the judgment.

The facts in the Sullivan case and in this case are not the same. In that case the property agreement applied to all of the property of the spouses without exception, which obviously included a provident fund set up by the husband's employer. In this case the deceased husband reserved a power to change the beneficiary, and the wife covenanted and agreed that that might be done. But the power was not exercised and the policy was left without change of beneficiary until the death of the insured. Under these circumstances, the beneficiary is entitled to the proceeds of the policy.

The facts in the pending case bring it more nearly within the rule in Jenkins v. Jenkins, 112 Cal.App. 402, 297 P. 56, where in it was held that the proceeds of an insurance policy went to the beneficiary because the property agreement in question excluded the policy.

Judgment affirmed.

On petition for rehearing.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Prior opinion, 149 P.2d 46.

Rae B. Carter and Edmond A. Chevalier, both of Fresno, for plaintiff and appellant.

Crider, Runkle & Tilson, of Los Angeles, for defendant and appellant.

Chester O. Hansen, of Fresno, for defendant and respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff has filed a petition for rehearing in which she cites numerous cases not called to our attention before. She maintains they support her argument that the inference may be drawn that Norsigian was the agent of Pacific Finance Corporation under the proven facts of the case. She argues that these cases support the rule that the inference of agency may be drawn from possession of the car by Norsigian with the consent of the owner, without any showing that he was an employee or belonged to the family group of the owner.

She cites Montanya v. Brown, 31 Cal. App.2d 642, 88 P.2d 745. In that case the owner consented that his wife, who could not drive, could use the car and that it could be driven by her sister. The trial court rendered judgment against the owner for $35,000 on the theory of agency. The judgment was reduced to the $5000 permitted under section 402 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 153, against an owner where permissive use is established. The family group theory was not considered on appeal although it might have been applicable under the facts of that case, as it might have been held that the car was under the control of the wife although actually operated by her sister, had that question been raised. See Souza v. Corti, 22 Cal. 2d 454, 139 P.2d 645, 147 A.L.R. 861.

Plaintiff relies on the case of Malmstrom v. Bridges, 8 Cal.App.2d 5, 47 P.2d 336. That case turned on the question of employment and subagency which the appellate court held was established by the evidence, and not on agency inferred from permissive use.

Our attention is directed to the case of Fahey v. Madden, 56 Cal.App. 593, 206 P. 128, 130. The defendant Madden was the owner of an automobile which one Boen was driving with his consent at the time of the accident. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff and the trial court granted Madden's motion for new trial. This order was affirmed on appeal on the ground that the jury was erroneously instructed, as follows: "It is admitted by the pleadings that the defendant Madden was the owner of the automobile at the time of the accident and that the defendant Boen was driving the automobile at the time of the accident with the permission, consent and approval of the defendant Madden. This is prima facie proof that the driver was engaged in the owner's service and a presumption arises that the automobile was in use for the owner's benefit. Testimony that the automobile was loaned to Boen does not, as a matter of law, destroy the presumption unless from the evidence you find that it was loaned as claimed by the defense. If you should find that the said automobile was not loaned to said Boen as claimed by the defense, and if you also find that the injury to Fahey was the result of the negligent operation of the automobile your verdict must be for the plaintiff, and against defendants Madden and Boen unless you further find that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence."

This instruction was held to be erroneous and sufficiently prejudicial to support the order granting the motion for new trial.

Dierks v. Newsom, 49 Cal.App. 789, 194 P. 518, 520, involved a judgment for damages caused by an automobile being driven by one Gregory and owned by the defendant Newsom. The evidence justified the conclusion by the trier of fact, as stated in the last paragraph of the opinion, "that Gregory was authorized by the appellant to take the car for the purpose of having it repaired, its judgment holding the appellant responsible for Gregory's negligence in performing his mission must be affirmed, and it is so ordered." This evidence certainly indicated something more than permissive use and justified the holding of an agency for a special purpose.

In McWhirter v. Fuller, 35 Cal.App. 288, 170 P. 417, the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant who was the owner of an automobile which was being operated by his wife with his express permission and consent. Under the facts before the court it was held that a prima facie case of agency of the wife was established which is in accordance with the rule followed in many jurisdictions where the family group rule is applied.

We fail to understand why plaintiff has cited the case of Hathaway v. Mathews, 85 Cal.App. 31, 258 P. 712. It is true that the opinion contains a general statement that the fact of ownership alone establishes a prima facie case against the owner for the reason that the "presumption" arises that the driver is an agent of the owner. From any point of view this is not a technically correct statement of the law as, among other things, it omits the question of permission. Miss Grant was the owner of the car which she had loaned to Neal Mathews for a trip to Venice. On this journey Mathews took Miss Grant to her place of employment and the accident happened while Miss Grant was in the car going to that destination. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of Miss Grant and against Mathews. This judgment was affirmed on appeal because of the facts found. Had judgment gone against Miss Grant it might have been affirmed on appeal under the rules announced in Bosse v. Marye, 80 Cal.App. 109, 250 P. 693, and Souza v. Corti, supra. The accident occurred before the adoption of section 1717¼ of the Civil Code which was superseded by section 402 of the Vehicle Code. This is true of the other cases considered here where the accident happened prior to August 14, 1929. (Stats. 1929, p. 565, Civil Code, § 1714½.)

The case of Perry v. A. Paladini, Inc., 89 Cal.App. 275, 264 P. 580, 583, contains statements to the effect that proof of ownership and possession is sufficient to establish a prima facie case of agency. The first question decided was the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that A. Paladini, Inc., was the owner of the truck at the time of the accident. The trial court so found and the appellate court was of the opinion that the evidence was amply sufficient to support such a finding. The question of the agency of Raymond Zanetta, the driver, was considered at length. A. Paladini, Inc., was engaged in the wholesale distribution of fresh fish and had places of business in Monterey and San Francisco and transported fresh fish by truck from Monterey to San Francisco. Raymond Zanetta had been employed by A. Paladini, Inc., for ten months preceding the accident and was so employed by it at the time of trial. The appellate court made the following comment on this evidence: "Summarizing the evidence of plaintiff, we have these facts: The truck of appellant, engaged in a business similar to that of the appellant, at a place where the appellant would usually be engaged in the conduct of his business, and being operated by one who previous to the accident and subsequent thereto was in the employ of appellant. It will thus be noted that plaintiff went much beyond the establishing of a prima facie case resting upon mere ownership."

Certainly such evidence was sufficient to support a finding of agency without relying on any inference.

Ransford v. Ainsworth, 196 Cal. 279, 237 P. 747, is the last case cited by plaintiff in support of her contention that permissive possession and use of an automobile raises the inference of agency without the further proof that the operator is an employee or a member of the family group of the owner or is operating the car for or under the control of a member of such family group. In this case the operator was the husband of the owner which places the case within the family group class.

[1,2] In practically all of the cited cases there are statements to the effect that the inference of agency arises from the fact of possession and permissive use. Those statements were by way of argument under the facts before the court. The weight to be given them must be measured by those facts and the ultimate action taken on the case. Isolated statements and paragraphs may not be lifted from an opinion and regarded as abstract and correct statements of the law. They must be considered in connection with the factual situation the author of the opinion is discussing. They are modified by such factual situation. This is illustrated in the instant case where we have referred to the family group rule without attempting any exact definition of it. Thus the cases relied upon by plaintiff do not establish the rule that mere permissive use of an automobile raises the inference of agency. They do not cause us to change our views that, in addition to permissive use the plaintiff must also prove either employment of the operator by the owner, or that the operator was a member of the family group of the owner, or was operating the car under the control of or for a member of the family group of the owner in order to justify the inference of agency.

Plaintiff argues that the family group theory has been rejected in California, citing Perry v. Simeone, 197 Cal. 132, 239 P. 1056; Idemoto v. Scheidecker, 193 Cal. 653, 226 P. 922; Spence v. Fisher, 184 Cal. 209, 193 P. 255, 14 A.L.R. 1083; Ormston v. Lane, 90 Cal.App. 481, 266 P. 304; Grillich v. Weinshenk, 64 Cal.App. 474, 222 P. 160, and Sanfilippo v. Lesser, 59 Cal.App. 86, 210 P. 44. Speaking very generally, those cases are based on the old and well-established rule that in the absence of statute a parent is not liable for the torts of a child. The distinction between those cases, and others which we classify as falling within the family group class, is pointed out in Sanfilippo v. Lesser, supra.

[3] Prior to the adoption of section 1717 $\frac{1}{4}$ of the Civil Code, now section 402 of the Vehicle Code, St.1937, p. 2353, no right of action existed against the owner of a vehicle simply because he had given another permission to operate it. Such right of action is clearly a creature of statute which limits the recovery against the owner to five or ten thousand dollars, depending on circumstances, and also depending on the further condition that the right of action does not arise "through the relationship of principal and agent or master and servant." If the mere possession and permissive use of an automobile made the owner liable for the negligence of the operator under the doctrine of respondeat superior, then subdivision "b" of section 402 of the Vehicle Code is entirely meaningless and there would be no limitation on the amount that an injured plaintiff could recover against such owner. To so hold would be the worst kind of judicial legislation and would nullify a clear and unambiguous enactment of the legislature. This court cannot legislate and it does not propose to do so. We adhere to the views formerly expressed.

from which it appears that certain real property in the city of Upland was assessed to J. Julius Gartner for the year 1936; that the taxes for that year were not paid; that Gartner died in 1937 and this property was distributed by the Los Angeles Superior Court to Henry A. Gartner, who sold the property under contract to James and Allie Harrison, who have been in possession since 1937; that on August 3, 1942, the property was deeded to the state for nonpayment of the 1936 taxes; that the plaintiffs first discovered that said taxes had not been paid in November, 1942, after the deed to the state was recorded; that the plaintiffs immediately thereafter made application to the defendant auditor for an "estimate of redemption" and offered to pay said taxes with all penalties and interest to the defendants auditor and treasurer; that these officers, on advice of counsel, refused to give an estimate of redemption or to permit redemption to be made on the ground that the provisions of sections 3476 and 3511.3 of the Revenue and Taxation Code, St.1939, p. 1325, St.1941, p. 1425, precluded them from permitting said property to be redeemed; that ever since said time the plaintiffs have stood ready and have repeatedly offered to pay all delinquent taxes with all penalties and interest; that since November 15, 1942, the plaintiffs have paid rental on the property to the state and the rent paid now nearly equals the amount of taxes, interest and penalties that would be due if redemption had been made; that on October 8, 1943, the plaintiffs filed a petition for a writ of mandate and secured an alternative writ requiring the defendants auditor and treasurer to show cause why they had not made an estimate and permitted redemption to be made; that at the hearing of said matter it was stipulated that the above facts were admitted, that there was no question of fact to be determined, and that the only issue to be decided was the question of law as to whether or not the plaintiffs had a right to redeem said property; that the judge held and found that Chapter 932, page 2804, Statutes of 1943, cannot be applied retroactively for the purpose of allowing a redemption of property deeded to the state for taxes between June 1, 1942, and August 4, 1943, and that during that period section 3511.3 of the Revenue and Taxation Code was in full force and effect; and that the court thereupon made and entered an order quashing the alternative writ and denying the petition for a peremptory writ of mandate. From that order the plaintiffs have appealed.

So far as material here, section 3511.3 of the Revenue and Taxation Code provides: "On or after June 1, 1942, and prior to January 1, 1947, on execution of the deed to the State, the right of redemption is terminated as to all property * * *." That section was adopted in 1941. Stats. 1941, p. 1425. In 1943, an act was passed (Stats. 1943, Ch. 932) which provides, in part, as follows: "Sec. 2. The operation of Sections 3511.3 (and ten other sections) of the Revenue and Taxation Code shall be postponed and suspended until June 1, 1945." The controversy here is as to the meaning and effect of that provision, which became effective on August 4, 1943. For convenience, these two statutes will be referred to as section 3511.3 and Chapter 932.

The appellants contend that it was the express and implied intent and purpose of the legislature, in adopting Chapter 932, to suspend the bar to redemption theretofore imposed by section 3511.3 and to permit the redemption of all property deeded to the state for taxes, and not sold by the state, at any time up to June 1, 1945.

On behalf of the respondents the county counsel argue that section 3511.3 "is in all probability constitutional" since it affects the termination of the right of redemption as to property deeded to the state on and after June 1, 1942, and since another statute passed in 1941, affecting the same right with respect to property deeded prior to June 1, 1942, was upheld in the case of Mercury Herald Co. v. Moore, 22 Cal.2d 269, 138 P.2d 673, 147 A.L.R. 1111; that Chapter 932 contains no provision for its retroactive application; and that section 3511.3 instantly and finally terminated any right of redemption with respect to this property when it was deeded to the state on August 3, 1942. County counsel frankly and honestly admit that their interpretation of the meaning and effect of Chapter 932 would result in an unjust discrimination between those whose property was deeded to the state between June 1, 1942 and August 4, 1943, and those whose property was deeded to the state before or after that period, and say: "Such discrimination is no doubt due to legislative inadvertence, and this result probably was not foreseen by the legislature. While the effect on taxpayers seems harsh we see no legal means of escaping it."

The attorney general has filed a brief on behalf of the state in which it is contended that the right of redemption as to this property was terminated when it was deeded to the state on August 3, 1942; that Chapter 932 could not revive this right of redemption unless it is held to be retroactive in effect; that Chapter 932 contains no language indicating any intent that it should be retroactive in effect; that Chapter 932 should be construed "prospectively" because to give it a retroactive effect would raise a serious doubt as to its constitutionality; and that since Chapter 362, p. 1598, also adopted in 1943, sets forth that its purpose is to avoid any conflict between the laws of this state and the federal Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act of 1940, as amended, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 501 et seq., it must be assumed that the sole purpose of adopting Chapter 932 was the same. And that it was no part of that purpose to get property back on the assessment rolls or to enable people, whose financial status had been improved by wartime conditions, to redeem their property.

It may first be observed that the purpose expressed in Chapter 362 would seem to have been accomplished by that enactment. Chapter 932 must have been adopted for a different purpose. If it be assumed that any part of its purpose was to avoid a conflict with federal laws with respect to property deeded to the state in 1942, this is an additional indication that it was intended to have a retroactive effect.

[1] In the act adopting Section 3511.3 the legislature declared a policy of using the revenues derived from tax deeded property "for the primary purpose of restoring tax-deeded property to the rolls", and in another section provided that the act should take immediate effect in order to carry out the purpose of encouraging and securing the early return of tax deeded property to the tax rolls. In Mercury Herald Co. v. Moore, 22 Cal.2d 269, 138 P.2d 673, 147 A.L.R. 1111, the court pointed out that other provisions for the termination of the right of redemption, adopted in 1941, were a part of an integral plan to rehabilitate tax deeded property and to expedite the restoration of such property to the tax rolls. We think that Chapter 932 was adopted as a part of the same plan and for the same general purpose.

There is no merit in the suggestion that Chapter 932 might be unconstitutional if intended to have any retroactive effect. The state would not be giving away property but would be merely restoring a right which all delinquent taxpayers originally possessed and which had been temporarily withdrawn from a part of them.

These considerations may have, in part, led to the adoption of Chapter 932, along with the well-known change in economic conditions making possible and more probable an early restoration to the assessment rolls of large numbers of parcels of tax deeded property. In any event, the language used in Chapter 932 is controlling and we cannot agree that it contains no indication of any intent that it be retroactive, in the sense of applying to or affecting deeds issued to the state during the time section 3511.3 had been effective. Had there been no such intention, it would have been a simple thing, and the natural thing, to have merely provided that section 3511.3 should not be applicable to sales made to the state in the future and before June 1, 1945. Instead of thus limiting its effect to future sales to the state Chapter 932 makes the broad provision that the "operation" of section 3511.3 shall be "postponed and suspended" until the date named. The fact that the word "suspended" was also used indicates that something more than "postponed" was intended. The word "postpone" carries with it the idea of putting off the doing of something or the taking effect of something, until a future time, while the word "suspend" has also the idea of holding up or delaying an effect which has already been operative. As the attorney general well says: "Certainly, in every day usage 'postpone' means to defer until later something which has not yet occurred. 'Suspend', on the other hand, indicates that something is already in operation which is to be stopped for a time." Not only is this the plain meaning of the words thus used, but this is emphasized and the intent of the legislature further disclosed by another word which is used. The thing that is postponed and suspended is not merely section 3511.3, as an existing statute, but it is the "operation" of that statute. This clearly implies that the entire operation of the statute is both postponed and suspended, its past operation as well as its future operation. As defined by Webster, "operation" means the act, process or effect of operating; a deed; efficacy, virtue, potency; an act done as a part of a plan; a transaction; a product or work; a definite passage from one form to another. As commonly used in connection with a statute it means the effect of the statute. A part of the "operation" of section 3511.3 was to shut off the right of redemption in cases coming within its terms. Deeds to the state during 1942 did not, in themselves, terminate the right of redemption. This was done by the operation of this statute. In a very real sense the "operation" of a statute means its effect and what it has done, as well as what it may do in the future. In view of this language of Chapter 932 a clear intention appears not only to postpone but to suspend both the past and future operation of section 3511.3 for the period named. Under the language used, the entire operation of section 3511.3 is suspended. A part of that operation was the termination of the right of redemption on the property with which we are here concerned. That operation being suspended, the plaintiffs had a right of redemption at the time here in question.

Aside from the plain meaning of the language used in Chapter 932, and the clear implication from the manner and circumstances in which it was used, it would be unreasonable to assume that the legislature could have intended, while granting relief to taxpayers whose lands had been deeded to the state and had not yet been sold by the state, to have so provided that those taxpayers whose lands were deeded after August 4, 1943, the effective date of Chapter 932, should have the same right of redemption that was still had and enjoyed by taxpayers whose lands had been deeded to the state over many years and up to June 1, 1942; and that those taxpayers whose lands were deeded to the state during this period of a little more than a year should be in a different class and should lose the rights and privileges enjoyed by all of the others. No reason appears, in justice or in law, for such a distinction and discrimination and we cannot believe that it was intended by the legislature. In suspending the operation of section 3511.3, Chapter 932 suspended its entire operation and effect and provided that it should be ineffective for any purpose until June 1, 1945.

[2] We cannot believe that the main purpose of the legislature was to get and keep for the state the increased value, brought about by improved economic conditions, of lands deeded to the state during the depression years. From the statute in question, and from much other legislation about the same time, it must be assumed that the main purpose was to collect what is justly due to the state by encouraging the redemption of property sold for taxes, and at the same time to get as much of such property as possible back on the assessment rolls. This has long been a recognized principle in connection with such taxation, where the doctrine of in invitum has long been applied, and if this is to be changed to a new system designed to enable the state to obtain and retain the full value of property, rather than a reasonable tax thereon, this should be accomplished through a clear, express and distinct pronouncement by the legislature and not by judicial interpretation. In the meantime, the courts should not go beyond the express or clearly implied intention of legislative acts, and thus give them the effect of taking away, for a small fraction of their value, the homes and property of people who are now able and willing to pay the full amount of their taxes and penalties.

The order appealed from is reversed with directions to the trial court to grant the peremptory writ prayed for.

Proceedings in the matter of the estate of Nancy Ray Lair, deceased, between A. W. Brunton, individually and as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of John W. Lair, deceased, trustee of a testamentary trust, and John W. Shnell and others. From a judgment and decree settling the final account of the trustee and apportioning and distributing the assets, John W. Shnell and others appeal. On respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal.

Motion denied.

Charles W. Cradick, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. W. Brunton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

This is a motion by respondent to dismiss the appeal herein upon the ground that the notice of appeal was not filed within the time provided by law. The appeal is from a "judgment and decree" settling the final account of a trustee of a testamentary trust after termination of the trust, allowing fees for "services as attorney and as administrator," and apportioning and distributing the assets of the testamentary trust.

The decree was signed by the judge, and was filed June 3, 1943. It was entered June 8, 1943. The notice of appeal was filed August 5, 1943.

Respondent contends that the appeal was not taken within 60 days from the date of entry of the decree at length in the minutes. He asserts that the date of such entry was June 3, 1943, the date the signed decree was filed; and that the filing of the signed decree was equivalent to an entry at length in the minute book of the court. In support of said assertion he relies upon the Estate of Hanley, 1943, 23 Cal.2d 120, on page 122, 142 P.2d 423, on page 424, particularly the statement therein that, "The filing of a signed decree is equivalent to entry 'at length in the minute-book of the court.' Prob.Code, sec. 1221." He also relies upon the Estate of Tierney, 1944, 63 Cal.App.2d 295, at page 301, 146 P.2d 700, at page 703, wherein that statement was quoted.

The appellants contend that the 60 days' period within which the appeal could have been taken should be computed from the date of the entry of the decree on June 8, 1943, and that the notice of appeal, having been filed on August 5, 1943, was therefore within the proper time. They argue in support of said contention that the signing and filing of a decree of distribution was not equivalent to an entry at length in the minute book for the reason that section 1221 of the Probate Code provides that a decree of distribution "must always be" entered at length in the minute book of the court; and that "by reason of the logic of things, the provisions of sec. 1221 of the Probate Code must apply to decrees distributing testamentary trusts as well as to decrees distributing estates."

Section 1221 of the Probate Code provides: "All orders and decrees of the court or judge must be entered at length in the minute-book of the court, or else signed by the judge and filed; but decrees of distribution must always be so entered at length."

Rule 2 of the new Rules on Appeal provides in part: "* * * notice of appeal shall be filed within 60 days from the date of entry of the judgment * * * (b) [What constitutes entry] For the purposes of this rule. * * * (2) The date of entry of an order which is entered in the minutes shall be the date of its entry in the minutes, unless the entry in the minutes expressly directs that a written order be prepared, signed and filed, in which case the date of entry shall be the date of filing of the signed order. * * * (4) The date of entry of a decree of distribution in a probate proceeding shall be the date of its entry at length in the minutes." (Italics added.) It is further provided in the Rules on Appeal (Rule 40, subdiv. (g), p. 28) that "'Judgment' includes any judgment, order or decree from which an appeal lies."

The signed decree herein was entered in the minutes on June 8th. The signed decreed, having been filed on June 3—before the date of the entry in the minutes on June 8—it was not, of course, filed in pursuance of a direction in the minutes, as required by said Rule 2 if the date of filing a signed order is to constitute the date of entry. (It is to be noted as hereinafter stated that, on the contrary, the signed decree directed that a minute entry be made.)

[1] Under the Rules on Appeal, the decree herein having been entered in the minutes and said entry not having directed that a written order be prepared, signed and filed, the date of entry of the decree was the date the decree was entered in the minutes, June 8, 1943, and the date of the filing of the signed decree herein, June 3, 1943, did not constitute the date of entry of the decree.

Furthermore, the decree herein provided at the end thereof, immediately preceding the signature of the judge, as follows: "Let a decree be entered accordingly." (Emphasis added.) By reason of said direction by the court that a decree be entered accordingly, the filing of the signed decree was not the equivalent of the entry of the decree at length in the minute book. Said direction indicated that the signed decree should be regarded as a memorandum of the decision of the court; and that the signed decree should be entered in the minute book and when so entered it should constitute the decision of the court and the date of the entry thereof.

As above mentioned, the Estate of Hanley and the Estate of Tierney, upon which respondent relies, stated that "The filing of a signed decree is equivalent to entry 'at length in the minute-book of the court.'" The former case was an appeal from an order settling an account, and the latter case was an appeal from an order appointing additional trustees—which orders, under section 1221 of the Probate Code, were not required to be entered at length in the minutes. Said cases are distinguishable from the present case in the following respects: that the notices of appeal therein were filed before the new rules on appeal became effective on July 1, 1943; and the signed orders in said cases did not direct (as the decree herein directed) that said orders be entered. It is not necessary to discuss the contention of appellants that said cases are further distinguishable from the present case—said contention being that the latter part of section 1221 of the Probate Code (that decrees of distribution must always be entered at length) is applicable to the decree in the present case distributing a testamentary trust, whereas the first part of said section (that orders must be entered at length or else signed and filed) is applicable to the orders in the cited cases.

[2] The notice of appeal having been filed on August 5, 1943, it was filed within 60 days from the date of entry of the decree, June 8, 1943, and therefore it was filed within the time allowed by law.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

demnity Company, insurance carrier, to annul an award of workmen's compensation to Mollie Pruitt made by the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California.

Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Everett A. Corten, Attorney for Industrial Accident Commission, and R. C. McKellips, Asst. Atty., Industrial Accident Commission, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

The petitioner seeks an annulment of the award of compensation to an employee who was injured during an altercation between an assistant foreman and a fellow employee.

The applicant, Mollie Pruitt, was a negro woman employed as a tank scaler at petitioner's shipbuilding plant located at Richmond. She worked in a gang composed of two white women, one colored, and four others whose race and color were not identified. All members of the gang were instructed to take orders only from their leaderman. A white man, Fay Jones, was an assistant labor foreman of the plant, who was not connected with this gang and had no authority over it. On the day in question Jones, in a drunken condition, came to the place where the gang was working and engaged in making love to Daisy, one of the white women. He ordered Willa Mae, one of the colored women, to leave the place and work in some other part of the ship. She refused and an altercation arose. He then took Daisy to the hold of the ship where they remained for more than an hour.

In the meantime the two colored women and one of the white women went to the rest room where they discussed Jones' order to Willa Mae. Unknown to them Mrs. Jones was present, and having learned of her husband's conduct with Daisy, she set out to find him. Husband and wife later came to the place where applicant was working and he demanded that he be told who had given the information to his wife. The colored women told him that all they had discussed in Mrs. Jones' presence was his order to Willa Mae to leave the gang. Mrs. Jones told him that a white woman told her about his affair with Daisy. Jones threatened to beat the one who told. Willa Mae insisted that she had talked only about his order to her. Without further provocation Jones started to beat Willa Mae. He knocked her to the floor and was kicking her when the applicant pleaded with him not to hurt the woman. He then turned on her and struck her over the eye with a steel helmet. The leaderman interfered and was also beaten.

[1] The propriety of the award rests upon the question whether the injuries inflicted upon the applicant arose out of, and in the course of, her employment. In support of the award the commission found that the injuries to the applicant occurred "in the course of and arising out of her employment." This finding is amply supported by the evidence and must be sustained unless it can be said as a matter of law that when an employee goes to the protection of a fellow employee while both are engaged in the course of their employment he thereby leaves his master's service and acts upon his own time and responsibility.

[2] The early cases upon which petitioner relies are out of harmony with the modern rule that the suppression of a quarrel between employees and an attempt to rescue an injured employee is a duty imposed upon the employer, and that, when a fellow employee intercedes for that purpose he acts in the interest of and for the benefit of his employer. A case directly in point is United States Casualty Co. v. Hampton, Tex.Civ.App., 293 S.W. 260. A fight arose between a sub-foreman and an employee. All the other employees quit working. One employee endeavored to separate the parties and was injured. It was held that this was in the service of the employer and hence that the injuries arose out of the employment.

Illustrative of the modern rule is Hartford Acc. & Ind. Co. v. Cardillo, 72 App. D.C. 52, 112 F.2d 11, where injuries sustained in a fight between two fellow employees were held compensable.

The opinion contains an interesting discussion of the transition from the early decisions founded on the defenses of contributory negligence and the negligence of a fellow servant and refers to the resistance against the liberal rule of compensation. It is said (72 App.D.C. at page 56, 112 F.2d at page 15), "Several factors have sustained the resistance. One is the hangover from common law conceptions of profiting by one's own wrong. But this applies as well, in logic, to contributory or one's own exclusive negligence. Another was the now thoroughly dissipated notion that voluntary responsible action cannot be accidental. The volitional character of the act also raised a supposed analogy to 'independent, intervening agency' in tort causation. There was, further, an assumed essential opposition between 'personal' acts and those of an 'official' (i. e., related to the work) character. An assault necessarily involves emotional make-up and disturbance. In a broad sense nothing is more personal. Quarreling is always so. This accounts for the early disposition to regard all injuries from wilful assault as not compensable, a view also necessarily dictated, except rarely when duty requires fighting, if tendency of the particular act to forward the work or direct connection with line of duty are the tests of liability. But that view now is repudiated universally in recognition that work causes quarrels and fights. That they involve volition and fault, have no tendency to forward the work, and are permeated with the personal element of anger no longer suffices to break the causal connection between work and injury. Emotional disturbance is not of itself an 'independent, intervening cause' or a 'departure from the work.'"

And again (72 App.D.C. at page 58, 112 F.2d at page 17), "This view recognizes that work places men under strains and fatigue from human and mechanical impacts, creating frictions which explode in myriads of ways, only some of which are immediately relevant to their tasks. Personal animosities are created by working together on the assembly line or in traffic. Others initiated outside the job are magnified to the breaking point by its compelled contacts. No worker is immune to these pressures and impacts upon temperament. They accumulate and explode over incidents trivial and important, personal and official. But the explosion point is merely the culmination of the antecedent pressures. That it is not relevant to the immediate task, involves a lapse from duty, or contains an element of volition or illegality does not disconnect it from them nor nullify their causal effect in producing its injurious consequences. Any other view would reintroduce the conceptions of contributory fault, action in the line of duty, nonaccidental character of voluntary conduct, and independent, intervening cause as applied in tort law, which it was the purpose of the statute to discard. It would require the application of different basic tests of liability for injuries caused by volitional conduct of the claimant and those resulting from negligent action, mechanical causes and the volitional activities of others."

It is a fair inference from the evidence here that the applicant interceded in the affray for the protection of herself and her fellow workers and that in doing so she was engaged in the service of the employer to stop the fight and permit the work of the employer to go on. To hold otherwise it would be necessary to follow the discarded theory that any voluntary act done in the course of employment for the benefit of the employer is an assumption of risk and not compensable.

The award is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1239

Where cross-complaint, which defendants sought to file in action to recover on appeal bond filed by defendants in prior action set up defendants' alleged right of possession to real property which had been determined adversely to defendants in prior action in which judgment had become final, permission to file cross-complaint was properly denied. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 389, 442.

2. Pleading ⇐138

The purpose of allowing a cross-complaint is to enable all matters in dispute between the parties relating to the subject matter upon which the action is brought, or affecting the property to which it relates, to be determined by a single action and by a single judgment. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 389, 442.

3. Pleading ⇐138

The purpose of statute providing for filing of cross-complaint is not to allow persons having independent claims against each other to settle them all in one action upon sole ground that as they had been brought into court with respect to one case or dispute, they should at the same time settle all matters of controversy existing between them. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 389, 442.

4. Pleading ⇐147

The test in determining whether permission to file cross-complaint should be given is whether the matter alleged therein bears the necessary and proper relation to the matter constituting the cause of action, and if such relation is present it is immaterial that the relief sought is independent of and different from that prayed for in the complaint. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 389, 442.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1239

A cross-complaint alleging defendants' right to possession of realty had no connection with defendants' liability as principals on appeal bond filed in prior action involving right to possession of such property, and permission to file the cross-complaint in action on the bond was properly denied. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 389, 442.

6. Parties ⇐51(4)

Statute authorizing the bringing in of additional parties does not give the court power to bring into the action a controversy between the defendant and strangers to the action which is irrelevant to the action between the parties already before the court. Code Civ.Proc. § 389.

7. Pleading ⇐149

Permission to file cross-complaint which sought to bring in additional parties was properly denied where the cross-complaint contained no allegation as to what interest such additional parties had in the controversy, or why such parties were necessary to determination of the liability of defendants which plaintiff sought to impose. Code Civ.Proc. § 389.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; Harry Deirup, Judge.

Action by Arthur Bracey and Adelaide Bracey, husband and wife, against John Gray and Dora Stuart Gray, husband and wife, and others to recover damages under an appeal bond. From an order denying defendants named permission to file cross-complaint, they appeal.

Affirmed.

John Gray and Dora Stuart Gray, in pro. per.

Coyle E. Bybee, of Chico, for respondents.

PEEK, Justice.

Prior to her marriage to defendant John Gray, the defendant Dora Stuart Gray purchased certain real property located near the city of Chico, which property was then subject to a note and deed of trust. Sometime after her marriage to John Gray a joint declaration of homestead was filed covering said real property. Default was made in payment of the obligation and the property was foreclosed. The plaintiffs herein subsequently acquired the property from the purchaser at the foreclosure sale. At the time of such acquisition by the plaintiffs the defendants still occupied the premises, and in order for plaintiffs to obtain possession thereof an action was filed against Gray and his wife. Subsequently John Gray executed and delivered a quitclaim deed to plaintiffs and the action was dismissed as against him. The cause was then tried and a judgment was rendered against Dora Stuart Gray alone. John Gray did not participate as a party in that trial. Thereafter, however, he and Dora Stuart Gray moved for a new trial and to vacate and set aside the judgment in addition to sundry other motions, all of which were denied by the trial court. Upon appeal to this court the judgment and orders appealed from were affirmed (Bracey et al. v. Gray et al., 49 Cal.App. 2d 274, 121 P.2d 770), and the said judgment has now become final.

Pursuant to that judgment a writ of execution was issued and delivered to the sheriff of Butte County for service upon the defendants for the purpose of placing Bracey and his wife in possession of the property. John Gray and his wife then filed in this court two separate proceedings, one of which was a petition for certiorari and the other a petition for a writ of supersedeas, to review the proceedings in the former case and to recall and quash the execution therein. Both petitions were denied.

In the later case of Gray v. Bybee et al., 60 Cal.App.2d 564, 574, 141 P.2d 32, 37, this court, after summarizing the evidence concluded that: "Whatever interest the plaintiff [John Gray] may have had in the property by virtue of the homestead which his wife filed within three months after their marriage, it was terminated by the foreclosure of the trust deed. Mrs. Gray took title to the real property subject to the trust deed and prior to her marriage. The homestead was also subject to the trust deed. John Gray relinquished whatever homestead interest he may have had by executing and delivering to the owners of the land his quitclaim deed. He had full knowledge of the entire transaction. The court therefore properly refused to quash the execution."

After entry of the final judgment in the first case (Bracey et al. v. Gray et al., supra), Bracey and his wife filed the present action for damages against the defendants John Gray and Dora Stuart Gray as principals and Uel L. Garner and Levi H. Maxwell as sureties upon the appeal bond filed by said defendants Gray and his wife. Said defendants by their answer to said complaint admitted the judgment previously rendered against them but alleged that such judgment was ineffectual and void because of what defendants allege therein to have been reversible error in the two previous cases. When the case was placed on the trial calendar for the purpose of setting a date for the hearing thereon, Gray and his wife moved the court for permission to file a cross-complaint which motion was denied. It is from that order that defendants have appealed to this court.

[1] An examination of the cross-complaint discloses that it is predicated solely upon defendants' alleged right of possession of the real property in question, which was the subject matter of the original actions, and which actions have been decided adversely to them. The judgments in both of said cases have now become final and are complete answers to defendants' allegations therein. Said cross-complaint is purely an attempt by said defendants again to try the issues previously decided against them in both of the former cases.

The sole purpose of the present action is for a money judgment against the persons signing the undertaking as principals and as sureties. The subject of the action is the undertaking on appeal and has nothing to do with nor is any issue made therein in regard to the title or possession of the real property which was in controversy in the previous cases.

However, defendants now insist, in support of their appeal herein, that said cross-complaint should have been allowed by virtue of the provisions of sections 442 and 389 of the Code of Civil Procedure in that the cross-complaint relates to the property previously in controversy and that a complete determination of the case cannot be had without the presence of the other parties named therein.

Section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in part, that: "Whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party, relating to or depending upon the contract, transaction, matter, happening or accident upon which the action is brought, or affecting the property to which the action relates, he may, in addition to his answer, file at the same time, or by permission of the court subsequently, a cross-complaint. * * *

Section 389, so far as is pertinent herein, provides that: "* * * when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must then order them to be brought in, and to that end may order amended and supplemental pleadings, or a cross-complaint to be filed * * *."

[2] The purpose of allowing a cross-complaint is to enable all matters in dispute between the parties relating to or depending upon the contract, transaction or subject matter upon which the action is brought or affecting the property to which it relates, to be determined by a single action and by a single judgment. In other words, to avoid a multiplicity of suits and thereby save vexation and expense. Lowe v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 708, 134 P. 190.

[3] In the enactment of such section or of the procedure therein set forth it was not the intention to allow persons having independent claims against each other to settle them all in one action upon the sole ground that as they had been brought into court to contend against each other with respect to one case or dispute, they should at the same time and place settle all matters of controversy existing between them. Meyer v. Quiggle, 140 Cal. 495, 74 P. 40; Clark v. Kelley, 163 Cal. 207, 124 P. 846; United Casting Co. v. Duncan, 44 Cal.App. 384, 186 P. 403.

[4] Under the provisions of such section the test is whether the matter alleged in the cross-complaint bears the necessary and proper relation to the matter constituting the cause of action. It is true that if such relation is present it is immaterial that the relief sought by the cross-complaint is independent of and different from that prayed for in the complaint. And the cross-complaint not only may tend to diminish or defeat the plaintiffs' recovery but may demand affirmative relief distinctive from that prayed for in the complaint. Metropolitan, etc., Co. v. Margulis, 38 Cal. App.2d 711, 102 P.2d 459.

[5] The proposed cross-complaint does not meet the requirement of section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure for as previously stated, the present cause of action is merely a request for a money judgment against the persons signing the undertaking on appeal. The purported claim of the defendants as set forth in said cross-complaint has no connection with the liability of either the principals or sureties therein.

[6] In further support of their contention that the trial court was in error in denying their motion, defendants also rely upon section 389 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It has been stated in the case of Alpers v. Bliss, 145 Cal. 565, 570, 79 P. 171, 173: "This section does not give the court power to bring into the action for determination a controversy between a defendant and strangers to the action, which is irrelevant to the action between the parties already before it, except for the purpose of making its determination of the controversy between the parties already before it complete, and without prejudice to the rights of others. A defendant cannot inject into the action a controversy between himself and an outsider, even though it affects the property to which the action relates, unless some party already before the court is interested in or will be affected by the determination of such controversy."

[7] Said cross-complaint contains no allegation as to what interest if any, the proposed cross-defendants Bybee, Bainbridge or Taylor have, or claim to have, in the property, or why they or either of them are necessary parties to a determination of the liability of the principals and sureties on the undertaking on appeal. It therefore cannot be said that the additional parties endeavored to be brought into the action by the cross-complaint were in any way interested in, or would be affected by, a determination of the present controversy.

We are entirely in accord with the trial court, when, in denying defendants' motion to file said cross-complaint, it said: "A cross-complaint may be filed where the defendant seeks affirmative relief relating to or depending on the contract on which the action is brought or affecting the property to which the action relates. This action does not affect any property. All that is sought is a money judgment on an undertaking on appeal. The proposed cross-complaint purports to be an action based on a conspiracy on the part of the plaintiffs and others illegally to deprive by means of void process and to convert personal property to their own use by like method. Such a cause of action would not be a proper one to set up by way of cross complaint in this action. The motion to file a cross-complaint will therefore be denied."

In 1942, in the case of Bracey v. Gray, supra [49 Cal.App.2d 274, 121 P.2d 772], this court concluded: "This appeal is devoid of any substantial merit." Again in 1943, in the case of Gray v. Bybee, supra, this court stated: "* * * there is no merit in this * * * appeal." Now, in 1944, a like conclusion is inescapable, that this appeal must likewise be dismissed as being devoid of merit.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

In re BLAK'S ESTATE.

DOEST v. DOEST et al.

Civ. 14166.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

July 20, 1944.

1. Evidence 334(1), 383(4)

In proceeding involving right of Netherlands alien under German occupation to inherit in California under California statute making such right dependent upon reciprocity, a document by Netherlands ambassador to the United States certifying that under Netherlands law such reciprocity was accorded citizens of the United States and that as the Royal Netherlands Government in exile had not modified the Netherlands law, the reciprocity was in full force was properly accepted as conclusive. Probate Code, §§ 259-259.2.

2. Descent and distribution 10(2) War 10(2)

The right to take property by inheritance and right to receive that inheritance by payment in money are part of substantive incidents of normal legal order of society, and that exigencies of war may temporarily suspend the remedy to enforce the right does not militate against the right.

3. Evidence 383(4)

A Netherlands alien under German occupation seeking to inherit property in California sustained burden imposed by California statute to establish existence of reciprocal rights to inherit by introducing statement of Netherlands ambassador to the United States to effect that under Netherlands law the reciprocity contemplated by California statutes was accorded citizens of the United States. Probate Code, §§ 259-259.2.

4. Allens 13

Decedent's brother, a resident of the United States, was not entitled to participate in decedent's estate, but sole heir at law was decedent's daughter who was an alien residing in the Netherlands under German occupation where it was proved that reciprocal rights of inheritance existed between the United States and Netherlands citizens. Probate Code, §§ 259-259.2.

5. Trial 404(2)

That a finding of fact was mistakenly placed in conclusion of law did not detract from its efficacy as a finding.

Appeal from Superior Court; Los Angeles County; Jess E. Stephens, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of John Blak, also known as John Blok, also known as Gysbertus Doest, deceased, wherein there were two contested petitions, one for partial distribution filed by John C. Doest and a petition to determine the heirship filed by Hendrika Doest and Adrian Hartog, Consul of the Netherlands at Los Angeles.

From two orders in probate by which John C. Doest was barred from taking any interest in the estate of decedent, John C. Doest appeals.

Affirmed.

Marshall Stimson and Noel Edwards, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Walter G. Danielson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DESMOND, Presiding Justice.

John C. Doest, who is the surviving brother of Gysbertus Doest, otherwise known as John Blak, appeals from two orders in probate by which he was barred from taking any interest in the estate of his brother. Both orders were made upon the same day, December 29, 1942, when two contested petitions were consolidated for hearing: (1) petition for partial distribution filed by appellant, in which he stated that, as an heir at law of the decedent, he was entitled to all the residue of the estate; (2) a petition to determine heirship filed by Hendrika Doest, the daughter of decedent and a citizen of The Netherlands, residing in Amsterdam, in which she stated that she was the sole and only heir at law of the decedent.

In support of his claim that he is the heir at law entitled to inherit his brother's property, appellant directs our attention to sections 259, 259.1 and 259.2 of the Probate Code, enacted by the Legislature in 1941, effective on July 1st of that year. (Statutes 1941, Chap. 895, p. 2473.) They read as follows:

"Sec. 259. Aliens residing abroad: Dependence of rights upon reciprocity. The rights of aliens not residing within the United States or its territories to take either real or personal property or the proceeds thereof in this State by succession or testamentary disposition, upon the same terms and conditions as residents and citizens of the United States is dependent in each case upon the existence of a reciprocal right upon the part of citizens of the United States to take real and personal property and the proceeds thereof upon the same terms and conditions as residents and citizens of the respective countries of which such aliens are inhabitants and citizens and upon the rights of citizens of the United States to receive by payment to them within the United States or its territories money originating from the estates of persons dying within such foreign countries."

"Sec. 259.1. Same: Burden of establishing that rights are reciprocal. The burden shall be upon such nonresident aliens to establish the fact of existence of the reciprocal rights set forth in Section 259."

"Sec. 259.2. Same: Disposition of property on finding of non-reciprocity. If such reciprocal rights are not found to exist and if no heirs other than such aliens are found eligible to take such property, the property shall be disposed of as escheated property."

At the trial, a portion of a letter from the State Department at Washington, D. C., addressed to counsel for appellant, was received in evidence, reading as follows: "In reply to your letter of July 21, 1942, you are informed that there is not in force, between the United States and The Netherlands, any treaty or other agreement containing provisions relating to the rights of nationals of either country, with respect to inheritance of property in the other country." The deposition of appellant was then offered and admitted in evidence, showing that he is a resident of the City of San Francisco; that he had last seen his brother, Gysbertus Doest, in 1923, at Santa Barbara, California; that he had not received any letters from him since that date; that the decedent was married in Amsterdam in 1902, to Hendrika Van Straaten, who died in the following year; that deceased had one daughter, Hendrika Doest, and deponent was unable to say whether or not she was living; that he knew of no other immediate relatives of the deceased. After the introduction of these documents, it was stipulated that Hendrika Doest, the decedent's daughter, is an alien, resident in Amsterdam, Holland, and that The Netherlands was occupied by the Germans by force in June, 1940. (This was an error, such occupation having taken place in May, 1940.)

Thereupon the respondents offered in evidence various exhibits, which were admitted without objection. The first, Exhibit A, is a letter, dated June 18, 1942, from the Embassy of The Netherlands at Washington, D. C., which reads as follows:

"To Whom It May Concern

"In connection with certain probate matters pending in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, The Netherlands Ambassador begs to certify hereby that under Netherlands law the reciprocity as meant in Sections 259, 259.1 and 259.2 of the California Code, is accorded citizens and residents of the United States.

"Article 9 of the Act of May 15, 1829, (State Law Record No. 28) provides that the civil law obtaining in the Kingdom of the Netherlands shall equally apply to Netherlands and to aliens, unless a statute shall provide for the contrary. As the Netherlands decedents' estate law does not contain a provision by which the reciprocity under consideration is denied, such reciprocity has to be deduced therefrom by indirection; by the fact that no discrimination is made therein as between the hereditary rights of Netherlands and those of aliens.

"The reciprocity in question, which was in full effect and force at the time of the invasion of The Netherlands by German forces could only be repealed by virtue of legal provision enacted by the Royal Netherlands Government recognized as such by the Government of the United States. As, however, the Royal Netherlands Government, temporarily residing and exercising its functions in London, England, which is recognized by the Government of the United States as the lawful government of Netherlands to all intents and purposes, has not modified the Netherlands decedents' estate law in any shape or fashion, the reciprocity which is the subject of this statement continues in full force and effect.

"Washington, D.C.

"For the Ambassador

"June 18, 1942

"(Signed) H. Reimens."

[1] In view of the authority which attaches in the present international crisis to statements of the duly accredited Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Netherlands relative to actions or decrees by the Royal Netherlands Government, the foregoing document was properly accepted as conclusive by the trial court (Anderson v. N. V. Transandine, etc., Sup., 28 N.Y.S.2d 547, 551, affirmed 263 App.Div. 705, 31 N.Y.S.2d 194; Agency of Canadian Car & Foundry Co., Lim., v. American Can Co., 2 Cir., 258 F. 363, 6 A.L.R. 1182), and, in itself, practically decides adversely the claim of appellant that respondents failed to sustain the burden of establishing the reciprocal rights mentioned in section 259 of the Probate Code. This conclusion is fortified by reference to other documents admitted in evidence, including Exhibit D, a translation certified as true, from the office of the Netherlands Ambassador, of Article 9 of the Act of May 15, 1829, reading, "The civil law of the Kingdom shall equally apply to Netherlands and to aliens, unless a statute shall provide for the contrary." It was stipulated that this law is still in effect and that it has not been amended. Exhibit C consists of a letter from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, to which is attached Royal Decree of May 24, 1940, and power of attorney to the Minister of Netherlands, Washington, D. C. It appears from the transcript that it is unnecessary to incorporate a copy of this letter since "it is admitted that Adrian Hartog, under the law, has the right to represent Hendrika Doest as an alien subject of The Netherlands Government in California, as a representative of that government." Also introduced was Exhibit E, a memorandum from the State Department, Washington, D. C., which it was stipulated contained a "true statement of the law as interpreted by the Department of State, and that the Government of the United States continues to recognize as the Government of the Kingdom of The Netherlands, the Royal Netherlands Government, which is temporarily residing and exercising its functions in London, and continues to recognize Dr. Alexander Loudon as the duly accredited Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of The Netherlands to the United States." From this memorandum it appears that "persons in occupied Netherlands territory who at the time of the occupation were Netherlands nationals" are considered by the government of the United States not to have had their nationality affected by the occupation but as still retaining their Netherlands nationality, and "While for the purpose of certain of such laws, rules, regulations or orders Netherlands territory occupied by the enemy may be treated as enemy territory, it is not the territory of the enemy belligerent in occupation but remains Netherlands territory, and is recognized by the Government of the United States as territory occupied by the enemy but belonging to the Netherlands, one of the nations united with the United States in the prosecution of the war."

[2] The appellant argues that the introduction in evidence of Article 9 of the Act of May 15, 1829, does not establish the fact that Netherlands may inherit under any conditions or that Netherlands or any one residing in the United States may inherit and have property paid to them in the United States arising from estates of persons dying in the Netherlands. He overlooks the reference by the Ambassador, in his letter of July 18, 1942, to the fact that "the Netherlands decedents' estate law does not contain a provision by which the reciprocity under consideration is denied, [etc.]" and the additional statement, in the same letter, that as the Royal Netherlands Government "has not modified the Netherlands decedents' estate law in any shape or fashion, the reciprocity which is the subject of this statement continues in full force and effect." These statements would seem to answer satisfactorily the first objection of the appellant that Article 9, above mentioned, does not establish that Netherlands may inherit under any conditions. The second objection is answered also in the quoted statements, for we may assume that the decedents' estate law of the Netherlands effectively disposes of property of a decedent with proper regard to testamentary directions or the rights of succession, and since there is no distinction in that disposition between Netherlands and citizens of the United States, who, by right of inheritance or testamentary disposition, are entitled to take property located in the Netherlands, it is apparent that the right of citizens of the United States to receive payment within this country of a legacy or a share of an estate originating in the Netherlands is secured, thus meeting the requirement of section 259. We agree in general with the following statements in the brief of respondents. "The 'right' to take property by inheritance and the 'right to receive' that inheritance by payment in money, have long been recognized as part of the substantive, legal and sanctioned incidents of the normal legal order of society. They are in the same category as the 'right' of life, liberty, free speech, religious worship and of property. The 'right' to receive the benefits of the inheritance is a necessary and inherent corollary to the 'right' to take by inheritance. One is not separable from the other. The one includes the other. If the right to take exists, afortiori [sic], the right to receive exists. That the exigencies of war may temporarily suspend or defer the remedy to enforce the right to receive does not militate against the right. The right of United States citizens to receive payment in the United States of moneys originating from a Netherlands estate, is now and has been since 1829, a substantive right which has been an integral, inherent and extant feature and part of The Netherlands jurisprudence. Though the country is now temporarily occupied by the Germans, nevertheless, the Royal Netherlands Government, her laws and the attendant rights under the laws are intact, are existing and are recognized as such by the United States Government." Quoting further, "It will also be observed that the Legislature did not say when United States citizens were to receive payment. It used the words 'the rights' to receive. The Legislature therefore necessarily contemplated and had in mind that the availability of the proceeds of such foreign estates for immediate distribution and payment to United States citizens would be controlled by the exigencies of the battlefield. It placed no time or other limitation as to when payment was to be made. It was concerned only with the existence of 'rights' accorded to United States citizens by and under the legally constituted and recognized laws and government of the country of which the alien was a citizen and resident, to receive their inheritance, knowing that such rights persist and carry on in the scheme and order of society in spite of the immediate fluctuations of war, and that, at most, the remedies for the enforcement of the right may be temporarily suspended." In this connection we may note that Hendrika Doest, in her petition to determine heirship, did not ask the court to decree an immediate distribution; on the contrary, the prayer in her petition is as follows: "That upon distribution in this estate the same be delivered to your petitioner Dr. Adrian Hartog for transmission to The Netherlands Embassy in Washington, D. C., where the same is to be deposited in the Riggs National Bank, Washington, D. C., for the credit to the blocked account on the books of said account in the name of the Royal Netherlands Legation, Custodian Account, and that upon the administrator herein receiving the receipt of your petitioner for said distributive share that said administrator be relieved and discharged of and from any and all further duties or obligations in connection with said distribution * * *." Payment in this form will, as we understand it, conform strictly with the requirements of Executive Order No. 8785 of the President of the United States, dated June 14, 1941, 12 U.S.C.A. § 95 note, governing transactions by license issued by the Secretary of the Treasury "by, or on behalf of, or pursuant to the direction of any foreign country designated in this Order, or any national thereof," and License No. W 1722 issued November 23, 1942, by the Secretary of the Treasury.

[3] The appellant claims that the respondent, Hendrika Doest, has failed to sustain the burden cast upon her by section 259.1 to establish the fact of existence of the reciprocal rights set forth in section 259, but, in our opinion, she made a sufficient showing of meeting the requirements by introducing the statement of the Ambassador of the Netherlands to the effect "that under Netherlands law the reciprocity as meant in sections 259, 259.1 and 259.2 of the California Code is accorded citizens and residents of the United States." The appellant introduced no evidence whatever to contradict or offset this showing and accordingly it prevails.

[4,5] The appellant further states in his reply brief, "By no stretch of the imagination or tedious explanation can a finding be implied that any inheritance would have been paid within the United States from an estate arising in The Netherlands. Respondent must prove to the court that payment would be made within the United States. That is the meaning of the reciprocal right required by the sections of the Probate Code involved here." We note that the trial judge made a sufficient finding upon that subject in acting upon the petition of John C. Doest for partial distribution, for he found "that by the laws of The Netherlands citizens of the United States have the right to inherit real and personal property left by a citizen and resident of The Netherlands, and that reciprocal rights of inheritance exist between the citizens and residents of the United States and the citizens and residents of The Netherlands; the court further finds that although the Kingdom of The Netherlands has been invaded and occupied by Germany, the Government of The Netherlands and her laws with their attendant rights have not been abrogated by any authority recognized by the United States or The Netherlands, but that said Netherlands' Government and the laws thereof, and particularly the rights of United States citizens and residents to inherit from estates of Netherlands' citizens and residents, are now and were at the date of decedent's death, present and existing."

(Italics added.) He made a similar finding in the petition of Hendrika Doest to determine heirship, and as a conclusion of law stated "that reciprocal rights of inheritance exist between citizens and residents of the United States and the citizens and residents of The Netherlands. That said petitioner Hendrika Doest has satisfied the requirements in establishing that such reciprocal rights of inheritance exist and that said John C. Doest, a brother of the decedent, is not entitled to participate in any share or to any extent in this estate but that the sole and only heir at law is said petitioner, Hendrika Doest." (Italics added.) The italicized portion of the last quotation constitutes, in our judgment, the proper conclusion of law, while the balance of the quotation is, in fact, not a conclusion of law but a misplaced finding. Its efficacy as a finding is, in no way, affected by that mistake. New York Life Ins. Co. v. Occidental Pet. Corp., 1941, 43 Cal.App.2d 747, 111 P.2d 707; Otis v. Winter Investment Co., 1934, 138 Cal.App. 682, 33 P.2d 4.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Hugh K. Landram, of Merced, and John J. Taaffe, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Robert Kenny, Atty. Gen., and T. G. Negrich, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PEEK, Justice.

The information herein charged the defendant with the crime of murder. At the conclusion of the trial the jury returned a verdict finding him guilty of murder in the second degree. His motion for a new trial was denied and he was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison at San Quentin. From the final judgment of conviction and from the order denying the motion for a new trial he has appealed to this court.

In his statement of "Reasons relied upon for the reversal of the judgment and order" defendant has set forth ten grounds of alleged error, in general relating to the sufficiency of the evidence, rulings of the trial court in the admission and rejection of evidence, misconduct of the district attorney, and error in charging the jury.

A resume of the pertinent facts as disclosed by the voluminous record and briefs is as follows:

At the time of the homicide the deceased, Collie Mitchell, and his family, consisting of his wife and four children, resided in the town of Firebaugh in Merced county. Lawrence Mitchell, the eldest child, was employed by defendant as a ranch hand. He roomed and boarded with the family of one of defendant's ranch foremen, H. E. Spurlock, whose dwelling was located on the defendant's ranch. On the afternoon of the fatal shooting the deceased and his brother-in-law Royal Gage drove to the city of Merced and stopped at the bar referred to as Jack's Place where Mitchell had five or six bottles of beer. After about two and one-half or three hours at Jack's Place they drove to Taff's Tavern in the town of Planada, where deceased again ordered beer. When the decedent arrived at Taff's, the defendant was seated at the bar. The two men had been acquainted for approximately five years, during which time Mitchell had worked for defendant on his ranch on two or three different occasions, the last time in 1942. They engaged in conversation during which they discussed the probability that Lawrence would be drafted. There is evidence that deceased asked appellant to claim farm deferment for the boy but that appellant informed him that was for the draft board to decide. While this conversation was in progress, one J. H. Nancarrow, his wife Beatrice, and his sister-in-law, Mrs. Coye Hall, entered the barroom. Mr. Nancarrow stated that defendant told him that deceased and Gage were looking for trouble and that he, Reese, said "You won't let two of them jump on me, will you?" Nancarrow also testified that after he, the deceased, and the defendant "kidded" about the straw hat the defendant was wearing, he heard deceased say to appellant, "You're sore at me, Cliff," but he did not hear the defendant's reply. Also during their conversation the deceased asked defendant for a job and defendant told him there was no opening. Defendant then asked Nancarrow in behalf of deceased if his employer needed any tractor drivers, to which Nancarrow replied that there might be a place for a scraper man but that deceased declined the job. Nancarrow left the barroom for the lavatory which was located outside of the building. Immediately following his departure he heard the outside door of the tavern close and noticed the defendant and the deceased "probably 12 or 15 feet from him." He heard deceased say to defendant, "You're nothing but a dirty bastard"; the witness Gage testified to similar words by the deceased; that defendant, after he "stood there for a second," replied, "That's all right," then went toward his car and drove off. He further testified that as defendant was going toward his car the deceased said to him, "You'll fire the boy, [Lawrence] go out and fire him," but that defendant made no reply. Nancarrow further stated that decedent, upon returning to the barroom, pounded the bar with his fist and referring to Reese, stated that he had been wanting to "call the son-of-a-bitch for a long time and I sure told him," (Mrs. Nancarrow and Mrs. Hall, in general, testified to the same effect) and added "He'll steal anything he can pick up," and "if it's too heavy for him to pick up, if there is an Oakie or Arkie there he'll have them load it for him." Mr. and Mrs. Taff testified that the deceased, while cursing the defendant, further stated that "he had a score to settle with Reese" and that he was going to "get him". Taff cautioned deceased to stop swearing as ladies were present, whereupon deceased apologized to the ladies, and he and Gage left. Mitchell and Gage then returned to the Spurlock residence on defendant's ranch to have Lawrence drive them back to Firebaugh. He was unable to drive them, and the two men walked to the Bagwell house, which was approximately 150 feet from the Spurlock dwelling, but Bagwell also was unable to drive them home. While the three men were conversing, Spurlock called to deceased and Gage to come and have supper with them. Gage left first closely followed by Mitchell. According to members of the Spurlock family, the deceased, while preparing for dinner, was in jovial spirits, laughing and joking as was his habit. The shooting occurred shortly thereafter.

According to defendant's testimony, after he left deceased following the incident at Taff's bar in Planada, he drove to the Bagwell dwelling and talked with Bagwell about the ranch work done that day. He remained there two or three minutes without getting out of his car and then drove to his home, about a half mile away. Upon arriving home he asked his wife not to cook their dinner for awhile because he had to see about lining up the work for the next day. He stated the gun used in the shooting was in the car all this time, and that he always kept a gun in the car or truck because of predatory animals on the ranch. He then drove back to the Bagwell place, and when he stopped his car he put the gun, which was in a holster, in his belt. Defendant further stated that at Bagwell's he intended to get a truck to inspect certain portions of the ranch; that in walking toward Bagwell, who was cleaning some jars next to the house, he saw Mitchell at the Spurlock house and called to him, and that as Mitchell approached he spoke to him telling him to "keep off my premises." Mitchell replied that he was going "to whip" the defendant, calling him a "Texas longhorn son-of-a-bitch" and that he, Mitchell, was going to whip Reese "like he told me he would over at Planada." Defendant's reply was that "I told him I had told him once before to keep off my property and am asking him again to keep off there." Mitchell replied that he would "come back again whenever he got ready." After again cursing defendant, Mitchell said, "I can whip you any time and I will whip you every time I see you," and that he was going "to kill me." The defendant further testified that during this conversation Mitchell continued to come toward him; that lying on a pile of dirt by the cesspool and near the path between the Bagwell and Spurlock houses was an iron pipe; that Mitchell picked up the pipe and carried it in both hands over his right shoulder as he advanced; that the defendant told him to stop but that Mitchell continued toward him; that the defendant then backed up a step or two; that when Mitchell was within five or six feet of him he tried to stop him by shooting into the ground approximately one foot in front of the deceased, but he kept coming; that he was fearful of being killed or injured by Mitchell and shot a second time, again only to stop him and not to injure him any more than was necessary. The bullet passed through the leg approximately six inches above the knee; that Mitchell then dropped the pipe, grabbed his "leg with one hand and I guess his hat with the other", and walked toward the Spurlock home; that defendant then returned to his car and drove home. The second shot severed the femoral artery, from which deceased bled to death.

After leaving the scene of the shooting appellant drove a short distance and put the gun and shells in a vineyard, which he later found for the officers. He then went home, and after a few minutes started for the home of his attorney in Merced. On the way he stopped at Taff's place and talked with Mrs. Taff. He also stopped at the Nancarrows' and talked with Mrs. Nancarrow. Then in the company of his attorney, Mr. Braucht, he went to the home of Mr. H. K. Landram where the case was discussed. While this discussion was in progress Mr. Braucht drove to the ranch to ask Mr. Bagwell if he would come to Mr. Landram's home for an interview, but Bagwell was not at home. The meeting at Mr. Landram's continued until approximately 11 o'clock p. m. when the defendant in the company of his counsel, surrendered to the authorities. Attorney Landram previously had telephoned the authorities that defendant was with him and would surrender himself.

The next witness called in relation to the shooting was Henry Bagwell. Upon direct examination he testified that Reese first came to his home around 6:30 o'clock in the evening and remained about ten minutes. As Reese left, Mitchell and Gage arrived; that Mitchell told him his son would not drive them home because he had been drinking; the deceased then said "I like to have whipped your boss a few minutes ago over at Planada"; that Spurlock then called and Gage left immediately while Mitchell reiterated what he had previously stated about Reese and added "I can whip him * * * and I will"; that Reese returned in approximately twenty-five minutes; that when he stepped out of his car he walked to within ten or twelve steps of where Bagwell was working and called to Mitchell, whom Bagwell then saw coming from the Spurlock home; that he observed Mitchell as he approached, and in general recounted the conversation between the two men substantially as given by the defendant. He testified deceased had his hat in his left hand and he saw nothing in his right hand. His testimony regarding the actual shooting was that after the first bullet was fired into the ground in front of Mitchell he "kind of stepped back"; that after the second shot Reese went to his car and Mitchell walked toward Spurlock's home; that he did not see the pipe at the time the sheriff first was at the ranch at 8:30 p. m. but that he did see it when the sheriff visited the ranch a second time at approximately 12:30 a. m. that night.

Upon cross-examination Bagwell stated that from the time he heard the first word spoken between the two men until the first shot was fired he did not look up; that he did not know whether Mitchell had picked up anything or not; that he could see Mitchell's left side and not his right side; that the pipe had been near the cesspool for ten days or more; that he saw it there around noon time of the day of the shooting; that someone from the sheriff's office found it near the bell pole that night; that at the time of the shooting the men were three to four feet apart; that Reese backed up before he fired the two shots and that he believed Mitchell to be intoxicated.

The third witness to the shooting was Mrs. Bagwell. When first interviewed by the sheriff and the prosecution, as well as defense counsel, she informed them all that she neither saw nor heard anything at the time of the shooting. However, during the course of the trial she was called by the prosecution and testified that as she was coming from the barn she heard the defendant call the deceased; that his hat was in his left hand; that she could not tell whether deceased's right hand was up or down "or how it was" as he walked toward the defendant; that there were trees between herself and Mitchell; that the first shot was fired when the parties were about four or five feet apart; that she saw the dust from the first shot and that Mitchell stepped back "just about a step"; that she recognized the pipe which was introduced in evidence as one she had seen "near the cesspool."

On cross-examination she testified that after the shooting she saw the same piece of pipe at the same place near the cesspool. She further testified that about 10 o'clock that evening a car drove up to their home and that a man called "hello" and asked to see Mr. Bagwell; that she informed him he was not home; that it was dark; that she did not see the man, and that he immediately left in his car. This man later was identified as Mr. Braucht, one of defendant's attorneys who had gone to the ranch to get a statement from Mr. Bagwell.

Mr. Landram, also one of defendant's counsel, testified that while he was at the Bagwell home discussing with Mr. Bagwell his statement in relation to the facts surrounding the shooting he mentioned to Mrs. Bagwell that her husband had informed him that she neither had seen nor heard anything in "reference to this matter, is that right?" that in reply to this question Mrs. Bagwell stated, "Yes, if I had been there this thing would not have happened * * *."

The sheriff testified that at approximately the hour of 8:30 o'clock on the evening of the shooting he went to the ranch and at the point where the shooting occurred found the bullets and marked the spots on the ground; that it was dark and he was using a flashlight; that he did not see a pipe at that time; that he returned to the ranch about 12:30 o'clock a.m. and at that time discovered the pipe. Upon cross-examination he testified that at the time of his first examination he did not know a pipe was involved in the case and did not look for one; that it was not until after Reese had surrendered to the district attorney that he had any knowledge concerning a pipe, and that the pipe was found where the defendant said it was.

The bell pole, near which the shooting occurred, was located between the Spurlock and Bagwell houses, and closer to the latter. It was constructed of 4 x 6 timber 12 or 14 feet high, on which a dinner bell was mounted. A path ran between the two houses and passed the cesspool mentioned at a point approximately 36 feet from the Bagwell house.

[1-4] Defendant's first contention is that as a matter of law the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury. As we have noted, the evidence is in sharp conflict as regards the material facts of the case. It is an elementary principle of law that when the facts are reasonably susceptible of two or more inferences the reviewing court is without power to substitute its deductions for those of the jury. In other words a reviewing court must view the evidence in the light most favorable to respondent. Applying this well established rule to the present case we must hold that the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict. However, as was said in the recent case of People v. Dail, 22 Cal.2d 642, 650, 140 P.2d 828, 832, "in a close case where the evidence is sharply conflicting, substantial and serious errors vital to defendant that may have resulted in a miscarriage of justice must be regarded as prejudicial and grounds for reversal." People v. Albertson, 23 Cal.2d 550, 553, 145 P.2d 7; People v. Silver, 16 Cal.2d 714, 723, 108 P.2d 4.

With this recent admonition of the Supreme Court in mind we have exhaustively examined the testimony in regard to defendant's specific charges of error. Not from the standpoint of the weight thereof, as such determination would be outside of the province of this court, but rather from the viewpoint of whether such testimony was sufficient to present issues of fact to the jury for its consideration under proper instructions.

Defendant's second point of alleged error is that the trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury on his right to evict a trespasser and instructing the jury that such right was not involved in the present case. The attacked instruction is as follows: "I instruct you that you may not consider the defense talked of by the attorneys for the defendant and described by them as the right to evict a trespasser, because the evidence in this case is that the defendant did not shoot deceased because he was trespassing."

[5] It is true the defendant testified that he had no thought of harm to his property when he fired the two shots. However, his testimony and that of other witnesses does show that he had previously warned Mitchell to keep away from the ranch; that in spite of this warning Mitchell returned; that when defendant, according to his testimony, again told him to stay off the ranch, Mitchell, instead of complying with defendant's orders and leaving the ranch, advanced in a threatening manner, holding a pipe over his shoulder and cursing the defendant and threatening injury. Reese admittedly was upon his own property and admittedly had the right to order the deceased to stay away. "Instructions should not ignore any findings of fact which a jury might reasonably make upon the evidence before them." People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 50 P. 405, 409.

Viewing the evidence in the present case in the light of such rule it cannot be said that the jury could not reasonably have found that Mitchell was a trespasser upon defendant's land. Of course the jury was not bound to accept such evidence, yet assuming that it did, it then would become necessary to construe the acts of the defendant and the deceased immediately prior to the shooting in accordance with the provisions of section 197 of the Penal Code, which is the contention of the defendant. Such code section, in part, is as follows:

"Homicide is also justifiable when committed by any person in either of the following cases:

"1. When resisting any attempt to murder any person, or to commit a felony, or to do some great bodily injury upon any person; or,

"2. When committed in defense of habitation, property, or person, against one who manifestly intends or endeavors, by violence or surprise, to commit a felony, or against one who manifestly intends and endeavors, in a violent, riotous or tumultuous manner, to enter the habitation of another for the purpose of offering violence to any person therein; or,

"3. When committed in the lawful defense of such person, * * * when there is reasonable ground to apprehend a design to commit a felony or to do some great bodily injury, and imminent danger of such design being accomplished; * * * such person, * * * must really and in good faith have endeavored to decline any further struggle before the homicide was committed; * * *."

In the early case of People v. Flanagan, 60 Cal. 2, 44 Am.Rep. 52, where a comparable question was presented to the court for determination, it was said that although "human life can not be taken to prevent a mere trespass upon property. * * * [yet] For the purposes of defense and prevention every one is entitled to use whatever force may be necessary—even to the extent of taking the life of a felonious aggressor (People v. Payne, 8 Cal. 341), and a homicide committed under such circumstances is justifiable in law."

The court therein, in construing the words "intent" and "endeavor" as used in the code, further stated that: "Either an intent or endeavor to execute such a design will be sufficient to justify resistance for prevention, in defense of person or property. The law of self-defense is a law of necessity; and that necessity must be real or apparently real. A party acting under it may act upon appearances; and he will be justifiable in acting upon them, even though they turn out to have been false. Whether they were real or apparently real is for the jury, in a criminal case, to decide upon all the circumstances out of which the necessity springs. If from all the evidence in the case they should find that the circumstances were such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man, and that the defendant, acting under the influence of such fears, killed the aggressor to prevent the commission of a felony upon his person or property, he would not be criminally responsible for his death, although the circumstances might be insufficient to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the aggressor was actually about to commit a felony."

In the later case of People v. Hubbard, 64 Cal.App. 27, 220 P. 315, 318, the defendant ordered one Cope out of his house; the decedent refused to leave, and the two engaged in a scuffle during which the decedent was fatally shot. The court, in reversing a verdict of conviction, observed that under the defendant's theory of the case the shot was accidental and the defendant had a legal right to evict the decedent from the premises using whatever force might rightfully be used for that purpose, and stated: "It is quite possible that the jurors, because they were not instructed as to his right to eject Cope from the premises and to use all force reasonably necessary to that end, believed that defendant was guilty of a felony in endeavoring to remove Cope by force; and it is quite possible that the verdict of murder in the second degree was returned because, and solely because, the jury believed that the shot which killed Cope, even if it were fired accidentally and unintentionally, was fired while defendant was committing or attempting to commit a felony. These considerations will show how essential it was that the jury should be fully instructed with respect to defendant's right to eject Cope and to use force if necessary."

[6] Whether Mitchell was a trespasser when at the Spurlock residence, whether he was a trespasser when elsewhere on the ranch as he admittedly was prior to the shooting, whether the appearances of injury to defendant at the hands of the deceased were "real or apparently real", whether the attendant circumstances were such as to "excite the fears of a reasonable man" and whether the defendant acting upon such appearances and fears killed the deceased, were all directly placed in issue by both the prosecution and the defense and were questions of fact for the jury to decide. Or stated another way, as in the Hubbard case, supra, the jurors, because they were not properly instructed as to the right of Reese to order Mitchell off the ranch (but rather they were told to the contrary that it was not an element of the case) might conceivably have based their verdict of murder in the second degree solely upon the ground that they believed that the fatal shot was fired while the defendant was committing or attempting to commit a felony.

Under the testimony and circumstances of the present case the question of trespass as well as the question relating to the threats of force and violence accompanying the trespass as made by the decedent directly and indirectly to the defendant, all of which were testified to by various witnesses and likewise argued at length by both the prosecution and defense, became a part of and directly related to defendant's claim of self-defense, and concerning which the defendant was entitled to proper instructions.

[7] Therefore, the failure to instruct the jury properly upon all of such elements of the case became "substantial and serious errors vital to defendant that may have resulted in a miscarriage of justice" (People v. Dail, supra), and we must conclude that such error was prejudicial to the defendant, and grounds for reversal.

The third contention made on this appeal is that the court erred in giving a so-called "retreat to the wall" instruction, which reads as follows: "No one has a right to kill another in self-defense unless such killing is real or apparently necessary for such defense. Before a person can justify taking the life of a human being on the ground of self defense, he must, when attacked, employ all reasonable means within his power, consistent with his safety, to avoid the danger and avert the necessity for the killing."

Except for the second word which has been changed from "man" to "one" this instruction is identical to the one given in the case of People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 P. 187, 190. The Supreme Court therein, after commenting upon the development of the modern rule in California as distinguished from the antiquated "retreat to the wall" doctrine, concluded: "No exposition is necessary to show that the giving of this instruction, which imposed upon the defendant the duty of flight, and forbade him the right to stand his ground, was error of such gravity as to demand a reversal of the case."

In passing upon a similar question this court, in the recent case of People v. Zuckerman, 56 Cal.App.2d 366, 132 P.2d 545, 549, cited with approval the Maughs case, and stated: "The California courts have definitely rejected the antiquated doctrine that a defendant will be justified in killing his assailant in self-defense only after he has used every possible means of escape by fleeing, even to the extent of 'retreating to the wall,' regardless of whether the imminent peril would justify him as a reasonable person in believing he was about to receive great bodily harm, or that he was likely to be killed if he did not promptly resort to a deadly weapon." Citing People v. Maughs, and other cases.

That such rule is well founded in common logic and justice is ably illustrated by the statement of Mr. Justice Henshaw in the Maughs case (quoting from State v. Bartlett, 170 Mo. 658, 71 S.W. 148, 59 L.R.A. 756), when he observed: "It is true, human life is sacred, but so is human liberty. One is as dear in the eyes of the law as the other, and neither is to give way and surrender its legal status in order that the other may exclusively exist, supposing for a moment such an anomaly to be possible. In other words, the wrongful and violent acts of one man shall not abolish, or even temporarily suspend, the legal and constitutional rights of his neighbor."

Respondent admits the instruction so attacked to be improper upon the authority of People v. Zuckerman, supra, but argues that appellant lost the right to the plea of self-defense by his own aggressive conduct in that he "went gunning" for the decedent. From this the respondent concludes that as the plea was not available to the defendant, the giving of the instruction embodying the discarded "retreat to the wall" rule, was wholly immaterial. In support of this argument respondent quotes at length and strongly relies upon the case of Laney v. United States, 54 App.D.C. 56, 294 F. 412, 414.

The defendant therein was convicted of manslaughter. He predicated his case upon self-defense and the trial court instructed the jury upon that subject. Upon appeal the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia stated it would be unnecessary to consider the assignment of error by the defendant in relation to the law of self-defense (what the alleged error was is not disclosed), since viewing the evidence in the most favorable aspect, self-defense did not enter the case. In the Laney case, the defendant, by his own acts after escaping from a race riot, tested his revolver, and returned to the place of the riot, and in the opinion of the court, as a matter of law deliberately sought a quarrel. The court concluded that "if the facts, in the judgment of the court, are not such as to admit of this defense, the issue should not be left to the mere speculation of the jury." However, such statement was later qualified when the court said, "of course, the extent to which a person assailed may go, under a given set of facts involving self-defense, is always a question of fact for the jury", while in a later case, however, Kinard v. United States, 68 App.D.C. 250, 96 F.2d 522, 526, the same court which decided the Laney case, said: "* * *. It is the function of the jury, under proper instructions, to determine whether either defense [self-defense or killing in heat of passion] is available to the accused under the circumstances of the particular case."

[8,9] Such being the rule, then in the present case the testimony of Reese, that the deceased kept coming toward him even after the first shot and with an iron pipe raised over his right shoulder, was sufficient to raise the issue of self-defense.

[10] For this court to adopt the argument of respondent in opposition to defendant's contention and hold as a matter of law that the defendant was entitled neither to the plea of self-defense nor proper instructions thereon would be to completely disregard the obvious conflicts in the evidence as well as the testimony of the defendant. This we cannot do, for as stated in People v. Keel, 91 Cal.App. 599, 604, 267 P. 161, 163: "If the testimony of any witness in the case is sufficient to raise the issue, it should be presented to the jury."

In view of the defendant's testimony in addition to the conflicting testimony concerning the acts of the participants immediately preceding and at the time of the shooting, the question of whether or not the defendant was acting in a reasonable belief of death or injury was a proper question solely for the jury upon proper instructions on self-defense.

Three additional cases are cited by respondent; People v. Fleming, 218 Cal. 300, 23 P.2d 28; People v. Barrett, 22 Cal.App. 780, 136 P. 520, and People v. Keys, 62 Cal.App.2d 903, 145 P.2d 589. In the Fleming case the Supreme Court merely held that the uncorroborated testimony of the defendant was overcome by the testimony of all of the other witnesses, and that there was ample evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, while the decisions in the Barrett and Keys cases likewise turned upon the questions of the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict of the jury.

In none of the California cases cited was the plea of self-defense denied the defendant even though the record in the last two cases contained substantial evidence that the fatal shots were fired after the deceased had fallen. The phrase "availability of such defense" in the cases last mentioned is not used in a restrictive sense as regards the right of the defendant to such defense, as respondent contends, but rather it refers to the validity of the defense based upon all of the acts of the defendant and the deceased and other pertinent circumstances surrounding the homicide.

As was stated in the case of People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 451, at page 462, 42 P. 307, at page 311, 30 L.R.A. 403: "The acts which a defendant may do and justify under the plea of self-defense depend primarily upon his own conduct, and secondarily upon the conduct of the deceased. There is no fixed rule applicable to every case, though certain general principles, well es-established, stand forth as guides for the action of men and measures for the jury's determination of their deportment." See also People v. McCurdy, 140 Cal.App. 499, 35 P.2d 569; People v. Mesa, 121 Cal.App. 345, 8 P.2d 920; People v. Miller, 114 Cal. App. 293, 299 P. 742; People v. Bruno, 107 Cal.App. 365, 290 P. 610, and People v. Head, 105 Cal.App. 331, 288 P. 106.

It is also true, as stated in the Hecker case, supra: "Self-defense is not available as a plea to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with the design to force a deadly issue, and thus, through his fraud, contrivance, or fault, to create a real or apparent necessity for killing."

However, the court further stated: "One of the questions of primary consideration for the jury was which of the two men was the aggressor at the time of the fatal affray, which of the two first overstepped the boundaries of the law, which of the two first trespassed upon the legal rights of the other,—in short, which of the two by his acts and conduct, first put himself in the wrong; for it is obvious that the determination of this must throw a flood of light upon the other question, second in consideration but first in importance, namely, whether, at the time the defendant first fired, he was acting in self-defense."

If, then, a determination of such question must depend first upon the conduct of the defendant, and secondly upon the conduct of the deceased, reference necessarily must be had to the record. Obviously, therefore, the testimony introduced by the defendant cannot be totally ignored and reference only had to that which was detrimental to him, as does the respondent in its brief. Rather the entire testimony in relation to all of the circumstances attending the homicide (People v. Hecker, supra), whether introduced by the defense or by the prosecution, must be examined. As previously noted such an examination of the record in the present case discloses a sharp conflict in the evidence. Under such circumstances "the law is well settled that disputed questions as to whether a plea of self-defense is sound or is corroborated are for the jury to determine." People v. Bruno, supra [107 Cal.App. 365, 290 P. 613], and cases therein cited. See also People v. Newcomer, supra.

Paraphrasing the statement made by this court in the recent case of People v. Zuckerman, supra, the testimony of the defendant constituted substantial evidence, and raised an issue as to whether he was reasonably justified in believing, under the circumstances then existing, that he was about to be seriously injured or killed by the decedent, and that it was therefore necessary for him to shoot Mitchell in self-defense. That was an issue which he had a right to have submitted to the jury under proper instructions. In fact such plea was the major issue presented by him at the trial and the testimony in relation thereto raised a proper question for determination by the jury. Under the circumstances as disclosed by the record the trial court properly entertained instructions upon such defense. Unfortunately, however, the instructions so given were improper under the cases cited.

[11] It is true the jury elsewhere was instructed correctly regarding the general principles of law in relation to the plea of self-defense, but that did not overcome the prejudicial effect of the quoted erroneous charge. "The giving of a formal instruction which stated the statutory rule did not cure the error, but instead created a serious conflict, which would normally have the effect of misleading the jury. * * * The result must inevitably have been a confusion in the jurors' minds on a matter vital to the judgment." People v. Dail, supra. See also Wells v. Lloyd, 21 Cal.2d 452, 457, 132 P.2d 471; Jolley v. Clemens, 28 Cal.App.2d 55, 73, 82 P.2d 51; Soda v. Marriott, 118 Cal.App. 635, 643, 5 P.2d 675; 8 Cal.Jur. 633.

An earlier version of such rule is found in the Maughs case, supra, when the Supreme Court, in disposing of a like situation, stated: "Nor is it any answer to this objection that the court elsewhere gave a correct instruction upon the subject. The result served but to confuse the jury and to render it impossible to determine whether in their deliberations they followed the law as correctly or as incorrectly set before them. People v. Campbell, 30 Cal. 312; People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 65; People v. Wong Ah Ngow, 54 Cal. 151, 35 Am.Rep. 69; People v. Messersmith, 57 Cal. 575; People v. Thomson, 92 Cal. 506, 28 P. 589; People v. Pearne, 118 Cal. 154, 50 P. 376."

[12-15] The fourth contention contains two allegations of error, (1) that the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that the defendant had a right to have a revolver in his possession, and (2) that prejudicial error was committed by failure of the court to instruct the jury as to the standard by which the law gauges the conduct of one suddenly assailed. We find no prejudicial error in either contention. As regards the first, our attention has been directed to no portion of the record where issue was made concerning the ownership or possession of a revolver. The instruction tendered by defendant, although correct as an abstract statement of the law, had no bearing upon the issues under consideration. To justify a reversal for such alleged error it must appear from all of the evidence that an error in this respect resulted in a miscarriage of justice. (2 Cal. Jur. 1026, and cases cited.) As regards the second part of defendant's fourth contention it might be said that the instruction given could well have been broadened to include what defendant has termed the standard of conduct of a reasonable man. However, that is not to say, nor is it necessary, that each instruction embody every fact or element essential to sustain or defeat a particular issue. It is sufficient if the instructions, as a whole, substantially and correctly cover the law applicable to the issues.

[16] Defendant's fifth point is that the court further erred in giving a flight instruction in the absence of any evidence of flight. The record discloses that immediately following the shooting the defendant left the scene and hid the gun and cartridges in a vineyard. Later that same evening he voluntarily surrendered himself to the law enforcement officers. Such evidence of flight is manifestly weak. However, under such circumstances we must repeat what this court recently said in the case of People v. Sing Chan, 64 Cal.App. 2d 167, 148 P.2d 81, 84, wherein a similar question was presented: "We are of the opinion that whether defendant fled or not was a matter for the jury to determine."

[17] The sixth contention is that the court erred in permitting the prosecutor to cross-examine defendant in regard to previous physical encounters. Upon direct examination defendant testified that he had a serious heart condition which had been active since entering a sanitarium in 1927, and that excitement or exertion not only could but probably would prove fatal. It is obvious that by such testimony defendant endeavored to show he was physically handicapped and by reason thereof was further justified in defending himself with a revolver. The defendant having first placed such evidence in the record he cannot be heard to complain of the admission on cross-examination of further evidence. It was proper for the prosecutor to develop by cross-examination that the alleged critical heart condition did not deter appellant from engaging in previous physical encounters with others.

[18] As stated in People v. Lombard, 131 Cal.App. 525, 532, 21 P.2d 955, 958: "It is proper in a criminal case to cross-examine a defendant upon any relevant and material matter testified to on his direct examination, for the purpose of showing conduct or statements inconsistent with his direct testimony."

[19,20] Appellant's seventh contention is that error was committed when the prosecution was allowed to impeach their own witness, Bagwell, without any showing of surprise or justification.

On the night of the homicide this witness talked with the prosecutor and the sheriff concerning the case and gave a statement of the facts to them. At the trial he was called and testified as a witness for the state. Upon cross-examination he gave categorical answers to suggestive questions which included statements of fact. The facts embodied in the questions were somewhat different from those he gave to the officers on the night of the homicide but in harmony with a statement which he also gave to defense counsel the morning following. At the conclusion of the cross-examination the district attorney asked permission to cross-examine the witness on the ground of surprise.

We have considered all of the testimony of the witness and we are satisfied that there was reasonable justification for permitting the prosecution to question him relative to former inconsistent statements. The question of surprise and the method of proving it are committed largely to the discretion of the trial court. Zipperlen v. Southern Pac. Co., 7 Cal.App. 206, 93 P. 1049.

The rule is thus stated in 27 Cal.Jur. p. 174, sec. 148: "In addition to the requirement that a witness give material testimony, in order that a party producing a witness may impeach him by proof of inconsistent statements, it must appear that such party has been misled and taken by surprise."

A reading of the record reveals that the requirements were met. Furthermore, Bagwell having admitted the inconsistent statements, surely no prejudice resulted. 27 Cal.Jur. p. 172, sec. 146, reads: "Improperly allowing or refusing to allow a party to prove the inconsistent statements of his witness is ground for reversal only when prejudice results therefrom."

The defendant's eighth, ninth and tenth assignments of error, respectively, allege misconduct on the part of the district attorney, prejudicial error in the refusal by the trial court to give "all or nearly all of the instructions proposed by the appellant applicable to the law of the case" and refusal by the court to permit the defendant to show that "immediately after the shooting he told his wife the same facts to which he testified at the trial."

We find no merit in such contentions. Nor has counsel shown this court wherein such alleged irregularities resulted in prejudicial error, thereby necessitating a reversal.

[21] The mere fact that all of the one hundred and ninety-five instructions offered by the defendant were not given surely is not a valid ground for reversal. Of the instructions so offered 28 were given as proposed and 4 were given as modified by the court. In addition many others were given at the request of the prosecution. There is no rule compelling a court to give every instruction offered, no matter how repetitious or immaterial.

Except as otherwise mentioned in this opinion, the trial court "fully, clearly and fairly" instructed the jury on all points of law "material to the case and necessary for the information of the jury." (8 Cal.Jur. 307, and cases cited.)

[22] Likewise we find no merit in the objection to the refusal of the court to receive in evidence the obviously self-serving statement of the defendant made to his wife immediately after the homicide. The case cited by the defendant in support of such contention (People v. Billings, 34 Cal. App. 549, 168 P. 396) is not in point. In that case it appears that shortly after the alleged crime statements were made by one who was subsequently called as a witness by the prosecution, but who, at the time of making the statements, had no knowledge that he "was either thought of, or sought for, as a witness." When called to testify such statements were admitted to rebut the inference which the defense sought to deduce that certain evidence given at the trial was of recent fabrication. No comparable situation exists in the present case.

It is very apparent from the transcript of the proceedings that every issue involved in the case was intelligently and strenuously contested, for which counsel are to be commended. But such observation does not signify that we endorse the acrimonious remarks of counsel. However, as the case must be returned on other grounds, no useful purpose would be served by pursuing this particular matter further.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is hereby remanded for a new trial in accordance with the opinion herein expressed.

THOMPSON, J., concurs.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

I dissent.

The majority opinion holds that the judgment must be reversed because the trial court gave two instructions which were erroneous. I am of the opinion that there was no error in the giving of one of these instructions, and as to the other, that, while it was erroneous, no miscarriage of justice resulted therefrom. The first of these instructions was that the jury was not to consider "the defense talked of by the attorneys for the defendant and described by them as the right to evict a trespasser, because the evidence in the case is that the defendant did not shoot deceased because he was trespassing."

In support of the instruction and what I have said, I quote from the defendant's own testimony:

"Q. You had no reason to believe that he (deceased) would harm any of your property there, did you? A. No.

"Q. You had no thought of your property at the time you fired the shots, did you? A. No.

"Q. Your main thought, your only thought, was to protect yourself? A. Yes.

"Q. You didn't shoot him because he was on the place and you had told him to stay off, did you? A. No,—I might have. I don't know how to answer that question.

"Q. Well, if he hadn't come at you with the bar, you wouldn't have shot him, would you? A. No.

"Q. So it wasn't because of the mere fact that he was on the property that you owned, that he was shot, was it? A. Well, I was afraid of him.

"Q. Physical fear? A. Yes, sir."

Not only was the foregoing instruction proper because defendant testified that he had no thought of harm to his property when he shot, but the evidence shows without contradiction that at the time defendant returned to the scene of the homicide and, after arming himself with his gun, called the decedent to "Come over a minute", deceased was not trespassing but was where he had a right to be, in the home of the Spurlock family about to dine with them in response to their invitation so to do. While it is true that the Spurlock home was upon the ranch owned by defendant, it could not be seriously contended that a person who was in the home of the Spurlocks by their invitation was a trespasser upon the property of defendant. But even if decedent was upon appellant's premises without the latter's permission and against his will, appellant was not, for that reason, justified in shooting him. There is nothing in the evidence which even faintly suggests that when deceased came to the ranch just prior to the shooting he was contemplating the commission of a felony, nor anything showing that while on the premises he committed a felony. It appears without contradiction that he had come there to return his son's car and to ask his son, who was living with the Spurlocks and working for defendant, to drive deceased and Mr. Gage, his brother-in-law, back to their homes in Firebaugh whence the boy had brought them the morning of the homicide. While section 197 of the Penal Code, cited in the majority opinion, provides that a homicide is justifiable when committed by a person "in defense of habitation, property, or person, against one who manifestly intends or endeavors, by violence or surprise, to commit a felony, or against one who manifestly intends and endeavors, in a violent, riotous or tumultuous manner, to enter the habitation of another for the purpose of offering violence to any person therein", where, as here, there was no evidence that deceased intended or endeavored, by violence or surprise or otherwise, to commit a felony, or that he manifestly or at all intended or endeavored, in a violent or riotous or tumultuous manner, or at all, to enter the habitation of defendant for the purpose of offering violence to any person therein, or otherwise, obviously then, the trial court was fully justified in instructing the jury that they should not consider the defense referred to as the right to evict a trespasser. And in this connection we note also, as another reason why appellant was not entitled to rely upon such a defense, that section 197 of the Penal Code provides that a person relying upon the defense of habitation, property or person to justify a homicide, "if he was the assailant or engaged in mutual combat, must really and in good faith have endeavored to decline any further struggle before the homicide was committed." This defendant did not do.

The other instruction, the giving of which is held to constitute reversible error, reads: "No one has a right to kill another in self-defense unless such killing is really or apparently necessary for such defense. Before a person can justify taking the life of a human being on the ground of self-defense, he must, when attacked, employ all reasonable means within his power, consistent with his safety, to avoid the danger and avert the necessity for the killing."

That this instruction was erroneous may be conceded since it was condemned in People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 P. 187. But in that case prejudicial error was presumed from the giving of the erroneous instruction. However, since that decision, section 41½ of Article VI of the Constitution has been enacted, which specifically provides that no judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted in any case on the ground of misdirection of the jury, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The question before this court is, then, not whether the instruction was erroneous, but whether, upon an examination of the entire case, including the evidence, it resulted in a miscarriage of justice. In People v. Will, 79 Cal.App. 101, 248 P. 1078, 1085, a case decided in this district, among other errors complained of was the giving of an instruction regarding the consideration to be given by the jury to the testimony of the defendants. This court there said that a similar instruction given in People v. Maughs, supra, had been severely criticized and that the court had there said that in all future cases where such instruction was given the Supreme Court would hold the giving of it so prejudicial as to call for reversal; but that since the decision in the Maughs case section 4½ of Article VI of the Constitution had been adopted and that "While it was error to give the instruction, the evidence against the appellant is so strong and convincing that it cannot be held that there has been a miscarriage of justice." Also in People v. Bartol, 24 Cal. App. 659, 142 P. 510, an instruction similar to the one given in the Will case and condemned in the Maughs case, was relied upon for reversal; but this court said (24 Cal.App. at page 666, 142 P. at page 513) that the situation must be viewed in a different light from that which obtained when the Maughs decision was rendered, citing the foregoing Constitutional provision and People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 P. 1042. In the latter case the court said that prior to the enactment of the Constitutional provision the limitation of appellate jurisdiction to questions of law precluded reviewing courts from weighing the evidence for the purpose of forming an opinion whether the error had or had not in fact worked injury, and that, having no jurisdiction in matters of fact, appellate courts were bound to apply the doctrine that prejudice was presumed to follow from substantial error; that this had produced unsatisfactory results and that it was to avoid them that the Constitutional provision had been adopted. It went on to say, 165 Cal. at page 65, 130 P. at page 1046: "This much, however, we think may be safely said. Section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution must be given at least the effect of abrogating the old rule that prejudice is presumed from any error of law. Where error is shown, it is the duty of the court to examine the evidence and ascertain from such examination whether the error did or did not in fact work any injury. The mere fact of error does not make out a prima facie case for reversal which must be overcome by a clear showing that no injury could have resulted."

Also, 165 Cal. at page 66, 130 P. at page 1046: "The final test is the opinion of the appellate court upon the result of the error. No doubt this view requires the court, to some extent, to weigh the evidence, and form conclusions upon its weight—a function which, heretofore, has been reserved for the jury. But it cannot be doubted that the legislators, in proposing the amendment, and the electors, in adopting it, intended to put upon the courts the performance of just that function. We are not substituted for the jury. We are not to determine, as an original inquiry, the question of the defendant's guilt or innocence. But, where the jury has found him guilty, we must, upon a review of the entire record, decide whether, in our judgment, any error committed has led to the verdict which was reached. If it appears to our satisfaction that the result was just, and that it would have been reached if the error had not been committed, a new trial is not to be ordered."

Also see People v. Brown, 22 Cal.2d 752, 141 P.2d 1, where the giving of an instruction regarding the consideration to be given the testimony of defendant was held erroneous under the decision in the Maughs case, but the error was held not prejudicial, citing People v. Bartol, supra, and stating that the record contained substantial evidence connecting defendant with the homicide, and that the trial court had elsewhere correctly instructed the jury on the principle announced in the challenged instruction.

No presumption of prejudice to a defendant now arises from error or irregularity arising during the course of a criminal trial. On the contrary, we are prohibited from reversing judgments unless it is made to appear affirmatively, to the satisfaction of the court, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, that the error resulted in a miscarriage of justice. People v. Lapara, 181 Cal. 66, 72, 183 P. 545; People v. Watts, 198 Cal. 776, 793, 247 P. 884; People v. Mareck, 17 Cal.App.2d 278, 282, 61 P.2d 972; People v. De La Roi, 23 Cal.2d 692, 146 P.2d 225; People v. Cooper, 36 Cal.App.2d 6, 13, 14, 96 P.2d 1012; People v. Cowan, 38 Cal.App.2d 231, 246, 101 P.2d 125; People v. Keys, 62 Cal.App.2d —, 145 P.2d 589;

It is intimated, if not directly stated in the majority opinion, that defendant's plea of self-defense was denied to him. Such, however, is not the case. At defendant's request the trial court gave eleven instructions on self-defense as follows:

"You are instructed that a homicide is not always unlawful. A homicide may be entirely lawful and when a homicide is committed in self-defense, it is entirely lawful."

"You are instructed that the law of California does not compel a person to flee an attack, and seek safety in flight, but may stand his ground and defend himself, and, under some circumstances, may even pursue and slay his assailants."

"If you find that the deceased was the aggressor and if you further find that the defendant as a reasonable man was justified in believing himself to be in imminent danger of serious bodily injury or death at the hands of the deceased, then there is nothing further for you to consider, but you must return a verdict of not guilty."

"You are further instructed that the defendant in the exercise of the right of self-defense,—if you find the circumstances justified the defendant in exercising such right, was entitled to act upon the appearances as they presented themselves to the defendant at the time the defendant was assaulted by the deceased if you so found, and if those appearances justified the defendant in believing as a reasonable man that he was in danger of the infliction of serious physical injury upon him by the deceased, the defendant had a right to repel such assault by the use of all necessary force, even to the point of taking the life of the deceased."

"The jury may take into consideration the evidence of the defendant's knowledge, if any, at the time of the homicide of previous assaults, if any, made by the deceased on other persons in determining the condition or state of mind of the defendant at the time of the homicide, and whether such knowledge, if any, of the defendant, together with the other circumstances in evidence, as you find them, would reasonably have caused the defendant to shoot the deceased while the defendant was acting in self-defense."

"I instruct you that where one person threatens another with physical violence, and has the apparent ability to carry out such threats, the person threatened has the right to command the other to desist from carrying out such threats, and to draw or exhibit a revolver or other deadly weapon for the purpose of compelling the other to desist from violence."

"The defendant was entitled to act upon appearances and if the language and conduct of the deceased was such as to induce in the mind of a reasonable man under all the circumstances existing, and viewed from the standpoint of the defendant, a belief that he was about to be attacked and that serious bodily injury was about to be inflicted upon him by the deceased, it does not matter if such danger was real or was only apparent; and if the defendant acted in self-defense from real and honest convictions as to the character of the danger, induced by the existence of reasonable circumstances, you should find him not guilty, even though he was mistaken as to the extent of the danger."

"If you find from the evidence that the deceased was unarmed and threatened an assault and intended to commit a battery upon the defendant with the fists of him, the deceased, and if you also find from the evidence that the defendant at the time in question and theretofore was suffering from a heart ailment as the result of which the defendant was not in the same physical condition to withstand an assault and battery as would be a person without such heart ailment, the physical condition mentioned of the defendant would give the defendant the right which healthier persons might not possess of resorting to a deadly weapon, to-wit, a revolver, for his protection against such an assault and battery."

"One person may kill another upon a sudden quarrel or in the heat of passion and the killing may be entirely lawful. In this connection, you are instructed that if a person has the right under all of the circumstances of the case to shoot another in self-defense the exercise of this right does not make the act unlawful or constitute it a crime merely because it was done in a sudden quarrel or in the heat of passion. A shooting or a killing done in self-defense is entirely lawful whether or not it is done in a sudden quarrel or in the heat of passion."

"Homicide is the killing of a human being. All homicides are not criminal, that is, one person may kill another person and not be guilty of any crime under our law, as where such killing was done in the lawful exercise of the right of self-defense. A homicide may be either lawful or unlawful. It is only unlawful homicides that are made crimes by our laws."

"If you have a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant acted in self-defense, you must find him not guilty."

The foregoing instructions emphasized by repetition and elaboration the rules of law most favorable to appellant, and it is obvious that the jury were fully and fairly instructed as to defendant's right of self-defense; and while these instructions to some extent conflict with the one complained of as constituting prejudicial error, it was said in Wells v. Lloyd, 21 Cal.2d 452, 458, 459, 132 P.2d 471, that it does not follow that the giving of conflicting instructions will always mislead the jury and warrant a reversal; that in reviewing instructions an appellate court must read the charge as a whole and give the instructions a reasonable construction from the standpoint of their probable effect upon the jury. Also see Barsha v. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 32 Cal.App.2d 556, 565, 90 P.2d 371; Passarelli v. Souza, 37 Cal. App.2d 1, 5, 98 P.2d 809.

The majority opinion in this case cites People v. Zuckerman, 56 Cal.App.2d 366, 132 P.2d 545, 549, as comparable to the case before us. But the instruction held erroneous in that case went much farther than the one here under attack. It read:

"The defendant is not necessarily justified, because he actually believed that he was in imminent danger. When the danger is only apparent, and not actual and real, the question is: Would a reasonable man, under all the circumstances, be justified in such belief? If so, the defendant will be so justified if he in fact had such belief.

"If this was defendant's position, it was his right to repel the aggression and fully protect himself from such apparent danger. If he could have withdrawn from the danger, it was his duty to retreat. Between his duty to flee and his right to kill, he must flee; or, as the books have it, must retreat to the wall, but by this is not meant that a party must always flee, or even attempt flight. The circumstances of the attack may be such, the weapon if any, with which he is menaced of such a character that retreat might well increase his peril. By 'retreating to the wall' is only meant that the party must have availed himself of any apparent and reasonable avenues of escape by which his danger might be averted, and the necessity of slaying his assailant avoided." (Emphasis added.)

In the instruction given in the case before us the jury were not told that if defendant could have withdrawn from the danger it was his duty to retreat, that between his duty to flee and his right to kill he must flee, that is, "retreat to the wall"; here they were merely told that he must "employ all reasonable means within his power, consistent with his safety, to avoid the danger and avert the necessity for the killing". And if, as appellant contends, he shot in defense of his habitation, the foregoing language is not substantially different from the provision of section 197 of the Penal Code, supra. By the giving of the other instructions above quoted, the jury were fully instructed that if the circumstances justified the defendant in believing as a reasonable man that he was in danger, he had a right to stand his ground and defend himself, and to repel assault by use of all necessary force even to the taking of the life of his assailant; they were even told that if they found that deceased was the aggressor and that defendant as a reasonable man was justified in believing himself to be in imminent danger of injury or death at the hands of deceased, there was nothing further for them to consider, and they must return a verdict of not guilty.

The Zuckerman case is further distinguishable in that in that case certain instructions requested by defendant, which correctly stated the law as to the right of one assailed to stand his ground, were refused. Also there, the facts of the case are quite different from the facts in the case before us. Here the evidence shows conclusively that defendant, himself, created the situation that resulted in the killing. Knowing that deceased was at the Spurlock house, he went from the Bagwell house to his own residence, advised his wife to delay dinner, returned to the Bagwell house, took his gun from his car and put it in his belt, called to deceased to come to him from the Spurlock house, and, as deceased complied, invited a conflict by asking: "Can you whip me here?" This evidence plainly indicates that appellant was the aggressor; and while he testified that he was in fear of deceased, his conduct belies such statement.

Since the enactment of Article VI, section 4½, of the Constitution it has become, not only the right, but the duty of an appellate court, in reviewing instructions, to read the charge as a whole, to give the instructions a reasonable construction from the standpoint of the jury, and to determine therefrom, and from the evidence in the case, whether it is probable that in the absence of the erroneous instruction the jury would not have returned the verdict, and, therefore, a miscarriage of justice, within the meaning of the constitutional provision, has resulted. As was said in People v. Rogers, 22 Cal.2d 787, 807, 141 P.2d 722, 732, "The question for an appellate court under these circumstances is whether, considering the entire record, the challenged instruction may have prejudiced the convicted person's rights. Const., art. VI, sec. 4½. If it is probable that in the absence of a misleading instruction the jury would not have returned the verdict complained of, then there has been a miscarriage of justice within the meaning of the constitutional provision."

In my opinion the evidence of defendant's guilt is clear and convincing and, in view of the evidence and the entire charge of the court, no different verdict would have resulted had the erroneous instruction not been given. Generally speaking there is little conflict in the evidence. While defendant testified that as deceased approached him he held a piece of pipe in both hands, this is contradicted by both Bagwell and his wife, who testified that they saw no object in decedent's hands except his hat. It was daylight at the time of the shooting and Mrs. Bagwell stated she saw decedent as he was coming from the Spurlock house after defendant called him. She further testified that the piece of pipe in question was at the cesspool, some distance away from the shooting, after the tragedy occurred, and that it had been there for ten days before. The shooting occurred at about 7:00 o'clock in the evening and at 8:30 o'clock the sheriff was on the scene to investigate. With the aid of Mr. Bagwell and a flashlight he searched the ground where the shooting occurred, located the two bullet holes, recovered one of the bullets and marked the bullet holes. He also traced the blood from the place of the shooting to the Spurlock house, a distance of about 150 feet. He saw many different objects around the premises but neither he nor either of the Bagwells saw the piece of pipe near the scene of the shooting. Later, about 12:30 o'clock, the sheriff returned to the scene to recover the other bullet, and on this second visit he saw a piece of pipe "one step" from the bell pole where deceased was shot. Though both Mr. and Mrs. Bagwell were eye-witnesses to the tragedy, neither of them saw any pipe in the immediate vicinity of the shooting. Doubtless if deceased had dropped the piece of pipe when he was shot, as defendant testified, the sheriff or Mr. Bagwell would have seen it at the place of the shooting when the 8:30 p. m. search was made and the bullet holes found. It was 3 feet long and 1½ inches in diameter so that it could not have been easily overlooked. By their verdict of murder of the second degree it is clear that the jurors concluded the deceased did not carry a piece of pipe as claimed by defendant.

Defendant also discredited his testimony that deceased advanced toward him with the piece of pipe held in both hands up to his right shoulder, when he testified that, when he fired the second shot, deceased "stopped and dropped the pipe and grabbed his leg with one hand and I guess his hat with the other." It is not reasonable to believe that decedent thus carried the pipe in both hands and yet had his hat in either hand. Furthermore the testimony as to the conversation between the two men at the time of the shooting is not consistent with defendant's contention that he shot in self-defense. It was as follows:

"Defendant: Can you whip me here?"

"Deceased: I still can if you'll come out in the road, you big Texas longhorn son-of-a-bitch, you're just a coward.

"Defendant: I asked you not to come on my premises any more.

"Deceased: I'll come to Spurlock's as long as Lawrence [his son] works there.

"Defendant: I'll see whether you come."

Defendant immediately followed with two shots fired in rapid succession when the men were about 5 or 6 feet apart. When the first shot was fired decedent stepped backward, and after the second said: "Don't shoot me any more, Reese," and retreated to the Spurlock house. If deceased had the piece of pipe as defendant claims, there would have been no occasion for his asking defendant to "come out in the road"; and if defendant fired because of fear of bodily harm he would not have said, "I'll see whether you come." Furthermore, the conduct of defendant after the shooting is not consistent with a shooting solely in self-defense. Immediately after the shooting he drove a short distance away and put the gun and shells in a vineyard. He then went to his home where he remained a few minutes during which he tried to telephone to his attorney, Mr. Preston, at Merced. Failing to contact Mr. Preston he telephoned to and made an appointment with Mr. Braucht, Mr. Preston's partner. On his way to Merced he stopped at Harry Taff's, saw Mrs. Taff, talked with her about a minute, then he went on and stopped at Mr. Nancarrow's and saw and talked with Mrs. Nancarrow. Mr. Nancarrow was not at home. (The Taffs and the Nancarrows subsequently were witnesses for the defense and had been in the barroom during the incident at Planada.) Appellant then went to the home of attorney Braucht and together they went to the home of attorney Hugh Landrum where the shooting was discussed. While this discussion was going on attorney Braucht drove 12 or 15 miles to the Bagwell home to procure Mr. Bagwell to come to attorney Landram's home for an interview, but Mr. Bagwell was not at home. The meeting at the home of attorney Landram continued from about 8:30 to about 11:00 o'clock p. m. when defendant, accompanied by counsel, surrendered to the public authorities.

The evidence is uncontradicted that the decedent and appellant had met about an hour before the shooting in the barroom at Planada, about four miles from defendant's ranch, and there had engaged in a conversation and some heated words; that defendant left the barroom and went outside followed by deceased, who called the defendant a vile name but made no gesture toward physical violence. From Planada defendant went to the Bagwell house and after talking with Bagwell, went to his own residence, about a half mile away, there told his wife to delay cooking the meat, went back to Bagwell's and from there called to deceased at the Spurlock house, about 150 feet away, to come to him. According to the testimony of the members of the Spurlock family, when called out of their house by defendant, deceased was about to dine with them and was in jovial spirits, laughing and joking "as usual". Twice the defendant was in his own home and away from the deceased and yet he chose to arm himself and to invite the deceased into an affray by saying: "Can you whip me here?" As was said by this court in People v. Fitch, 28 Cal.App.2d 31, 39, 81 P.2d 1019, 1023, "The jury was warranted in concluding that if the defendant was really afraid of bodily harm at the hands of the deceased, he might easily have avoided a conflict by remaining at his home." There had been a cooling-off period of about an hour between the incident at Planada and the actual shooting, during which deceased showed no signs of rancor. Had defendant refrained from inviting deceased to fight, no tragedy would have occurred.

There is further reason why this court should affirm the judgment in this case, and that is, that the contentions here made were fully presented to and argued before the trial court on motion for a new trial, which was denied. In Lafargue v. United Railroads, 183 Cal. 720, 192 P. 538, and in Hulburd v. Worthington, 57 Cal.App.2d 477, 134 P.2d 832, in passing upon the question of whether error had resulted in a miscarriage of justice so as to justify reversal where a new trial had been denied by the lower court, it was said that a trial court is in a much better position than an appellate court to determine whether the verdict of a jury was probably due to errors at the trial, and its conclusion in the matter should not be disturbed unless, under all the circumstances appearing, it was clearly wrong. Here the trial court heard the witnesses and observed their manner of testifying. It was in a much better position than this court can be, to determine whether the testimony of appellant that he was afraid of decedent and killed him in self-defense was convincing and credible. Had that court been of the opinion that there was a miscarriage of justice we must assume that it would have granted a new trial.

I am convinced that the verdict of the jury was just and that had the instruction complained of not been given, no different result would have followed, that the evidence fully sustains the verdict, and that it has not been made affirmatively to appear that there has been a miscarriage of justice. The judgment should be affirmed.

Unlawful detainer proceeding by Richmond A. Wrenn against Beverly Sutton to recover possession of certain housing ac-

SHAW, Presiding Judge.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment entered after the sustaining of a demurrer to the complaint in an unlawful detainer proceeding by which plaintiff seeks to recover the possession of certain housing accommodations occupied by defendant as his tenant.

[1,2] The only question presented by the appeal is whether the notice which, the complaint alleges, the plaintiff gave to defendant to terminate her month-to-month tenancy is sufficient for that purpose. That it complies with the provisions of California law is not disputed, but defendant contends that it does not satisfy the requirements of the O. P. A. Rent Regulation for Housing (8 Fed. Register 7322) issued pursuant to the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 901 et seq. We have already held that a complaint in unlawful detainer which does not show the service on the tenant of a notice sufficient to comply with that regulation fails to state a cause of action. Lester v. Isaac, Cal.Super.1944, 146 P.2d 524.

The regulation above mentioned provides, in section 6(d) (1), that: "Every notice to a tenant to vacate or surrender possession of housing accommodations shall state the ground under this section upon which the landlord relies for removal or eviction of the tenant." In order to comply with this requirement, a notice must state all the elements necessary, under the regulation, to constitute a ground for removal of a tenant and if it omits any of these elements it is insufficient. (Lester v. Isaac, supra.)

What, then, are the grounds referred to in the above quoted part of the regulation, and what constitute their elements? They are, of course, to be found in section 6, from which the quotation is taken. This section begins in subsection (a) with the provision that, "So long as the tenant continues to pay the rent to which the landlord is entitled, no tenant shall be removed from any housing accommodations, * * * unless." Then follow six numbered paragraphs, interconnected by the conjunction "or", each of which sets forth a set of facts, conditions or events. The plaintiff here is undertaking to proceed under the sixth of these paragraphs, which reads as follows: "(6) The landlord owned, or acquired an enforceable right to buy or the right to possession of, the housing accommodations prior to the effective date of regulation (or prior to October 20, 1942 where the effective date of regulation is prior to that date, or prior to November 6, 1942 for housing accommodations within the Hastings Defense-Rental Area), and seeks in good faith to recover possession of such accommodations for immediate use and occupancy as a dwelling for himself. If a tenant has been removed or evicted under this paragraph (a) (6) from housing accommodations, the landlord shall file a written report on a form provided therefor before renting the accommodations or any part thereof during a period of six months after such removal or eviction."

[3] The notice given by the plaintiff here stated sufficiently that he sought in good faith to recover possession of the housing accommodations for immediate use and occupancy as a dwelling for himself, but it entirely failed to state that he owned or acquired an enforceable right to buy or the right to the possession of the housing accommodations prior to the effective date of regulation (which in this Defense-Rental Area was November 1, 1942). It is contended by defendant that such ownership or right to buy or possess is an essential part of the ground for removal provided by paragraph (a) (6), and that a notice failing to state the facts in that respect does not comply with the regulation and affords no foundation for a proceeding to remove the tenant. We think this contention must be sustained.

The regulation obviously regards each of the numbered paragraphs of subsection (a) of section 6 as setting forth a ground or grounds for the removal of a tenant. Subsection (b), which immediately follows them, begins by stating, "No tenant shall be removed or evicted on grounds other than those stated above unless," etc. Some of these paragraphs provide for more than one ground, and in such case only one of them need be stated in the notice, but paragraph (6) cannot be construed to state more than one ground. The provision regarding the landlord's duty after the removal of the tenant cannot, of course, be a part of the ground for removing him, but both of the conditions stated in the remainder of the paragraph, that is, the time of acquisition of the landlord's rights and his desire in good faith for self occupancy etc., must concur in order to entitle him to proceed under the paragraph, and both of them together constitute the ground for removal which must be stated in the notice. None of the other paragraphs of subsection (a) says anything about the time of acquisition of the landlord's right or title, so that fact cannot be regarded as a common thread running through the whole pattern; it is something distinct and exclusive to paragraph (6), and we see no reason for holding that it is not to be regarded as a part of the ground of removal thereby provided.

On the other hand, reason does appear for so regarding it. The notice given by the landlord is for the information both of the tenant and of the area rent office, to which by section 6(d) (1) a copy of it must be given within twenty-four hours after its service on the tenant. It is to be noted that section 6(b) (1) and section 6(b) (2) of the regulation provide a mode by which the landlord may remove his tenant if the landlord acquired his rights after the date fixed by section 6(a) (6), supra. In such a case, the landlord must obtain a certificate from the administrator, authorizing him to proceed, and the paragraphs above cited set forth in detail the conditions under which such a certificate may be issued. The possession of such a certificate by the landlord is doubtless one of the "grounds" referred to in section 6(d) (1). Since, as held in Jones v. Shields, Cal.Super.1944, 146 P.2d 735, such a certificate is conclusive in a proceeding to remove the tenant, the ground on which the landlord relies and which he must therefore state in the notice would seem to be in such a case merely the issuance to him of a proper certificate, and, possibly, that he acquired his right or title after the date fixed by the regulation; the existence of conditions necessary to authorize its issuance need not be stated. The tenant on whom a notice is served must determine for himself whether it is well founded and should be obeyed, and the area rent office must likewise determine for itself whether the landlord is proceeding regularly and whether to appear in court, as it often does, and oppose him. Each would be considerably hampered in making such determination, without a statement in the notice, of the time when the landlord's rights had been acquired, so that they might know whether the landlord can proceed without a certificate.

[4] There is language in Bumgarner v. Orton, Cal.Super.1944, 146 P.2d 67, and Lester v. Isaac, supra, Cal.Super. 146 P.2d 524, which possibly suggests to hasty readers, but does not state, that the ground of removal under section 6(a) (6) of the regulation is merely the landlord's desire in good faith to recover possession of the housing accommodations for his own use, etc., and that the date of acquisition of his right or title does not constitute a part of that ground, and it is argued here that the notice in the Bumgarner case (which is not set forth in the opinion) is in fact no better than that now before us. But no such point as is now made was presented to us or considered in either of those cases, and we had no intent to decide it and did not decide it. A decision cannot be regarded as authority for a legal proposition which upon the facts of the case might have been, but in fact, was not raised or decided.

The judgment is affirmed, respondent to recover her costs of appeal.

WILLARD H. GEORGE, Limited, v.
BARNETT et al.
Civ. A. 5747.

Superior Court, Appellate Department,
Los Angeles County, California.

July 25, 1944.

1. Appeal and error ☞1010(1)

Trial court's finding of facts supported by evidence is binding on superior court.

2. Execution ☞41 Trusts ☞81(4)

Where conditional sales contract of new automobile was signed by claimant's mother in claimant's presence, and automobile was registered in name of claimant's mother as owner as a matter of convenience only and claimant made all payments and regarded automobile as hers and had no intention of making a gift to her mother, a resulting trust arose in claimant's favor so as to defeat execution levied on automobile against mother by mother's creditor. Vehicle Code §§ 140, 141, 186, St.1935, pp. 108, 118.

3. Trusts ☞86

Presumption that ownership of personalty is intended to be in person furnishing funds for its purchase is rebuttable where property is conveyed to different person by showing that it was intended for different person.

4. Trusts ☞86

The fact that person furnishing consideration for purchase of automobile was daughter of person to whom automobile was transferred did not give rise to any rebutting inference that daughter intended to make gift to mother as it would if relationship were reversed.

5. Execution ☞145

Plaintiff could not acquire by levy of execution on automobile any greater rights than defendant had therein.

6. Automobiles ☞19

The rights of daughter to ownership of automobile by purchase thereof and payment of purchase price were not forfeited because of subsequent registration of automobile in name of mother for convenience only without intention to transfer title to the mother since registration might have been revoked had true facts of ownership been known. Appeal from Municipal Court of City of Los Angeles; John J. Ford, Judge.

Action by Willard H. George, Limited, a corporation, against Anna Laura Barnett, etc. Plaintiff recovered a judgment and caused execution to be levied upon an automobile. Maxine Lowe filed a third party claim. From a judgment for the third party claimant, plaintiff appeals.

Meserve, Mumper & Hughes and John A. White, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

D. W. Cozad, Tripp, Calloway, Sampson & Dryden, and DeWitt Morgan Manning, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, Presiding Judge.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment given under section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure in favor of the third party claimant after a levy of execution. The property levied upon, a 1942 model automobile, was bought from a dealer in November 1941, on a conditional sale contract, was then registered with the State Vehicle Department in the name of the claimant's mother, who is the defendant against whom the execution runs, and remained so registered at the time of the levy.

The plaintiff contends that the registration of the automobile as above stated makes it subject to the levy, either because the claimant did not obtain a transfer of the car and its registration to her in the manner provided by the Vehicle Code, section 186, St.1935, p. 118, or because the registration of the car to her mother instead of herself was not in conformity to the Vehicle Code provisions regarding new registrations and was therefore void.

Section 175 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 115, which provides how a transfer of a registered vehicle shall be made, and section 186 which declares such a transfer ineffective unless made and completed by a change of registration in the manner so provided, are limited by their own terms to vehicles registered under the Vehicle Code. They do not apply at all to a vehicle not so registered, and there is no provision of the Vehicle Code which applies to or limits the acquisition or transfer of ownership in a new, unregistered vehicle until it is driven or moved upon a highway with some part of it in contact with the highway. Sections 140 and 141 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 108, which provide for and require the original registration of motor vehicles, do not operate upon a vehicle unless it is so driven or moved. Prior to that time the same rules apply as in case of other personal property generally.

[1] In this case it does not definitely appear from the record that the automobile was new and unregistered at the time of its purchase, although it is quite likely that a 1942 model car bought in November 1941 was then in that condition. However, the parties agree here that the automobile was in that condition when bought, so we accept this as one of the facts of the case. It further appears that the conditional sale contract was signed by the defendant in claimant's presence, and that with claimant's knowledge and consent the car was registered in the name of defendant as owner and Universal Credit Company as legal owner, but this was done as a matter of convenience, and claimant made all payments upon the purchase price of the car, regarded it as hers and had no intention of making a gift of it to defendant. The testimony showing these facts was accepted by the trial court as true and we are bound by its decision.

[2-4] On the facts above stated, as soon as the contract of sale was signed a resulting trust arose in favor of the third-party claimant, whereby she became the beneficial owner of all rights appearing to be in defendant by reason of the contract. Goes v. Perry, 1941, 18 Cal.2d 373, 379, 115 P.2d 441; Kirk White & Co. v. Bieg-Hoffine Co., 1935, 6 Cal.App.2d 188, 191, 44 P.2d 439; Thompson v. Bank of California, 1906, 4 Cal.App. 660, 667, 88 P. 987. The presumption arising from the furnishing of the funds for the purchase by claimant is subject to rebuttal by evidence showing a gift was intended (25 Cal.Jur. 191), but the relationship between the parties here (claimant being the daughter of defendant) does not give rise to any rebutting inference (65 Cor.Jur. 416) as it would if the relationship were reversed. Quinn v. Reilly, 1926, 198 Cal. 465, 468, 245 P. 1091; Altramano v. Swan, 1942, 20 Cal.2d 622, 628, 128 P.2d 353; Gomez v. Cecena, 1940, 15 Cal.2d 363, 367, 101 P.2d 477. Moreover, if there were such an inference it would also be rebuttable, and the trial court's implied finding that there was no gift is supported by claimant's testimony to that effect.

[5] The plaintiff was therefore not entitled to levy on this car to enforce its judgment against the defendant, since it could acquire by the levy no greater rights than the defendant actually had. Kinnison v. Guaranty Liquidating Corp., 1941, 18 Cal.2d 256, 263, 115 P.2d 450; Jensen v. Hugh Evans & Co., 1941, 18 Cal.2d 290, 301, 115 P.2d 471; Kirk White & Co. v. Bieg-Hoffine Co., supra; Carpenter v. Devitt, 1942, 49 Cal.App.2d 473, 475, 122 P.2d 79. An exception to this rule would exist if plaintiff had extended credit to defendant in reliance on her ownership of the car (Sidney v. Wilson, 1924, 67 Cal.App. 282, 291, 227 P. 672), but the record negatives that possibility.

[6] The rights of the third-party claimant, which lawfully attached upon the purchase of the car, were not forfeited or taken away because of the subsequent registration of the car in the name of another. That registration may have been improperly made and subject to revocation by the Vehicle Department (V.C. sec. 233, St.1935, p. 124), and it might have been refused when applied for, if the true facts as to ownership had been known (V.C. secs. 148, 149, St.1935, p. 110); but while such revocation or refusal would preclude the operation of the car upon the highways

(V.C. sec. 140), there is nothing in the code or elsewhere in the law that would alter the property rights of the parties by reason of such revocation or refusal. The Vehicle Code contains no provision similar to that found in the Torrens Title Law affecting real property whereby the certificate of registration is made conclusive on the title to the registered property.

The judgment is affirmed, respondent to recover costs of appeal.

PEOPLE v. JONES.

Cr. 4503.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 1, 1944.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 24, 1944.

1. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 229

Robbery $\hookrightarrow$ 24(3)

Evidence, aside from purported confession, was insufficient to identify defendant as one of two persons who allegedly committed a robbery and murder. Pen. Code, § 190.

2. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 517(1)

Before a confession is admissible, it must be shown by the prosecution that it is voluntary and made without any previous inducement or means of any intimidation or threat.

3. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 736(2)

The admissibility of a confession is preliminarily a question for trial court.

4. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 531

Before a confession is admitted there must be evidence from which it is possible to determine that the confession was voluntarily made.

5. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 1158(4)

While the weight of the evidence addressed to the circumstances surrounding the obtaining of a confession is to be determined preliminarily by the trial court, the circumstances constituting improper influences that would exclude a confession present questions of law reviewable by appellate court.

6. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 519(2)

Where defendant is subjected to threats or violence and within a few days thereafter he makes a confession, it may not be introduced in evidence unless it clearly appears that such improper treatment did not cause him to confess.

7. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 531(1)

Where defendant makes a confession due to threats and violence and a few days later makes another confession, there is a presumption that the influence of the prior improper treatment continues to operate on the mind of defendant and that the subsequent confession is the result of the same influence which rendered the prior confession inadmissible, and burden is upon prosecution to clearly establish the contrary.

8. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 519(2)

Where a defendant makes a confession as the result of threats and violence, the determination of extent of the influence persisting at time subsequent confession is made rests upon attendant circumstances, and the inquiry is whether considering the age and intelligence of defendant the nature and degree of influence, and the time intervening between confessions, it can be said that defendant was not induced to confess by reason of the pressure which motivated him to make the first statement, or was not influenced so to do by reason of the entire confession itself.

9. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 519(2)

Where a 17-year-old negro was arrested and without the aid or advice of friend or counsel was thereafter questioned and rudely beaten, although urging his innocence of murder charge, until a confession was obtained and a few days later a subsequent confession was made to other officers upon further questioning, the subsequent confession was improperly admitted in evidence as presumptively involuntary in the absence of evidence clearly establishing the contrary.

Reversed.

Henry W. Hache, of San Diego, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., Ralph W. Scott, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas Whelan, Dist. Atty., and H. P. Mack, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for respondent.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

Defendant Jones and Charles Ivan Baa were jointly tried and convicted under an information charging murder, conspiracy to commit robbery, and robbery. A judgment imposing the death penalty on Baa was affirmed in People v. Baa, Cal.Sup., 150 P.2d 1. Defendant being only seventeen years of age at the time of the commission of the offenses was sentenced to life imprisonment. See Pen.Code, § 190.

Tom Din Toy, a Chinese, was robbed and shot about 1:30 o'clock on the morning of October 5, 1942, as he entered the hallway of the Service Hotel in San Diego. Two men were seen to follow Toy into the hallway of the hotel, and immediately thereafter a shot was heard and two men ran from the hotel into the street. Baa was taken into custody as he attempted to hide from the police under an automobile parked near the hotel entrance. The other man escaped. Baa was identified by Toy and by a hotel clerk as the man who did the shooting. He was also identified by a sergeant of the United States Marine Corps and two police officers as one of the men who ran from the hotel immediately after the shot was fired.

Defendant was arrested approximately one month later in the city of Los Angeles where he lived. None of the witnesses who identified Baa as being at the scene of the shooting was able to identify defendant. One of the officers who saw the two men run from the hotel entrance, and who immediately took Baa into custody, said he could not identify defendant as the second man and that to his knowledge the first time he ever saw defendant was in the courtroom. He added that the man being pursued and fired at by his fellow officer seemed to "stagger," "slip" or "drop" in a position as though hit. It was not shown that defendant ever suffered a gunshot wound. The second officer testified he pursued and fired three times at the escaping man, who fell as he turned the corner. He also was unable to identify defendant as the man he pursued. A chambermaid in the hotel where Baa had a room said he lived there with a man known as "Little Willie"—who was not the defendant.

The uncontradicted evidence, including the testimony of Baa, is that Baa and his companion followed Toy across the street to the Service Hotel immediately before the shooting. The Dew Drop Inn, a restaurant, was located diagonally across the street from the Service Hotel. Mrs. Fanny Batts, one of the owners of the Dew Drop Inn, called by the prosecution, testified that a minute or two before the shooting she saw two men standing in a doorway near her restaurant and across the street from the Service Hotel. One of these men she positively identified as Baa, and she testified that his companion "was a Filipino or Mexican." (Defendant is a Negro.) The witness was not asked any further questions on direct examination concerning Baa's companion, and it does not appear that before giving her testimony she knew defendant was a Negro. On cross-examination she was asked if it was a Negro with Baa and she replied, "It wasn't a Negro." Defendant was requested to stand and the witness was asked if he was the man she saw with Baa. She answered "Absolutely not * * * It wasn't him."

Dan Wysinger, a Negro boy, who was taken into custody by the police in connection with the investigation of the crime, testified that he had known defendant for some time, and that on Sunday evening, about three hours before the shooting, he saw defendant with Baa and another man walking together. The witness asked defendant where he was going and defendant said he was going "to knock over, to knock out a job" and that he "would have to get some money before daylight in the morning."

DeHart Box, a friend of Wysinger called by the prosecution, testified that he saw and talked to defendant at the Dew Drop Inn about fifteen minutes before the shooting. Defendant told Box "he had won $86 and was going home." Box stated that he and defendant left the Dew Drop Inn together, that as they came out he saw a person who looked like Charles Baa standing near the entrance to the restaurant, and that "he was just standing there. He didn't speak or say anything." Defendant and Box walked down the street together and stopped at a near-by poolroom where they parted. About ten minutes later Box heard a shot. The witness was confused as to times and places, and his testimony, which is conflicting, is here stated most favorably to the prosecution.

[1] The foregoing evidence is clearly insufficient to establish that defendant was guilty of any of the offenses charged. The only other evidence connecting defendant with the crime was an oral confession which Officer Wells of the San Diego Police Department testified defendant freely and voluntarily made to him on November 7, 1942, at police headquarters in San Diego. Prior to the admission of the purported confession, the trial judge received evidence of the circumstances relating thereto. At the conclusion of this evidence, Officer Wells was permitted to testify, over the objection of defendant, to the oral confession which he stated defendant made to him. The following is a recital in substance of the testimony of defendant given on voir dire examination and as a witness in his own behalf:

In 1942, defendant was living in Los Angeles where he was employed as a shipping clerk by the California Walnut Growers Association at $59 a week. At the same time he worked at night as assistant manager of the Red Cap Shoe Shine Stands with locations in Hollywood and Los Angeles, for which he received a guaranteed compensation of $30 a week. On Friday, October 2, 1942, he cashed his pay check from the association and left for San Diego to visit his sister. He stayed at her house Friday night. On the night of Sunday, October 4th, defendant went with a party of friends to the "P.D.Q." café, which is in the general neighborhood of Fourth and Market Streets in San Diego. The party arrived about 11:30 p. m. and remained until about 2:30 o'clock the next morning. While they were still at the café, policemen entered and questioned everyone, including defendant, about the shooting of a Chinese earlier that night. (Defendant was corroborated as to his presence at the "P.D.Q." at the time of the shooting by a member of his party and the owner of the café.) The party went from the café to an all-night theater where they remained until 5:00 o'clock in the morning. Defendant returned to Los Angeles Monday afternoon, October 5th. He was arrested in Los Angeles on November 1, 1942, and taken to the police station where he was questioned by Officers Slager and Tetrich of the Los Angeles police. They asked defendant if he was implicated in any crime committed in San Diego. He told them he was not. The officers insisted that he was and tried to make him say so. When defendant declared he did not know anything about it, they "beat up on" him. Slager used a blackjack and Tetrich hit him with his fists. He was beaten twice a day for four days. On November 4th, Slager and Tetrich took defendant to a room in the Hall of Records and had started to beat him as they had before, when Officer Blucher of San Diego came into the room with several Los Angeles officers. Blucher told him that some people had seen him in San Diego near the place where the Chinese was shot, that one of the boys involved was caught and one of them escaped, and that he was being accused. Defendant told him he might as well tell them he "had been with the man that shot Abraham Lincoln" as to tell him he had been involved in anything of that sort. Tetrich was standing on one side of him and Slager was on the other side with a blackjack in his hand. Slager said, "You know you were in San Diego and implicated in what happened there," to which defendant replied, "Man, I don't know nothing about that." Slager hit him in the stomach about three times and he fell to the floor in a cramped position, whereupon Slager and Tetrich started kicking him all over and calling him names. One of them kicked him in the groin and when he got up Slager started hitting him on the head with a blackjack. Defendant said he was crying and was afraid, and didn't know what was going on, but that he had to say something as he did not want any more beatings, so he told them he was the boy that ran away. The officers then took him into another room where there was a typist and, in answer to questions, he repeated the same story Officer Blucher had told him. On November 5th, he was taken to San Diego. When he arrived at the jail he was treated by a doctor for the groin injury and sent to the County Hospital for further treatment. On November 7th, Officers Blucher and Wells took him from the jail to a room for questioning. They did not put handcuffs on him, and when they left the jail Officer Wells told him to run "so he could shoot" him. Neither Wells nor Blucher struck him. When he was brought into the room he was shaking, and Blucher told him to start talking or they would give him the same treatment he had received in Los Angeles. Officer Wells had something written on a piece of paper and he asked him to sign it. Wells told defendant that someone had seen him, and if he would sign the paper he would "get off light"—but he did not sign it. He was told two or three times if he did not talk he would get the gas chamber. Defendant further testified he did not make any statement but declared that whatever he said to Wells and Blucher was stated under fear that he would be subjected to the same treatment he had received in Los Angeles. Defendant declared he did not know Baa and had no connection with the shooting or anyone involved in it. (Defendant's testimony in this regard was corroborated by Baa, who, at the trial, repeated the story he told officers within a few minutes after his arrest, that one Jim Stewart, of whom he gave a detailed description, was his companion at the time the crime was committed. He testified that although he had seen defendant on a few occasions he had never known his name or talked to him. He denied that defendant was with him when Toy was shot or was in any way connected with the crime. Willie Davis, who roomed with Baa, and who was also charged with the murder of Toy, testified he had never seen defendant before his court appearance.)

Officer Blucher of San Diego testified that he saw defendant at the homicide bureau in Los Angeles on November 4th. Later on the same day, he was present while defendant was being questioned by Los Angeles police officers. The questioning continued for about thirty minutes, during which time he was present five or ten minutes. He testified he saw Tetrich slap defendant two or three times in the face and strike him two or three times in the stomach, and that "at that time [he] was called out of the room." Blucher did not see anyone kick defendant, and did not see a blackjack. When Blucher returned to the room defendant was talking about the crime, and appeared frightened. Defendant was then taken to another room where he made a statement in the presence of a stenographer, in which he confessed being implicated in the shooting. Defendant was brought to San Diego on November 5th. On November 7th, Blucher took defendant from the jail for questioning by Wells. Blucher testified that no threats or promises were made and there was no reference to the treatment defendant had received in Los Angeles. He added that defendant did not appear to be frightened, and that he freely and voluntarily gave a statement in which he admitted being implicated in the commission of the offenses charged.

Officer Wells examined defendant on November 7th at police headquarters in San Diego in the presence of Blucher. He testified that defendant answered questions freely and voluntarily, giving an account of his movements while in San Diego between October 1st and 5th. Wells made notes of what was said as the questioning proceeded, and some time thereafter he dictated the story related to him by defendant and then destroyed the original notes. He recited in great detail the story which he said was told to him by defendant, in which defendant assertedly admitted that he was present with Baa when Toy was robbed and shot, and that he was the boy that fled from the scene of the crime. At the time Wells conducted this examination he had been informed by Blucher of the treatment defendant had received at the hands of the Los Angeles police, and he had a copy of an unsigned statement said to have been made by defendant in Los Angeles. He testified, however, he did not mention the Los Angeles confession until after defendant told his story, and referred to it then only for the purpose of calling the attention of defendant to certain statements therein which were inconsistent with the story he had just related. Wells further stated that he did not ask defendant to sign anything. He testified that no threats or promises were made to defendant, and that he did not tell defendant to run so he could shoot him.

[2-5] The uncontradicted evidence establishes beyond any question that the statement made by defendant to the police in Los Angeles on November 4th was not free and voluntary. Undoubtedly because of the circumstances under which it was made, it was not offered in evidence. Therefore, the question for determination here is whether or not, under all the circumstances, the San Diego statement made three days later was properly admitted in evidence. Before a confession is admissible it must be shown by the prosecution that it was voluntary, and made without any previous inducement or by reason of any intimidation or threat. People v. Rogers, 22 Cal.2d 787, 804, 141 P.2d 722; People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 14, 112 P. 720, Ann.Cas.1912B, 1193; People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 394, 95 P. 863; People v. Miller, 135 Cal. 69, 71, 67 P. 12; The admissibility of a confession is preliminarily a question for the trial court to determine. People v. Lisenba, 14 Cal.2d 403, 421, 94 P.2d 569; People v. Ferdinand, 194 Cal. 555, 567, 229 P. 341; People v. Loper, supra, 159 Cal. 17, 112 P. 720, Ann.Cas.1912B, 1193; People v. Miller, supra, 135 Cal. 71, 67 P. 12; People v. Dye, 119 Cal.App. 262, 270, 6 P.2d 313; 2 Wharton's Criminal Evidence, p. 981, § 594. But before a confession is admitted there must be evidence from which it is possible to determine that the confession was voluntarily made. People v. Dye, supra, 119 Cal.App. 270, 6 P.2d 313. While the weight of the evidence addressed to the circumstances surrounding the obtaining of a confession is to be determined preliminarily by the trial court, the circumstances constituting improper influences that would exclude a confession present questions of law, reviewable by an appellate court. Cf. People v. Loper, supra, 159 Cal. 18, 112 P. 720, Ann.Cas.1912B, 1193; People v. Dye, supra, 119 Cal.App. 270, 6 P.2d 313; Davis v. State, 90 Fla. 317, 105 So. 843, 844; Ashcraft v. State of Tennessee, May 1944, 322 U.S. 143, 64 S.Ct. 921, 926, 88 L.Ed. 1192.

[6-8] If a defendant is subjected to threats or violence and within a few days thereafter he makes a confession, it may not be introduced in evidence unless it clearly appears that such improper treatment did not cause him to confess. In a situation such as here presented, there is a presumption that the influence of the prior improper treatment continues to operate on the mind of the defendant and that the subsequent confession is the result of the same influence which rendered the prior confession inadmissible, and the burden is upon the prosecution to clearly establish the contrary. People v. Johnson, 41 Cal. 452, 435; People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 15, 112 P. 720, Ann.Cas.1912B, 1193; People v. Dye, 119 Cal.App. 262, 270, 6 P.2d 313; Lang v. State, 178 Wis. 114, 189 N.W. 558, 24 A.L.R. 690, 22 C.J.S., Criminal Law, p. 1461, § 835; 24 A.L.R. 690, 695; 2 Wharton's Criminal Evidence, p. 998, § 601. The determination of the extent of the influence persisting at the time the subsequent confession is made rests, of course, upon attendant circumstances, and the inquiry is whether, considering the age and intelligence of the defendant, the nature and degree of the influence, and the time intervening between the confessions, it can be said that defendant was not induced to confess by reason of the pressure which motivated him to make the first statement, or was not influenced so to do by reason of the prior confession itself.

In Lisenba v. People, 314 U.S. 219, page 240, 62 S.Ct. 280, page 292, 86 L.Ed. 166, (Id., 14 Cal.2d 403, 94 P.2d 569), the confession was held not to have been induced by the prior improper conduct of the police for the reasons summarized by the United States Supreme Court, as follows: Defendant "said that the interrogation [by the police] would never have drawn an admission from him had his confederate not made a statement; he admits that no threats, promises, or acts of physical violence were offered him during this questioning or for eleven days preceding it. Counsel had been afforded full opportunity to see him and had advised him."

[9] Without resolving any of the conflicts in the evidence, the admitted or uncontradicted facts show that defendant, a 17-year-old Negro boy, was arrested on November 1st in Los Angeles and, without the aid or advice of friend or counsel, was thereafter questioned and brutally beaten by the police twice a day for three days. During this period he consistently urged his innocence. On the fourth day he was again cruelly beaten and kicked until, unable to endure the torture any longer, he said he "was the boy that run away" because he did not want any more beatings. Following such brutal treatment, defendant was taken to San Diego by Officer Blucher, who had participated to some extent in the unlawful inquisition in Los Angeles. Defendant was then subjected to further questioning by Blucher and Officer Wells at San Diego. Again defendant assertedly admitted his participation in the robbery and shooting of Toy. While both officers denied holding out any inducements or making any threats to defendant in San Diego, under all of the circumstances, the entire situation—shown in part by defendant's uncontradicted testimony and in part by admissions of the police—is so inherently coercive that its very existence is irreconcilable with the possession of the mental freedom essential to a valid confession. Moreover, it does not appear that the San Diego police cautioned defendant that his previous confession could not be used against him. For want of such information defendant might have concluded that he could not make his case worse than he already had made it and, under this impression, might have made the statements testified to by Officer Wells. See Flamme v. State, 171 Wis. 501, 177 N. W. 596, 598; 2 Wharton's Criminal Evidence, p. 998, § 601. We conclude, therefore, from facts which are not in conflict, that the San Diego confession was not voluntary and that it was improperly admitted in evidence.

The officers who secured the purported confession may have been sincere in their belief that defendant was guilty, and that the end justified the means. Law enforcement officers must understand, however, that a person suspected of crime has rights which must be respected, and that undue advantage must not be taken of his fears, hopes or weakness. For more than a century and a half the mistreatment of persons in custody has been condemned by our courts and there is no better settled rule than that confessions must be voluntary to be admissible in evidence. As stated by the Supreme Court in Ashcraft v. State of Tennessee, May 1944, 322 U.S. 143, 64 S. Ct. 921, 927, 88 L.Ed. 1192: "The Constitution of the United States stands as a bar against the conviction of any individual in an American court by means of a coerced confession. There have been, and are now, certain foreign nations with governments dedicated to an opposite policy: governments which convict individuals with testimony obtained by police organizations possessed of an unrestrained power to seize persons suspected of crimes against the state, hold them in secret custody, and wring from them confessions by physical or mental torture. So long as the Constitution remains the basic law of our Republic, America will not have that kind of government."

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

BIANCO v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
S. F. 16975.

Supreme Court of California.

July 25, 1944.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 21, 1944.

1. Workmen's compensation ⚙️1274

A proceeding to recover death benefits under the Compensation Act is timely if brought within one year after death regardless of date of injury and even if commenced more than one year after date of death where injury occurs within two years next preceding commencement of such proceeding. St.1937, p. 295, § 5406(a) (1).

2. Workmen's compensation ⚙️1274

Where injury causing death also caused disability which continued until death and for which a disability payment was awarded, a proceeding for death benefits would not be barred if brought within one year from date of death, regardless of date of injury and more than one year from death if injury occurred within less than 188 weeks before the death, assuming a 52-week year. St.1937, p. 295, § 5406(a) (2).

3. Workmen's compensation ⚙️1274

The provision that a compensation proceeding for death benefits "may be commenced" within certain periods is permissive and indicates legislative intent that applicant is to have the longer period rather than being restricted to the shorter one. St.1937, p. 295, § 5406.

4. Statutes ⚙️197

The word "and" may sometimes be interpreted as "or" to carry out the intention of the Legislature in drafting a statute.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "And" and "Or".

5. Workmen's compensation ⚙️1274

The purpose of Compensation Act sections pertaining to death benefits is to give a right to death benefits and not to cut off that right before it accrues. St.1937, pp. 295, 296, §§ 5404, 5406, 5409.

6. Workmen's compensation ⚙️1269

The Compensation Act section requiring liberal construction with the purpose of extending benefits for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment is to be applied when the issue is the interpretation of limitation provisions. St.1937, pp. 265, 295, §§ 3202, 5406.

7. Workmen's compensation ⚙️52

Where a provision of Compensation Act is susceptible of an interpretation either beneficial or detrimental to an injured workman or his beneficiaries, the construction beneficial to such workman or his beneficiaries must be adopted. St. 1937, p. 265, § 3202; Const. art. 20, § 21.

8. Workmen's compensation ⚙️1274

The Compensation Act provision pertaining to limitations will not be construed as denying recovery of death benefits when workman's death occurs more than two years after injury in view of requirements for liberal construction and in view of fact that death benefits are part of scheme of compensation. St.1937, pp. 265, 295, §§ 3202, 5406; Const. art. 20, § 21.

9. Workmen's compensation ⇨1274

The right of a dependent of a workman to a death benefit is independent of and severable from workman's claim for disability compensation, and does not arise until death of workman and may not be cut off before it arises. St.1937, p. 295, § 5406; Const. art. 20, § 21.

10. Workmen's compensation ⇨1269

In order to preserve beneficial purposes of workmen's compensation, the provisions on limitation should not be construed in a manner which will result in the right being lost before it accrues unless language of such provisions clearly compels such interpretation. St.1937, p. 295, § 5406.

11. Workmen's compensation ⇨1274

The legislative history of Compensation Act sections limiting period for commencement of proceeding for collection of death benefits by an injured workman's beneficiary disclosed legislative intent that proceeding may be commenced either one year after death or two years after injury, whichever fixes period at the later date. St.1937, p. 295, § 5406.

EDMONDS, J., and GIBSON, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Proceedings on petition by Adelina Bianco for a writ of review to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission denying petitioner's claim for compensation for the death of her husband, Domenic Emile Bianco, opposed by Gladding, McBean & Co., employer, and others.

Award annulled with directions.

Prior opinion, 142 P.2d 73.

Sefton & Quattrin, Seibert L. Sefton, and Louis T. Kruger, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Everett A. Corten, Fred G. Goldsworthy, Keith & Creede, Charles Mayer, W. N. Mullen, Donald J. Gallagher, and Edmund J. Thomas, Jr., all of San Francisco, for respondents.

CARTER, Justice.

It is claimed that Domenic Emile Bianco, an employee of Gladding, McBean & Company, died on June 11, 1941, from silicosis contracted in the course of his employment. The respondent commission found that he suffered the "injury" silicosis in April, 1939, and inasmuch as Bianco's dependent did not file her claim until December 1, 1941, the claim was barred because not filed within two years after the injury in April, 1939.

The pertinent provisions of law with regard to limitations are as follows:

"The periods within [which] may be commenced proceedings for the collection of the death benefit * * * are as follows:

"(a) One year from the date of death, and in any event within—

"(1) Two years from the date of injury, except as otherwise provided in this section.

"(2) 240 weeks from the date of injury, where the injury causing death also caused disability which continued to the date of death and for which a disability payment has been made, or agreed to be made, or proceedings for its collection had been instituted within the time limits set forth in section 5405.

"(b) Two years from the date of injury, in cases described in section 5405(b)." (Italics added.) Labor Code, § 5406.

Subdivision (b) of the foregoing has no application here because that refers to section 5405(b) which involves cases where there is an agreement for a release or compromise. Subdivision (a)(2) does not factually apply for the events there mentioned did not occur. The foregoing section establishes a limitation of time and does not extinguish the right: "The running of the period of limitations prescribed by this chapter is an affirmative defense and operates to bar the remedy and not to extinguish the right of the employee. Such defense may be waived. Failure to present such defense prior to the submission of the cause for decision is a sufficient waiver." Labor Code, § 5409. And section 5404 of the Labor Code provides that: "Unless compensation is paid or an agreement for its payment made within the time limited in this chapter for the institution of proceedings for its collection, the right to institute such proceedings is barred." This provision gives expression to the same thought by specifying that the remedy to enforce the right is barred rather than that the right itself is extinguished.

[1-5] In our opinion the most reasonable construction of section 5406(a)(1) is that the proceeding for a death benefit may be commenced either one year after death or two years after the injury, whichever fixes the period at the later date. Under such an interpretation a proceeding to recover a death benefit would be timely if brought within one year after the death regardless of the date of injury, and even if commenced more than one year after the date of death where the injury occurred within two years next preceding the commencement of said proceeding. Likewise, a case falling within section 5406(a)(2) would not be barred if brought within one year from the date of death regardless of the date of the injury and more than one year from death if the injury occurred within less than 188 weeks before the death, assuming a 52 week year. The language of section 5406 is that the proceeding may be commenced within certain periods. The phrasing is permissive and affirmative which clearly indicates that the applicant is to have the longer period rather than being restricted to a shorter one. That thought is expressed by the use of the word "and" preceding the phrase "in any event." If the word "but" had been used rather than "and" the reference to a two-year period after the injury would be a limitation. If the word "or" had been used there it would be beyond question. If "and" be given its ordinary meaning of "as well as" or "in addition to," the section might be paraphrased to read: "The proceeding may be commenced within one year from the date of death as well as, (in addition to) in any event, (that is, regardless of the date of death) within two years from the date of injury."

Moreover, the word "and" may sometimes be interpreted as "or" to carry out the intention of the Legislature in drafting a statute. See People v. Pool, 27 Cal. 572; Washburn v. Lyons, 97 Cal. 314, 315, 32 P. 310; Diggins v. Hartshorne, 108 Cal. 154, 41 P. 283; McNutt v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 245, 201 P. 592; Santos v. Dondero, 11 Cal.App.2d 720, 54 P.2d 764. The evident purpose of the statute here involved is to give a right to death benefits and not to cut off that right before it accrues.

[6,7] There are additional persuasive reasons which support the foregoing construction even assuming that it is possible to construe it to mean that the proceeding must be commenced within two years from the date of the injury, although the death may not have occurred within that time. First, the workmen's compensation laws must be given a liberal construction to the end that the beneficial features thereof shall not be lost to employees. That rule is declared as follows: "The provisions of Division IV and Division V of this code shall be liberally construed by the courts with the purpose of extending their benefits for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment." Labor Code, § 3202. See, also, 27 Cal.Jur. 259 et seq. And that rule is applied where the issue is the interpretation of the limitation provisions of the act. See Ocean A. & G. Corp., Ltd., v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 90 Cal.App. 725, 266 P. 556; Harris v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 204 Cal. 432, 268 P. 902. Specifically, "Where, as here, a provision of the act is susceptible of an interpretation either beneficial or detrimental to an injured employee, we are called upon, under the provisions of section 69, to adopt the construction beneficial to such employee." Liptak v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 200 Cal. 39, 42, 251 P. 635, 636. In Department of Motor Vehicles v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 14 Cal.2d 189, 93 P. 2d 131, the issue was whether section 4804 of the Labor Code which provided that "no disability indemnity shall be paid to said member [of the highway patrol] concurrently with wages or salary payments" prevented permanent disability payments to a patrolman suffering permanent disability but still working and being paid a salary, in light of other provisions of the act which allowed disability payments generally. The court held it did not have such effect, stating at page 192 of 14 Cal.2d, at page 133 of 93 P.2d:

"Petitioner claims that inasmuch as this employee was a member of the state highway patrol it finds such prohibition in section 4804 of the Labor Code, which, it urges, prevents an award to a state highway patrolman concurrent with the payment of salary. The effect of this contention would, in fact, go to the extent of preventing a highway patrolman, under any circumstances, receiving a permanent disability industrial award.

"* * * In construing this section, petitioner contends that 'no disability indemnity' unequivocally means compensation for either temporary or permanent disability, and that to sustain the award would defeat the sole purpose of this section.

"The point is not without merit, but, having in mind the direct admonition of section 3202 of the Labor Code that 'the provisions of Division IV (which includes the sections here under consideration) and Division V of this code shall be liberally construed by the courts with the purpose of extending their benefits for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment', and the evident purpose of the law to protect and compensate those members of the highway patrol whose principal duties consist of active law enforcement, we should adopt, if possible, that construction of section 4804 which would enable the injured officer to receive the benefits of the act rather than accept a literal construction which would tend to deprive him of all disability indemnity, and not only render meaningless the language of section 4803, but also provide a rule for highway officers different from that applicable to others." (Italics added.)

Similarly, in the instant case the statute undeniably provides for death benefits and such benefits are a part of the scheme of compensation as is further evinced by the Constitution where it is stated: "The Legislature is hereby expressly vested with plenary power, * * * to create, and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation, by appropriate legislation, and in that behalf to create and enforce a liability on the part of any or all persons to compensate any or all of their workmen for injury or disability, and their dependents for death incurred or sustained by the said workmen in the course of their employment, irrespective of the fault of any party." Const., art. XX, § 21. Likewise, in the instant case that right would be lost before it ever arose if the above-mentioned possible construction were given.

[8-10] Second, if a construction is given to the provision which will deny recovery where the death occurs more than two years after the injury, the right of the dependent would be barred before it accrued. That result is contrary to the principle of liberal interpretation and to the intent expressed by section 5409, heretofore quoted, which declares that the limitation provisions are affirmative defenses and do not extinguish the right. That the right would be lost before it accrued under such interpretation is clear. The right of a dependent to a death benefit is a right independent of and severable from the employee's claim for disability compensation. See Glavich v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 44 Cal.App.2d 517, 112 P.2d 774. While it may be that the dependents, or others interested, may, under appropriate circumstances, claim compensation on behalf of the employee during his life (see Labor Code, §§ 4903, 5501; Pacific E. I. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 10 Cal.2d 567, 75 P.2d 1058; Independence Indem. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 2 Cal.2d 397, 41 P.2d 320; Northwestern R. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 184 Cal. 484, 194 P. 31), and thus toll the running of the statute, yet it cannot be doubted that the claim for a death benefit does not arise until the death of the employee, and it may be cut off before it arises if that interpretation be accepted. Moreover, as far as appears, the conditions specified in section 4903 of the Labor Code, under which a wife may claim compensation, namely, desertion or neglect by the husband of his wife, are not present in this case. In order that the beneficial purposes of the Workmen's Compensation Law may not be destroyed, the provisions on limitation should not be interpreted in a manner which will result in the right being lost before it accrues unless the language of such provisions clearly compels such interpretation. See Burke v. Industrial Commission, 368 Ill. 554, 15 N.E.2d 305, 119 A.L.R. 1152; Hoy v. T. S. Grayson Lumber Co., 15 La.App. 176, 130 So. 651; Hovey v. General Const. Co., 242 Mich. 84, 218 N.W. 768.

[11] Third, the history of the limitation provisions indicates that the present law should be given the second construction. The first Workmen's Compensation Act provided that if no payment of compensation was made or notice given within a year after the accident the claim for compensation was barred and in case of permanent disability the accident must have been the proximate cause of the death within fifteen years. Stats.1911, p. 796, §§ 8, 10. The act in effect before the adoption of the Labor Code in 1937 (Stats.1937, p. 185) read: "Proceedings for the collection of the death benefit provided by subsection (c) of said section 9 must be commenced within one year from the date of death, and in any event within two hundred forty weeks from the date of the injury, and can only be maintained when it appears that death ensued within one year from the date of the injury, or that the injury causing death also caused disability which continued to the date of the death and for which a disability payment was made, or an agreement for its payment made, or proceedings for its collection commenced within the time limited for the commencement of proceedings for the recovery of the disability payment." (Italics added.) Stats. 1917, p. 831, § 11, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1931, Act 4749. Under that statute it is expressly provided that a death benefit cannot be recovered unless the death occurred within one year from the date of the injury except where the disability continued from injury to death and compensation had been paid, agreed to be paid or proceedings therefor commenced. In other words, the proceedings must be commenced within one year from death and even before if 240 weeks from the date of injury has elapsed, with the further limitation that the death must have occurred within one year after the injury except in the special circumstances above mentioned. The change in the wording of the Labor Code is apparent and states the matter in quite different form. There is no restriction of death occurring within one year after the injury and the periods fixed are the ones within which the dependent may commence the proceeding.

There may be some merit in the contention that the foregoing construction of section 5406 is fraught with some dangers in respect to fraudulent and stale claims made by dependents long after the injury which ultimately causes death has occurred. If such should be the result, we believe that this is a matter for the Legislature, and it must be remembered that in such cases the burden is upon the applicant to prove that death was caused by an injury received in the course of employment.

Respondents rely upon Glavich v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 44 Cal.App.2d 517, 112 P.2d 774. That case is contrary to the views herein expressed, but apparently the court did not take into consideration the factors discussed herein. It is therefore disapproved. It is of interest to note that the point involved in the instant case was not presented to this court on petition for hearing in the Glavich case. An award had been made denying a death benefit to the employee's widow and minor children on the ground that their claim was barred.

The District Court of Appeal affirmed the part of the award denying recovery to the widow but annulled the part denying an award to the children. The widow did not petition this court for a hearing.

For the foregoing reasons the award is annulled and the respondent commission is directed to take such further proceedings as may be appropriate in conformity with the views herein expressed.

EDMONDS, Justice (dissenting).

Contrary to the conclusions of my associates, I plainly see in section 5406 of the Labor Code a legislative intention to fix two years from the date of an injury as the maximum time within which a claim for a death benefit may be filed unless "the injury causing death also caused disability which continued to the date of death and for which a disability payment has been made, or agreed to be made." By its terms the section provides that "proceedings for the collection of the death benefit" may be commenced within "one year from the date of death" except, "in any event," the proceedings may be commenced within "two years from the date of injury" or "240 weeks from the date of injury" under the conditions specified. The qualifying phrase "in any event" unquestionably limits the specified time of "one year from the date of death," and may be defined as synonymous with the expression "under all or any circumstances." As said in the leading case of Edwards v. Laird, 22 Cal.App. 398, 134 P. 365, 366, the phrase means "no matter what else may be" or "whatever may happen."

By stating that "the evident purpose of the statute here involved is to give a right to death benefits," the majority opinion disregards the general rule that "statutes of limitations do not confer any right of action but are enacted to restrict the period within which the right, otherwise unlimited, might be asserted." 37 C.J. 684. Implicit in the terms of section 5406 is recognition of the other provisions allowing dependents of a workman killed in industrial accident a death benefit. In compensation law it is generally recognized that "the purpose of the statute of limitations is to force an early submission of the claim to the Commission so that all vexatious problems * * * may be determined while all the facts are fresh in the minds of the various witnesses." Campbell, Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, 1935, p. 829. This court, in the case of Ehrhart v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 172 Cal. 621, 158 P. 193, 194, Ann.Cas.1917E, 465, recognized that the object of the periods of limitation provided in the Workmen's Compensation Act was to insure "prompt inquiry regarding the injuries in all their details by the commission. * * *" Accord, Rose v. Petaluma & Santa R. R. Co., 64 Cal.App. 213, 221 P. 406.

The section of the Labor Code limiting the time within which may be commenced proceedings for compensation indicate a purpose to insure a prompt hearing of the circumstances surrounding an industrial accident. The employer must be notified of any compensation claim (including medical, disability or death benefits) within thirty days from the date of injury, Labor Code, §§ 5400, 5401, 5402, unless the failure to give such notice does not mislead or prejudice the employer, Labor Code, § 5403. Proceedings for the collection of compensation by an employee during his lifetime must be commenced within six months from the date of injury although two years is allowed where the employer has acknowledged liability. Labor Code, § 5405. By the decision in the present case, a dependent may commence proceedings for the death benefit at any time, be it twenty or thirty years from the date of injury, as long as it is within one year from the date of death. That the occasion of the injury, rather than the date of death, should be determinative of the commencement of the running of the statute is obvious. By the lapse of time, an employer may be unable to produce evidence of the facts concerning an accident, and where labor turnover is substantial, as under present day conditions, the prejudicial effect of striking down the bar of the statute is particularly pronounced.

Moreover, to consider the date of death, regardless of the time of the injury, as the effective date fixed by the section renders meaningless its other provisions. By that construction, the proceeding may be commenced within one year from the date of death, in any event. To reach that result requires that the qualifying phrase "in any event" be read as preceding the words "one year from the date of death" which is the language which they limit, and I see no reasonable basis for the conclusion that the sole function of the provisos (a)(1) and (a)(2) of section 5406 is to extend beyond one year from the date of death the period within which the action may be commenced. Rather than imputing to the Legislature an intent not to attach meaning to all the provisions of said statute, consonant with a reasonable plan of limitations, it is the function of this court, where the meaning is clear and reasonable, to give effect to the intent expressed.

Notwithstanding the statutory language, Justice CARTER justifies his position by reasoning that, as interpreted by the commission, section 5406 would compel an employee to die within two years from the date of injury as a condition precedent to the recovery of a death benefit. That is an incomplete statement. The Legislature has plainly said that if a death benefit is demanded on account of an injury for which payment on account of disability has been made, or agreed to be made, or claimed in a proceeding instituted within the applicable time, then the dependent shall have 240 weeks from the date of injury within which to file his claim. Measured by the time allowed in other states, 240 weeks almost five years, is a very liberal period. Dragicevic v. State Industrial Acc. Comm., 112 Or. 569, 230 P. 354 (one year); Martini v. Kemmerer Coal Co., 38 Wyo. 172, 265 P. 707 (twelve months); Frary v. Roxana Petroleum Corp., 135 Kan. 216, 9 P.2d 652 (six months); Ohio Oil Co. v. Industrial Comm., 293 Ill. 461, 127 N.E. 743 (six months); Vukovich v. St. Louis, R. M. & P. Co., 40 N.M. 374, 60 P.2d 356 (one year); Lusczy v. Seaboard By-Products Co., 101 N.J.L. 170, 127 A. 212 (one year). But the Legislature also provided that as to an injury for which the workman did not seek compensation, the time allowed to his dependent to file a claim for a death benefit should be limited to one year from the date of death. Very obviously, the Legislature concluded that if the injury was not such as to lead to any disability for which the workman claimed compensation, then regardless of the time of the resulting death, the dependent should be limited to two years from the date of the injury within which to file a proceeding for a benefit. Certainly there is a very reasonable basis for specifying a time within which one may claim a death benefit on account of an injury which did not result in disability different from that fixed for one for which compensation was asked or received.

For these reasons I believe that the statute should be interpreted accordingly. In Glavich v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 44 Cal. App.2d 517, 112 P.2d 774, the District Court of Appeal reached that conclusion and since that decision, the Legislature has met without amending the statute, a circumstance which indicates that the construction placed upon it carries out the intended purpose.

PEOPLE v. RAYOL.

Division 3, California.

1. Criminal law ☞829(15)

Neither the statement in an instruction that defendant's guilt must be established beyond reasonable doubt, nor statement that, as between two opposing reasonable inferences, the inference consistent with innocence must be preferred to the one tending to show guilt, satisfies defendant's right to have jury instructed that where circumstantial evidence is relied on by the people it must be irreconcilable with theory of innocence to furnish sound basis for conviction.

2. Criminal law ☞784(1)

Where evidence on issue whether defendant "knowingly" participated in act of sex perversion was circumstantial, refusing instruction that, to convict, jury must be satisfied that facts proved were such as to be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion than defendant's guilt and that, if there was any single fact proved by preponderance of evidence inconsistent with her guilt, it was sufficient to raise reasonable doubt and jury should acquit, was error. Pen.Code, § 288a.

3. Criminal law ☞814(17)

The fact that two police officers who testified for people were eyewitnesses when alleged acts of sex perversion were perpetrated did not deprive defendant of right to instructions on circumstantial evidence, where question of whether defendant was a knowing participant in such acts, in view of her alleged intoxicated condition, rested entirely on "circumstantial evidence", which are inferences to be drawn from facts proved. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1831, 1832.

Defendant was charged by an information with a violation of section 288a of the Penal Code. A jury trial resulted in a verdict of guilty. She appeals from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

At about six o'clock in the evening of October 19, 1943, defendant went to a certain cafe and cocktail bar in the city of Los Angeles. When she went there she had twenty-five dollars. During the evening she spent it all but one dollar, buying drinks for herself and the service men who came up to the bar. She left there in a taxi at twelve o'clock with an Army officer whose face she had slapped earlier in the evening because he had said something dirty to her. One of the waitresses testified that she observed defendant sitting at the end of the bar from 9:30 until 12:00 o'clock and that she constantly had a drink in front of her. It was stipulated that two other employees, if called as witnesses, would testify that they observed defendant before the place closed and that she was "very drunk." She was taken by the Army officer to his hotel room. There, police officers who had followed them to the hotel, observed from an adjoining roof the Army officer commit upon the person of defendant the acts outlawed by section 288a, Penal Code. Defendant testified she had a faint memory of leaving the bar but no recollection of meeting the Army officer nor of slapping his face while at the bar. Aside from a hazy memory of some men dressing her and being in a car, she said she remembered nothing that occurred from the time she left the bar until she awoke in Lincoln Heights jail.

Defendant's position is that she was completely unaware of the acts committed on her by the Army officer—that she was not a conscious, willing, participant in the acts which occurred in his hotel room. This theory of defendant's case was presented to the jury in an instruction that they should find defendant not guilty unless they were convinced by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant "knowingly" participated in the unlawful act. But, defendant argues, the jury had to depend entirely on circumstantial evidence to determine whether or not she "knowingly" participated in the act and they were inadequately instructed on this phase of the case. This contention is well taken.

The following instructions as to circumstantial evidence were given.

"There are two classes of evidence recognized and admitted in courts of justice, upon either of which juries may lawfully find an accused guilty of crime. One is direct evidence, which is the direct testimony of any eyewitness to a transaction, and the other is circumstantial evidence, which includes all evidence other than that of an eyewitness. Such evidence may consist of any acts, declarations or circumstances admitted in evidence tending to prove the crime charged or tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime.

"If upon consideration of the whole case you are satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, you should so find, irrespective of whether such certainty has been produced by direct evidence or by circumstantial evidence. The law makes no distinction between circumstantial evidence and direct evidence in the degree of proof required for conviction but only requires that the jury shall be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt by evidence of either the one character or the other, or both."

"If the evidence in this case is susceptible of two constructions or interpretations, each of which appears to you to be reasonable, and one of which points to the guilt of the defendant, and the other to his innocence, it is your duty, under the law, to adopt that interpretation which will admit of the defendant's innocence, and reject that which points to his guilt.

"You will notice that, in this instruction, this rule of law is made applicable to cases in which there are two opposing interpretations, each of which appears to you to be reasonable.

"This rule of law does not apply in a case where there are two opposing constructions sought to be placed upon the evidence, one of which appears to you to be reasonable and the other to you appears to be unreasonable.

"In the latter case it would be your duty, under the law, to adopt the reasonable construction and reject the one which, in your judgment, appears to be unreasonable."

[1,2] These instructions are identical with those considered by this court in People v. Hatchett, 1944, 63 Cal.App.2d 144, 146 P.2d 469. They were there fully analyzed, and their insufficiency, where the conviction rests on circumstantial evidence, logically demonstrated. In holding that these instructions were not a sufficient statement of the law on this subject, Mr. Justice Shinn said (63 Cal.App.2d at page 155, 146 P.2d at page 474): "To the legally trained mind the doctrine of reasonable doubt has a scope much broader than would be easily understood by inexperienced jurors. The rule under which circumstantial evidence is to be weighed is not one which would be suggested to the lay mind by instructions that doubts are to be resolved in favor of the accused. This is sufficiently proved by the fact that through long experience it has become an established practice in the courts to state the rule in distinct and specific form, to serve as an easily understood and safe guide for juries in weighing the sufficiency of circumstantial evidence. Simplicity in the statement of legal principles adds greatly to their efficacy; statements of abstract principles which leave the jury in doubt as to their proper application tend toward confusion. Neither the statement in an instruction that the guilt of the defendant must be established beyond a reasonable doubt, nor the statement that as between two opposing reasonable inferences the one which is consistent with innocence must be preferred to the one tending to show guilt, satisfies the right of the defendant to have the jury instructed that where circumstantial evidence is relied upon by the People it must be irreconcilable with the theory of innocence in order to furnish a sound basis for conviction." In order to satisfy this "right of the defendant" the court should have given (with, perhaps, some slight modification) the following instruction proposed by her counsel: "With respect to circumstantial evidence the jury must not only be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that all the circumstances proved are consistent with the defendant having committed the act, but they must also be satisfied that the facts are such as to be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion than that the defendant is the guilty person. If there is any one single fact proved to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of the evidence, which is inconsistent with the defendant's guilt, this is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt and the jury should acquit the defendant." See opinion of the Supreme Court in denying a hearing in People v. Heuss, 1928, 95 Cal.App. 680, 684, 273 P. 583; People v. McClain, 1931, 115 Cal.App. 505, 510-512, 1 P.2d 1085; People v. Kinowaki, 1939, 39 Cal.App.2d 376, 380, 103 P.2d 203.

[3] Counsel for the People seek to minimize the part circumstantial evidence played in the conviction of defendant. They point out that "two police officers looked on while the alleged immoral act was being perpetrated. There was no circumstantial evidence there," they say. Of course the evidence of the police officers as to the physical acts that occurred between the defendant and the Army officer was direct evidence, but the question of whether the defendant was or was not a knowing participant in those acts rested entirely on circumstantial evidence—inferences to be drawn from the facts proved. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1831, 1832; Morton v. Manhattan Lunch Co., 1940, 41 Cal.App.2d 70, 72, 106 P.2d 212; Hatfield v. Levy Brothers, 1941, 18 Cal.2d 798, 805, 117 P.2d 841. A portion of the police officers' testimony as to what happened between these parties in the hotel room is such that the jury might reasonably have drawn the inference that the defendant was not a knowing participant in the alleged immoral act, but a mere automaton.

The order denying defendant's motion for a new trial is reversed.

Civ. 7072.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Aug. 14, 1944.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1009(3)

Whether partition of realty made by referees was fair and equitable was a question of fact and where it was submitted to trial court on conflicting testimony and upon inspection of premises made by trial judge, judgment partitioning property pursuant to division made by referees must be affirmed.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1009(3)

In partition action appellate court will not ordinarily consider sufficiency of the evidence to sustain findings of trial court but such findings will be taken as conclusive where evidence is conflicting and there is sufficient evidence to sustain them.

3. Partition ⇐94(3)

In partition action, the view of the premises made by trial judge constituted independent evidence which enabled judge to verify referees' report.

4. Appeal and error ⇐931(1)

Where trial court was authorized by stipulation of parties to consult with referees appointed to partition realty and get their reasons for making division recommended in report and court thereafter entered judgment partitioning property pursuant to divisions made by referees, referees' reasons for making such division would be presumed to have satisfied trial court that division was fair and equitable under the circumstance.

5. Partition $\S$ 94(3)

Where no error appears on face of report of commissioners in partition action, none will be presumed and report should not be set aside unless party excepting thereto shows such a state of facts as will make alleged error affirmatively and clearly appear.

Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; A. L. Pierovich, Judge.

Action by Louis J. Camicia and another against Antone J. Camicia and another to partition realty. From a judgment confirming the report of referees and partitioning the property pursuant to division made by the referees, plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Snyder & Snyder, of Jackson, for respondents.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

This action was brought by plaintiffs to secure the partition of certain property owned by plaintiffs and defendants as tenants in common. Trial by jury was waived.

Pursuant to stipulation of the parties the trial court made and entered an interlocutory decree which adjudged that the two plaintiffs, husband and wife, were the owners of an undivided one-fourth interest each, in the property in controversy, and that defendant Antone J. Camicia was the owner of an undivided one-half interest therein, and appointed three referees to make partition. Thereafter said referees made their report in which they alleged that they had divided the property according to the respective rights of the parties "quality and quantity relatively considered, as nearly as could be without prejudice to the rights and interests of the said parties, into two equal parts * * *." Plaintiffs then moved the trial court to modify or set aside the report of the referees, contending that the division was not fair or just. This motion was denied, and a motion made by defendants to confirm the referees' report was granted. A decree confirming said report, and partitioning the property pursuant to the division made by the referees, followed. Plaintiffs have appealed on the sole ground that the division is not fair and equitable under the undisputed evidence.

The record shows that in support of their contention that the report of the referees was unfair and inequitable plaintiff Louis J. Camicia testified that in his opinion defendants had been allotted more than a fair share of the property according to the nature of the land and the values which he put upon it; also that the division made by the referees would necessitate the erection of a fence by plaintiffs in order to separate the lands allotted to them from those allotted to defendants should it become desirable for plaintiffs to use their portion for the pasturage of livestock, and that the erection of such fence along a portion of the division line would be impossible because of the swampy nature of the area it must traverse. Defendants, in support of the report, called the county surveyor who stated that he had made an analysis of the land involved in the action and had assisted the referees in arriving at their conclusions. In support of his motion to confirm, defendant Antone J. Camicia testified as to the quality and value of the various portions of the land, the purport of his testimony being that plaintiffs had received a fair and just division. Counsel for the parties then stipulated that the trial court might call the referees and get their reasons for making the division reported by them; also that the court should view the premises.

Thereafter the court twice inspected the premises, going over same on one occasion with the county surveyor. It then made and entered its decree finding that the referees had divided the property "according to the respective rights of the parties * * * quality and quantity relatively considered, as nearly as could be without prejudice to the rights and interests of said parties," and confirming their report.

[1, 2] In view of the foregoing we are of the opinion that the judgment of the trial court must be affirmed. Whether the division made by the referees was fair and equitable was a question of fact submitted to the trial court on the conflicting testimony of the parties presented on their respective motions, and upon the inspections made by the trial judge. As in other cases, an appellate court, in a partition suit, will not ordinarily consider the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court, but such findings will be taken as conclusive where the evidence is conflicting and there is sufficient evidence to sustain them.

In Capuccio v. Caire, 207 Cal. 200, at page 211, 277 P. 475, at page 479, 73 A.L.R. 8, which also involved a motion to modify the report of referees in a partition suit, the court said: "The appellants herein do not challenge in any respect the ability of said referees, or of any one of their number, nor do they question the integrity and good faith of said referees in the slightest regard. Their whole contention upon this appeal is the contention that said referees might have made in certain respects a more just and equitable division of certain portions of said properties than they appear to have done, and might have provided for more acceptable means of ingress and egress to the property or of roadways extending across the same and making accessible the somewhat infrequent harbors thereon. These, however, were all matters which were primarily the function of the trial court to determine upon the hearing of the report of said referees, and they were each and all presented to the trial court for such determination at the time of such hearing. There is no showing on this appeal of any abuse of discretion on the part of said court in determining these matters adversely to the views of the appellants herein upon the hearing of said motion, and, this being so, it would seem to be clear that a review of the decision of said court upon the matters involved in said motion upon the conflicting evidence presented before it at the hearing thereon will not be undertaken by this court upon this appeal."

[3, 4] The view of the premises made by the trial judge constituted independent evidence which enabled him to verify the report of the referees (Otey v. Carmel Sanitary Dist., 219 Cal. 310, 312, 313, 26 P.2d 308; Rose v. State of California, 19 Cal.2d 713, 733, 734, 123 P.2d 505); and on appeal such evidence must be presumed to support the judgment. Stacey v. Hayes, 31 Cal.App.2d 422, 424, 88 P.2d 165; Anderson v. State of California, 61 Cal.App.2d 140, 145, 142 P.2d 88, and cases there cited. Also, as above stated, the trial court was authorized by the stipulation of the parties to consult with the referees and get their reasons for making the division recommended in their report; and, assuming that this was done, their reasons will be presumed to have satisfied the trial court that the division was fair and equitable under the circumstances.

[5] In Seale v. Greer, 1 Cal.Unrep.Cas. 423, 424, the court said that where no error appears on the face of the report of commissioners in a partition action, none will be presumed; and that the report ought not to be set aside unless a party excepting to it shows such a state of facts as will make alleged error affirmatively and clearly appear.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Charles C. Haines, Judge.

Actions by the Matmor Olive Company against E. B. Du Bois to recover the balance of an advance payment made by plaintiff to defendant, and to recover damages on ground that defendant had interfered with plaintiff's pickers of olives purchased from defendant. From a judgment, plaintiff and defendant appeal.

Modified and, as modified, affirmed.

H. M. Dunham, of Fresno, and Wright, Thomas & Dorman, of San Diego, for plaintiff.

Luce, Forward, Lee & Kunzel, of San Diego, for defendant.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

On November 11, 1941, the plaintiff agreed to purchase a crop of olives, estimated at 300 tons, growing on land owned by the defendant in San Diego County. The plaintiff, whose place of business was in Tulare County, agreed to pick the olives at its own expense, to begin picking about December 1, 1941, to complete the same within 60 days, and to pay $135 per ton for the olives "on the trees." The plaintiff paid to the defendant in advance $15,000, being $50 a ton on the estimated crop, and it was agreed that as each ton of olives was delivered $50 from this advance payment should be applied thereon and the balance of $85 should be paid through an arrangement made with a bank. It was agreed that when the entire crop was picked any part of this $15,000 which had not been thus applied should be repaid to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff began picking on December 7, 1941, and ceased operations shortly prior to February 15, 1942. It picked and removed 165.525 tons of olives which were fully paid for in the manner agreed upon.

The plaintiff brought an action in Tulare County in the form of a common count to recover the balance of the $15,000 advance payment, since only about 165 tons had been taken. It also filed another action in that county seeking damages on the ground that the defendant had interfered with its pickers. On motion of the defendant these two actions were transferred to San Diego County.

The defendant then answered the first of these actions denying that he owed anything to the plaintiff and setting up, as a plea in abatement, that two separate actions growing out of the same contract had been filed for the purpose of vexing and annoying him. He also answered the second action denying the allegations of the complaint, setting up the same plea in abatement, and including a so-called "counterclaim," which was in fact a cross-complaint, in which he set forth the contract of November 11, 1941, alleged that the plaintiff had failed to pick and pay for some 135 tons of olives which it had agreed to take, and further alleged that the plaintiff was indebted to him in the amount of $350 as rental for certain ladders. He prayed for a judgment for $18,241.00 for the first of these items and $350 for the second item.

The two actions were consolidated for trial over the objection of the defendant, although he had pleaded in each that they had been improperly separated. After a first trial a new trial was granted on stipulation of the parties, and the action was again tried before a different judge. The plaintiff abandoned its cause of action for damages and stipulated that the defendant was entitled to $350 as rental for the ladders. The court found that the plaintiff had picked and taken 165.525 tons of olives which had been fully paid for in accordance with the agreement; that when the contract was entered into there were not less than 300 tons of olives on the trees; that "enough were dropped to the ground by wind in a storm that occurred on December 23, 1941, or from other natural causes without the fault of the plaintiff, so that of such original 300 tons or thereabouts, * * * there remained only 200 tons to be accounted for"; that of said 200 tons 165.525 tons were removed and paid for; that the remaining 34.475 tons were either left on the trees or dropped by the pickers and not picked up; that the agreed price for these 34.475 tons amounted to $4654.13; and that the defendant became entitled to this sum and to $350 for the ladders, a total of $5004.13. It was then found that the plaintiff was entitled to $6723.75 as the unused balance of the original payment of $15,000, and that the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for the difference, or $1719.62. Judgment was entered accordingly and the plaintiff and the defendant have each appealed therefrom.

On his appeal the defendant contends that he was entitled to be paid for an additional 100 tons of olives, and that the judgment is inconsistent with and unsupported by the findings since it was found that 100 tons of olives were lost by reason of a storm on December 23, 1941, or from other natural causes, and since it appears that this loss occurred while the plaintiff was in possession of the groves and picking the crop. It is argued that the court erroneously concluded and held that title to the lost olives had not passed to the purchaser; that although one paragraph seems to declare that both possession and title were to remain in the seller, the contract as a whole discloses a different intention since the buyer agreed to pick all of the olives on the trees and since title was reserved only for the purpose of protecting the seller from any default of the buyer; and that it must be held as a matter of law that the contract, viewed as a whole, provided that the buyer must pay for 300 tons of olives regardless of what happened to them. The defendant relies on such cases as Firebaugh v. Thomas, 137 Cal.App. 709, 31 P.2d 425; Miller v. Hunt, Hatch & Co., Theodore Krumm, Inc., 35 Cal.App.2d 639, 47 Cal.App. 768, 191 P. 75; Brietengross v. 96 P.2d 370. Those cases are not controlling here. They involved either contracts or facts showing that title had passed to the purchasers, or that they had assumed the risk of loss.

[1] Briefly summarized, the contract here in question provides: "The seller agrees to sell and the buyer agrees to buy" a crop of olives "upon the terms and conditions expressed herein." Delivery of the crop and all thereof "shall be upon the trees in the grove" and the buyer is to pay all expenses of every kind. The buyer is to pick the crop commencing about December 1, 1941, and not later than December 5, 1941. The seller may have the olives weighed at the ranch or at a public scale. Certain trees are to be picked by hand and the crop on others may be harvested with light switches. The crop is estimated at 300 tons and the buyer is to pay $135 per ton "on the trees." The contract then provides: "Payment shall be made of the amount set forth above, per ton, for all olives, before they leave the possession of seller, * * * such payment to be made not later than the time when the weight of each shipment is ascertained. Title to all olives shall remain in the seller and shall pass to the buyer only when such payment is made for each shipment. The buyer hereby assumes all risk of loss of damage to the fruit from any cause whatever, after such fruit has been picked from the trees."

The contract was clearly executory and provided for the delivery and acceptance only of such olives as were picked or removed from the trees. It provided for delivery and acceptance at the time of picking and upon weighing the olives, and it is specifically provided that title shall remain in the seller and shall pass to the buyer only as payment is made for particular deliveries, and that the buyer assumes the risk of loss after the fruit has been picked from the trees. This clearly indicates that the risk of loss up to the time the fruit is picked from the trees shall fall upon the seller. Not only is the interpretation placed upon the contract by the trial court a reasonable one but no other interpretation was justified by the language of the agreement.

[2] The defendant further contends that he should have been awarded his costs in the trial court. He misconstrues one statement in the judgment and argues therefrom that the judgment is inconsistent with the findings and conclusions of law. In brief, it is argued that if the judgment had been consistent with the findings and conclusions of law it would have awarded the defendant on his two counterclaims a total of $5004.13 and would have allowed the plaintiff $1719.62, with the result that there would have been a balance in favor of the defendant of $3284.51, making him the successful party. The contention is without merit. Under any proper construction of the language used in the findings and judgment the necessary result is an allowance to the plaintiff of $6723.75 and one to the defendant of $5004.13, with a balance of $1719.62 in favor of the plaintiff. In this regard, the defendant was not entitled to his costs.

[3] It is also contended that the defendant was entitled to reimbursement for $16 paid by him to the clerk as costs of transfer of the actions from Tulare County to San Diego County. This should have been repaid to the defendant but was not, and seems to have been overlooked. The judgment in favor of the plaintiff should be modified by deducting $16 therefrom.

[4] On its appeal the plaintiff contends that the judgment which, in effect, allows the defendant payment for 34.475 tons of olives is based on findings which go beyond the issues as framed by the pleadings and which are inconsistent with other findings and is, therefore, erroneous. The argument in this connection is that it was alleged in the defendant's cross-complaint that at the time picking operations were begun there were 250 tons of olives on the trees and 50 tons upon the ground under the trees; that the plaintiff was obligated to purchase only olives that were on the trees; that the court found that 100 tons had fallen from natural causes without the fault of the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff has picked and paid for 165.525 tons. It is then argued that in using the figure of 300 tons as being on the trees at the time when the contract was signed, the court ignored the pleadings which showed that only 250 tons were to be accounted for, that 265 tons were accounted for in the amounts taken and paid for by the plaintiff and the 100 tons dropped to the ground, and that it follows that there could not have been about 34 tons with which the plaintiff was charged.

Not only was the allegation in the cross-complaint, to which we have referred, denied by the plaintiff, but it clearly appears that the court did not find that 100 tons of olives had dropped after picking operations were begun. The court found that there were not less than 300 tons of olives on the trees when the contract was signed, that enough dropped in a storm on December 23, 1941, or from other natural causes, so that of the original 300 tons there remained only about 200 tons to be accounted for. If we assume that 50 tons dropped before picking commenced then only 50 tons dropped thereafter. In any event, it was found that only 200 tons remained to be accounted for and the findings as a whole are perfectly consistent with and support the judgment.

[5] It is further urged that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that 34.475 tons of olives were left on the trees by plaintiff's figures or dropped and not saved by them. A portion of the evidence is relied on in this connection. Assuming that this portion supports the plaintiff's position, the most that can be said is that it is in conflict with other portions of the evidence. A careful examination of the record discloses ample support for the finding in question.

The judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1719.62 is modified by deducting $16 therefrom and as thus modified and reduced to $1703.62 the judgment is affirmed. Each party to pay his own costs on appeal.

Owner of approximately one-half acre, on which he kept various kinds of livestock, who slaughtered a cow for consumption by himself and family, intending to dispose of excess portions to persons in his locality, came within provision exempting property owner or ranchman slaughtering cattle in small numbers from slaughtering license requirements. St.1937, p. 2457, § 356.

2. Animals ⇨15

Owner of approximately one-half acre on which various kinds of livestock were raised and kept was a "livestock producer", within meaning of provision exempting from inspection requirements of meat laws livestock producers who slaughter animals from their own herds on their own premises for their own consumption. St.1941, p. 2214, § 307.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Livestock Producer".

3. Animals ⇨15

Under provisions of meat laws, exempting from inspection requirements a producer who slaughters on his own premises an animal which is a part of "his own herd", the quoted phrase must be given a more strict construction in consonance with efforts to protect public health than would be generally given to the term. St. 1941, p. 2214, § 307.

4. Animals ⇨15

To exempt a producer, who slaughters on his own premises an animal which is a part of his "own herd", from the inspection provisions of the meat laws, the animal slaughtered must have been in producer's possession subject to his observation for such length of time that producer could certify that the animal was healthy and that its meat was fit for human consumption St.1941, p. 2214, § 307.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Own Herd".

5. Animals ⇨15

Where cow slaughtered by livestock producer on his own premises was one purchased about 35 days previously, during which time the producer cared for the cow on seller's premises except for five days when it was cared for on producer's premises, such cow was a part of producer's "own herd", within meaning of provision exempting from inspection provisions of meat laws a producer who slaughters on his own premises an animal which is part of his own herd. St.1941, p. 2214, § 307.

6. Officers ⇨116

8. Officers ⇨119

In action to recover possession of meat seized by state meat inspectors, where language of complaint showed that defendants were being sued in their official capacity and not as individuals, any judgment against them could only be rendered in their official capacity and not as individuals.

9. States ⇨191(2)

Although the general rule that a state cannot be sued without its consent cannot be evaded by instituting action against state officials or agencies when the real claim is against the state, for such rule to apply the relief asked must involve some direct or substantial interest of the state.

10. States ⇨191(2)

Where the relief sought in action against state director of agriculture and meat inspectors was the return of meat allegedly wrongfully taken by state officials acting in their official capacity, the action was not such as to involve some direct or substantial interest of the state and was not an "action against the state", which had not consented to be sued.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Action against the State".

11. States ⇨191(2)

That a state will be affected by a suit against officers will not prevent maintenance of the suit, but the test is in a consideration of the relief sought and if sought against the state the suit is not maintainable, but if sought against state officers it is maintainable.

12. States ⇨212

Where plaintiff elected to sue defendant state officers in their official capacities only, to recover possession of meat seized by defendants, plaintiff was limited in his recovery to judgment for possession of the meat, and the alternative judgment for value thereof and for damages for detention could not be upheld.

SHAW, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; Ida May Adams, Judge.

Action by R. W. Boland against W. J. Cecil, Director of Agriculture of the State of California, and others to recover 685 pounds of meat or the value thereof. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendants appeal.

Judgment modified and as modified affirmed.

KINCAID, Judge pro tem.

For some three years prior to April 3, 1943, plaintiff lived on and owned real property in El Monte, California, consisting of approximately one-half acre. He kept various kinds of livestock thereon. On April 2, 1943, he slaughtered a cow on said premises. He was not a licensed slaughterer (Sections 346-347, Agricultural Code, St.1939, p. 1735, St.1941, p. 1726), and the animal was not slaughtered under "inspection" (Section 305, Agricultural Code, St.1941, p. 2438), as is required in counties having over 28,000 population, as does Los Angeles County. Nor did that part of the meat from said cow which plaintiff had in his "possession for sale * * * bear the 'Inspected and passed' stamp of * * *" inspection (Section 305). It was seized on April 3, 1943, by officials of the Department of Agriculture, who claimed to be acting under the provisions of Section 311.1, Agricultural Code, St.1937, p. 2403, and the meat was and now is stored in a freezing locker. The defendant Webb, against whom default judgment was taken and who is not a party to this appeal, operates said locker.

Plaintiff contended, and the trial court found from the evidence, that the meat from the animal so slaughtered was intended by plaintiff to be consumed by himself and family, and that excess portions thereof not so consumed were intended by him to be disposed of to persons in his locality, pursuant to the provisions of Sections 307 and 356, Agricultural Code, St. 1941, p. 2214, St.1937, p. 2457; that, at the time of such seizure, no part of such meat had been sold or delivered to any third person, and, while no tags or sales memoranda had been affixed thereto, the plaintiff intended to affix same to such portions of the meat as might be disposed of by him in his locality.

Plaintiff takes the position, and the trial court seems to have held with him, that he was privileged to slaughter the said cow under the circumstances and conditions above set forth, pursuant to the exceptions contained in the said Sections 307 and 356, and that his case falls within the provisions of both said sections. The pertinent parts of Section 307 are as follows: "Nothing in this article [restricts or] prohibits: (a) [Slaughter by live stock producer.] A live stock producer from slaughtering animals on his own premises that are a part of his own herd for his own consumption or from disposing of the carcasses and products of those animals thus slaughtered; provided, they can be identified as such, and are sound, healthful, wholesome, and fit for human food, and are disposed of in his locality; when cattle, sheep, swine or goats are sold by said producer in the vicinity where produced and slaughtered there shall be attached to said meat or meat products a statement giving substantially the following: [Certificate.] I hereby certify that the uninspected meat (or meat products as the case may be) to which this certificate is attached is from animals slaughtered by the undersigned, a farmer, on his farm and that at this date it is sound, healthful, wholesome, and fit for human food." Section 356 reads: "Any owner of property, or a ranchman located on a definite property as a tenant, lessee or purchaser under contract may slaughter cattle in small numbers on said premises for his own consumption, and may sell or give away a portion of the meat thereof except to a peddler, retailer, hotel, restaurant, or any person offering the same for public consumption. When such person sells the meat thereof, he shall give to the buyer, and the buyer shall receive, a sales tag or sales memorandum, showing the names of the seller and buyer, the date of sale, and the quantity sold. The buyer shall retain said tag or memorandum for ninety days and exhibit it upon request of any agent of the department or any peace officer."

A casual reading of these sections might well lead to the belief that they are practically similar, and are exceptions to the same code requirements, with Section 356 being so much broader as to render Section 307 useless. A more careful study of them reveals marked dissimilarities, and that they do not necessarily conflict.

[1] Section 307 is contained in Article 1 of Division 3, Chapter 1, of the Agricultural Code, and deals exclusively with the subject of "Meat Inspection" of slaughtered animals. It constitutes an exception to the necessity of compliance with the inspection of meat laws as in said Article 1 otherwise provided. Section 356 is contained in Article 3 of said division and chapter, and, while said article is entitled "Marks and Brands," its contents are not limited to that subject, as certain provisions thereof deal with the matter of the licensing and regulating of slaughtering of animals. Section 346 requires a license to slaughter a bovine animal, and Section 356 is an exception to such slaughtering license requirement. The evidence supports the court's finding that plaintiff has brought himself within the provisions of Section 356.

Even though one who is a resident of a county of over 28,000 in population complies in every particular with Section 356, thus bringing himself within the exemption from the requirement of having a slaughtering license, he, nevertheless, would violate the provisions of Article 1, requiring an inspection of the meat, unless he is a "live stock producer." Only the latter are exempted from inspection regulations under Section 307, and the plaintiff can claim the benefit thereof only if the evidence in the case supports the court's finding that he is a livestock producer, and that his case is otherwise within Section 307.

[2] "Livestock" is defined by Webster's New International Dictionary, 2d Ed., as "Domestic animals used or raised on a farm, especially those kept for profit." "Producer" is defined as "One who produces, brings forth, or generates." Section 307 does not limit itself to cattle as does Section 356, but includes all animals that are a part of the livestock producer's own herd. Viewing the evidence, as we must, most favorably in support of the finding that plaintiff is a livestock producer, the record discloses that plaintiff had, for several years prior to April 2, 1943, been raising chickens, rabbits, pigs, sheep, ducks and cattle on his premises. On April 2, 1943, in addition to other types of animals and fowls, he had on said premises twelve head of cattle, including two calves and seven heifers; that, while two calves had been born on his place, he bought many day-old calves and raised them there. The defendant Greenan testified that on April 3, 1943, the occasion of his first visit to plaintiff's place, he saw thereon a milk cow, a number of calves, five or more heifers, pigs, a sheep, and a horse. From the foregoing, even though other conflicting evidence was before the court, we cannot say that there was not sufficient evidence upon which the trial judge could properly base a finding that plaintiff was a livestock producer.

Another prerequisite to the application of the exemption from inspection regulations under Section 307 is that the animals so slaughtered by the producer on his own premises "are a part of his own herd." Therefore, the plaintiff herein can claim the benefit of such section only in the event the evidence in the case supports the court's finding that the cow in question was a part of his own herd at the time it was killed. "Herd" is defined as "A number of beasts assembled together; * * * more than a few, of cattle, sheep, horses, or other animals of the larger sorts, assembled and kept together as one drove and under one care and management." 39 C.J.S., Herd, p. 891. To become a part of one's own herd, then, would only require that the animal be owned by the herd owner and be mingled and kept with the other animals in one drove and under individual care and management. As a general proposition, it would seem that, in order to become a part of a herd, no particular period of time must elapse before an animal can be considered as included in such herd. Nor is it necessary, in order to be so included, that the animal be either born on the producer's premises or kept there any particular length of time.

[3] When construed, however, with the exemption from inspection provisions of Section 307, the legislature must have intended that the phrase "a part of his own herd" be given a more strict construction in consonance with its efforts to protect public health. The very purpose of requiring the inspection of meat prior to its disposition is to protect public health. The exception in favor of a producer, wherein under certain conditions he may, in lieu of such inspection, substitute his own certificate as to the healthfulness and wholesomeness of such meat slaughtered by him, was not intended by the legislature as a means of weakening this protection to the public. As an exception to the general statutory requirement, it must be strictly construed. Merchants Nat. Bank v. Cont. Nat. Bank, 1929, 98 Cal.App. 523, 533, 277 P. 354; In re Goddard, 1937, 24 Cal.App. 2d 132, 140, 74 P.2d 818; Spokane & I. E. R. Co. v. United States, 1915, 241 U.S. 344, 36 S.Ct. 668, 60 L.Ed. 1037, 1041. The experience of the producer and his personal knowledge of the animals making up his herd were expected to place him in a position wherein he would know, and could truthfully and safely certify that the animal so slaughtered by him was in fact healthy and its meat fit for human consumption. In order for such producer to gain a personal knowledge of a particular animal whereby he could safely certify it under the foregoing provisions, such animal must have been in his possession, and subject to his observation for at least a reasonable period of time. Only then could such animal be deemed to have become a part of his herd under said Section 307. If this were not the case, the owner of a herd could buy an animal, mingle it with such herd for one day, slaughter it, and then sell most of it to others. Those who received it would be almost entirely lacking in protection from its possible unwholesomeness. We cannot assume that the legislature intended any such relaxation of the meat inspection laws as would thus take place.

As to what is such a reasonable period of time during which such animal must have been in the producer's possession and subject to his observation is a question of fact to be determined by all of the surrounding circumstances. The length of such period would vary with changing conditions. The experience of the producer, his constant or infrequent inspections, the number of animals making up his herd, and the age and kind of such animals are elements to be considered in arriving at such a determination.

[4, 5] By its express finding that the cow in question was a part of the producer's own herd at the time it was killed, and that it was slaughtered in compliance with Section 307, the trial court must be deemed to have considered this question of fact and to have resolved the same in favor of plaintiff. Viewing the evidence most favorably in support of such finding, the record discloses that such cow had been purchased by plaintiff from Dolan's Dairy thirty-five days before she was slaughtered; that for the first thirty days of such period he had kept the cow on the premises of Dolan's Dairy and he brought her to his place five days before April 2, 1943, the date when she was killed; that he visited her twice a day for the purpose of feeding her during such thirty-day period, and fed her at his place during the remaining five days. He established her age to be between seven and nine years, and he bought her for a milk cow, believing her to be carrying a calf. He decided to slaughter her for meat when he found she was barren of calf. He knew that she came from and had been a part of a dairy herd of Dolan's Dairy and that such herd was regularly inspected under the state laws requiring periodical tuberculosis tests; that such cow had been a part of Dolan's herd for almost a year prior to her purchase by plaintiff; that plaintiff had been attending his herd on his premises for some two years; that he knew flukes, tapeworms, parasites and cysts when he saw them and knew when an animal was healthy or unhealthy. This evidence is sufficient to support the inferential finding that the cow in question had been in the producer's possession and subject to his observation for a sufficient length of time, and that his experience was such as to enable him to ascertain that the animal was healthy and that it could be properly slaughtered under the provisions of Section 307 without endangering public health. Such a cow would be deemed to be "produced" by the producer for the purposes of Section 307 without requiring her to have been born to his ownership or to have been raised or fattened by him for any particular or definite time.

[6] Whenever an officer seizes property unlawfully, even though under color of his office, an action for damages may be maintained against him, and if acting in behalf of a principal, also against the principal, the same as though the damages were inflicted by private individuals. Silva v. MacAuley, 1933, 135 Cal.App. 249, 257, 26 P.2d 887, 27 P.2d 791. In the within case, there is some question as to whether the complaint charges the defendants, or the judgment is against them, in their official capacity or in their individual capacity, or both. The title to the complaint names as defendants "W. J. Cecil, Director of Agriculture of the State of California, Dr. E. B. Foster, John G. Greenan, Leslie L. Webb" and "Does." In the body of the complaint is found: "That the defendant, W. J. Cecil, is the Director of Agriculture of the State of California. That the defendant, Dr. E. B. Foster, is Meat Inspector of the Division of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture of the State of California. That the defendant, John G. Greenan, is Assistant Meat Inspector of the Division of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture of the State of California." The judgment decrees that plaintiff recover of and from the defendants, "W. J. Cecil, Director of Agriculture of the State of California, Dr. E. B. Foster, Supervising Veterinary Meat Inspector of the Department of Agriculture of the State of California, John G. Greenan, Assistant Meat Inspector of the Department of Agriculture of the State of California, and Leslie L. Webb and each of them, possession of the following described property, to-wit, six hundred eighty-five pounds (685#) of beef; and in case possession of said property cannot be had, then its value, which is fixed at the sum of Three Hundred Forty-three ($343.00) Dollars, and in either case the sum of Sixty-one and 85/100 ($61.85) Dollars as damages for its detention, together with his costs herein incurred in the sum of $95.25."

[7, 8] "Where it is doubtful in what capacity a party sues or is sued, reference may be had to the entire complaint." 47 C.J. 176; Henry v. Willett, 1922, 60 Cal. App. 244, 212 P. 698. While the title to the complaint names the official title of only the defendant Cecil, the language of such pleading itself leaves no doubt that the defendants are each charged in his official capacity only with the tort of illegally seizing and retaining the property in question. The defendants, as individuals, are not parties to the suit (Reed v. Molony, 1940, 38 Cal.App.2d 405, 411, 101 P. 2d 175), and the judgment is against them only in their official capacity and not individually.

[9-11] The principle is fundamental that the state may not be sued without its consent. 23 Cal.Jur. 578; 59 C.J. 307. While the general rule that a state cannot be sued without its consent cannot be evaded by the instituting of an action against state officials or agencies when the real claim is against the state itself, for such "rule to apply the relief asked must involve some direct or substantial interest of the state, as a distinct entity, apart from the mere interest a state may have in the welfare of its citizens or the vindication of its laws." 59 C.J. 308. The relief here sought, at least to the extent of demanding the return of plaintiff's meat which was wrongfully taken by the defendant state officials, acting in their official capacity, is not such as to "involve some direct or substantial interest of the state." As was said in the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bosworth, D.C., 209 F. 380, 401, 402, and referred to in 59 C.J. 308, § 78(a): "The fact that a state will be affected by a suit against state officers is not a consideration against the maintainability of the suit. * * * the better test * * * is to be found in a consideration of the relief sought therein. If the relief sought is relief against the state, it is not maintainable. * * * If, however, the sole relief sought is relief against the state officers, it is maintainable. Such it is if it seeks * * * recovery of possession of property wrongfully withheld * * *."

[12] In so far as the plaintiff's suit seeks to recover from the state officers the possession of his wrongfully-taken and withheld meat, the action is maintainable. Having elected to sue the defendant state officers in their official capacity only, and not in their individual capacity, plaintiff is limited in his possible recovery herein to a judgment for possession of the meat. The alternative judgment for the value thereof, and for damages for its detention, cannot be upheld. This is not a case in which liability can attach to the state for such monetary judgment. Under the judgment rendered, no execution for the value or for damages for the detention could issue or be levied against the defendants in their individual capacity. Any such levy would of necessity be directed against the State Treasury.

[13,14] It would be error to award court costs against the state in the absence of an express statutory enactment authorizing the same. People v. One Plymouth, 1937, 21 Cal.App.2d 715, 69 P.2d 1011; People v. One 1937 Plymouth, 1940, 40 Cal. App.2d 38, 104 P.2d 372; Connecticut Gen'l Life Ins. Co. v. State, 1941, 47 Cal. App.2d 88, 117 P.2d 377. The legislature made such an enactment in 1943 allowing costs against the state, when it is a party, on the same basis as any other party, with the proviso that when so awarded they shall be paid out of the appropriation for the support of the agency on whose behalf the state appeared. Code of Civil Procedure, § 1028. Since we are holding, in effect, that this is a suit against the state, such statute is here applicable.

Whether or not the plaintiff was raising or producing livestock on his premises, in violation of a county zoning ordinance, was immaterial to the issues presented. The trial court properly sustained an objection to the offer of proof of such evidence.

The judgment is modified by striking out "and in case possession of said property cannot be had, then its value, which is fixed at the sum of Three Hundred Forty-three ($343.00) Dollars, and in either case the sum of Sixty-One and 85/100 ($61.85) Dollars as damages for its detention," and as so modified, the judgment is affirmed. Neither side to recover costs on appeal.

SHAW, Presiding Judge (dissenting).

I dissent.

I concur in all the foregoing opinion except its holding that the cow in question was a part of plaintiff's "own herd." I think some further limitation should be put upon the meaning of the phrase "a part of his own herd," as used in Section 307 of the Agricultural Code. If it requires merely the presence of the animal on the producer's premises and under his observation for a reasonable time to become familiar with it, the finding that such a time had elapsed in this case when the cow was slaughtered is probably supported by the evidence. But on reading Section 307 with its evident purpose to protect the public in mind, and looking for some more definite statement in explanation of the term "his own herd," I find that only a "live stock producer" is entitled to the exemption from inspection provided by subdivision (a). It is reasonable to suppose that such producer is related to "his own herd" as a producer, and not otherwise. Carrying out this idea is the provision later in subdivision (a) that "when cattle, sheep, swine or goats are sold by said producer in the vicinity where produced and slaughtered there shall be attached to said meat or meat products a statement" certifying that they are wholesome. Since this statement is the only assurance the purchaser has of the quality of the meat sold under subdivision (a) of Section 307, and there is no limitation upon the quantity or proportion of any individual animal slaughtered by the producer "for his own consumption" that he may sell, this provision for a statement must be intended as a limitation on the right to sell and it is to be construed as a part of the proviso appearing in this subdivision. That proviso permits the producer to dispose of his excess meat only "in his locality"; and in view of the whole framework of the section I conclude that the phrase "in the vicinity where produced and slaughtered" is intended to be a restatement of the same idea in other words, so that the right of sale may be exercised only in the vicinity where the animals are produced, which must also be the locality of the producer. Subdivision (a) of Section 307 is not well drawn, and legislative attention might well be turned to its improvement; but taking it as it is, and attempting to make a consistent and reasonable construction of its various provisions I cannot believe that it was intended to sanction what plaintiff appears to have done. It appears to me that, on a proper construction of the statute, a livestock producer may sell, under subdivision (a) of Section 307, only cattle which he has produced, and that the cow in question here was not produced by plaintiff.

PEOPLE v. DEL MAR CORPORATION.
Civ. A. 5719.Appellate Department, Superior Court,
Los Angeles County, California.

July 29, 1944.

Gaming ⚡58

Where corporation conducting Bingo game provided employees with about $500 in War Savings Stamps and $100 in money for payment of prizes to winners and prizes varied from $2 to $10 according to number of players participating in game, under statute authorizing forfeiture of all money and property "offered for distribution" in violation of gaming law, forfeiture was not limited to stamps and money which made up particular prize that was being played for at moment officers made seizure, but other stamps and money in room in possession of operators of game were subject to forfeiture. KINCAID, Justice pro tem., dissenting.

Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment and order denying motion for a new trial made by the Municipal Court of the City of Los Angeles, William M. Byrne, Judge. Reversed.

Action by the People of the State of California against Del Mar Corporation for forfeiture of war savings stamps and money provided for conducting lottery game known as Bingo. From the judgment and from an order denying a motion for new trial, the People appeal.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Fred N. Howser, District Attorney, and Russell M. Broker and J. J. Sullivan, Deputy District Attorneys, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Victor Ford Collins, by Arnold M. Canan, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FOX, Judge.

The defendant Del Mar Corporation was conducting a game known as Bingo in a room on the fourth floor of a building in the City of Santa Monica. It was stipulated that the game as played constituted a lottery under the law of this state. The property to be thus distributed was War Savings Stamps and money.

It was also stipulated that the room where the game was being played was equipped with chairs, tables, wheels, counter, cards, and discs, sufficient in number to accommodate 96 players; that during the progress of the game some of the players were seated on chairs at a long rectangular counter and others were seated at small tables on the outer edge of the room; that an electrically operated wheel was located near the wall of one end of the room; that said wheel was approximately 6 feet in diameter; that on the face of the wheel around its outer circumference arranged promiscuously and not consecutively appeared the numbers from 1 to 75, inclusive; that certain cards, which had upon their face 24 numerals selected promiscuously from among the numerals 1 to 75, inclusive, arranged in five rows of five numerals each, except that the middle space in the middle row was left blank, were provided for the players upon their paying the required consideration; and that the play of the game proceeded by an operator (employed by defendant) starting the wheel revolving, which continued spinning until it came to rest at random, then indicating by an electric light one of the numerals upon the face of the wheel. It also appeared that there was a loud speaker in the corner of the room and a microphone near the control board, and an indicator board at one end of the room, about 4 feet by 20 feet, where the number on which the wheel stopped would be shown. This room was about 40 feet by 60 feet. The game was operated by three employees of defendant. One employee operated the wheel and the other two collected the money from the players and distributed the prizes. It further appears that the game was in progress night after night, as well as at least during some of the afternoons, and for periods of several consecutive hours. The management always provided the operators with about $500 in War Savings Stamps and $100 in money. It took only seven or eight minutes to go through the necessary routine to determine who was entitled to a particular prize. The prizes varied from $2 to $10 according to the number of players participating in the game. They were paid in War Savings Stamps, or when a prize was split between several persons in such manner that the denominations of Stamps on hand would not equal each person's share, money was paid for the difference.

During the progress of the game deputies from the Sheriff's office seized the Stamps and money which had been provided by the defendant corporation for carrying on the game and which were then in the possession of the employees who were operating it. This action was then brought in the name of the people under section 325, Penal Code, to have said Stamps and money forfeited to the state. The material part of this Penal Code section reads as follows: "All moneys and property offered for sale or distribution in violation of any of the provisions of this chapter are forfeited to the state, * * *" (Italics added.) The code sections which make Bingo a lottery are in the same chapter of the Penal Code as section 325. The trial court rendered judgment for the defendant corporation. The plaintiff has appealed.

Counsel for defendant corporation argue that only the Stamps and money which made up the particular prize that was being played for at the moment the seizure by the officers took place were forfeited; that the other Stamps and money there in the room in the possession of the operators of the game were not subject to forfeiture. This latter conclusion is based on the theory that such Stamps and money were not "offered for * * * distribution." This theory and the conclusion based thereon are not sound.

In Asher v. Johnson, 1938, 26 Cal.App.2d 403, 404, pages 411, 412, 79 P.2d 457, 461, the court, in discussing Tango (which in purpose, though not in technique, appears to be at least a first cousin of Bingo), observed that: "It may not be reasonably said the game terminates when an unlucky victim plays five balls and losses. It is evident from the large receipts that the games continue." (Emphasis added.) In like manner it is evident from the spaciousness of defendant's quarters, the elaborateness with which they are equipped, the mechanical and electrical devices provided, the number of employees, the amount of money and War Savings Stamps provided for each session of play, the length and regularity of the sessions—in fact, from defendant's entire set-up—that the game does not terminate when the winner of a particular prize has been determined.

If, however, it may be said that the determination of the player entitled to a particular prize constitutes a game, it is obvious that all the elaborate and expensive set-up was not gotten together for the purpose of playing just a single game. It of course contemplates a repetition of the routine so long as the place stays open and there are sufficient participating patrons, and a resumption of it when the place reopens the next afternoon or evening, and so on ad infinitum. It represents a business enterprise just as much as a grocery store does. The equipment here corresponds to the counters, showcases, scales, etc., of the grocery store. The War Savings Stamps and money constitute the stock-in-trade just as the cans on the grocer's shelves constitute part of his stock-in-trade. Each can of merchandise is being offered for sale by the grocer even while it is still on his shelves. The goods are offered for sale without an over act or solicitation on his part. State v. Dunbar, 1886, 13 Or. 591, 11 P. 298, 57 Am.Rep. 33; People v. Lewis, 1910, 138 App.Div. 673, 122 N.Y.S. 1025. Likewise here the Stamps and money in the gaming room were being offered for distribution as prizes. True, they might not all be thus distributed because there might not be enough patrons playing long enough to accomplish this result. But the Stamps and money were nevertheless offered for distribution just as much as the unsold cans have been offered for sale during the day when the grocer closes his store at night.

The employees of defendant corporation thoroughly understood that at least the War Savings Stamps were a part of their stock-in-trade for distribution. Jeanne Chevalier (one of such employees) testified on cross-examination as follows:

"Q. These stamps that you brought up there were to be used by you in paying off winners of these games? A. That's right, yes.

"Q. You brought them [the War Savings Stamps] up there for the purpose of distributing them to winners? A. That's right, yes, I did.

"Q. Of this Bingo game, did you not? A. Yes."

It is suggested that under such an interpretation of the code section (325, Penal Code) the money downstairs in defendant's safe would be subject to seizure and forfeiture. This of course is not true. Such funds would not have been appropriated to the game and, not being at the place where the game was being played, would not be a part of the stock-in-trade and consequently would not be offered for distribution as prizes. Such funds would be like the crates of canned goods the grocer still has in the warehouse. They have not yet become a part of his stock and so are not being offered for sale.

To hold that only the stamps and money that are to be given as a prize at the conclusion of one of these seven or eight minute routine operations is all that is being offered is to ignore the physical set-up and the practical operation of this game.

The judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial are reversed and the case is remanded for a new trial, appellant to recover its costs on appeal.

SHAW, P. J., concurs.

KINCAID, Justice pro tem. (dissenting).
I dissent.

The trial court has impliedly found that the money and War Savings Stamps confiscated by plaintiff from the possession of defendant were not offered for sale or distribution, as required by section 325, Penal Code, as a basis for its forfeiture. Viewing the evidence, as we must, most favorably in support of the judgment, we find that the bulk of the War Savings Stamps and money in question was contained in a metal box which was kept behind a glassed off compartment of the gaming room where bookkeeping was conducted. The winners of each game, the prize for which was from $2 to $10 in Stamps depending upon the number of players and the amount played, were paid off in Stamps from the pockets of aprons worn by the attendants. The only Stamps or money offered for sale or distribution were the actual prizes put up for each game. Such attendants would replenish their aprons with Stamps from the box when necessary.

The evidence further shows that Stamps from the box were sold to patrons, club members and employees aside from the gaming; that $100 of the money in question was supplied by the auditor to make change and that the box was kept in the club safe downstairs when the games were not in session. Such evidence is sufficient to support the court's implied finding that the Stamps and money in question were not offered for sale or distribution as required by section 325, Penal Code.

It is well settled that " * * * a statute imposing a forfeiture should be construed strictly, and in a manner as favorable to the person whose property is to be seized as is consistent with the fair principles of interpretation. The courts will usually give such a construction to statutes providing for forfeiture as will be consistent with justice and the dictates of natural reason." People v. One 1939 Plymouth 6 Coupe, 1940, 41 Cal.App.2d 559, 562, 107 P.2d 266, 267. The instant case is not within the rule laid down in the case of Schur v. Johnson, 1934, 2 Cal.App.2d 680, 683, 38 P.2d 844, 846, nor is the trial court's holding violative of the principle there enunciated that "Courts will not lend their aid to transactions founded on illegal contracts or acts in violation of law." See Niccoli v. McClelland, 1937, 21 Cal.App.2d Supp. 759, 765, 65 P.2d 853; Asher v. Johnson, 1938, 26 Cal.App.2d 403, 410, 79 P.2d 457.

In re NAFTZGER'S ESTATE.

WEISS et al. v. NAFTZGER et al.
L. A. 18824.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 1, 1944.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 24, 1944.

1. Executors and administrators ⚡375

The statute granting authority to the probate court either to accept an increased bid of 10 per cent. for sale of decedent's property made in open court and forthwith confirmed the sale to the bidder, or if the court's discretion so dictates to order a new sale, does not contemplate that such bid in open court must include, in addition to the specified 10 per cent. increase, the expenses of a new sale. Probate Code, § 785.

2. Executors and administrators ⚡375

Under statute requiring sale of decedent's property to be confirmed to bidder to whom it has been sold by executor unless it appears that a sum exceeding such bid at least 10 per cent. exclusive of expenses of a new sale may be obtained and empowering court to order a new sale in such case, the term "new sale" refers to a new and independent proceeding of which notice must be given and a new sale in all respects conducted as if no previous sale had taken place, and, if court does not order such "new sale" but acts in the other alternative and confirms forthwith in the initial sale proceeding, the sale to a new bidder on bid made in open court, the new bidder is not required to increase his bid by amount of expenses of a "new sale". Probate Code, § 785.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "New Sale".

3. Executors and administrators ⚡375

Upon hearing of petition for confirmation of sale of realty by executor in probate court, sale to a new bidder upon bid made in open court in the initial proceeding is not a "new sale" within statute requiring sale of decedent's property by executor to be confirmed unless it appears that sum exceeding such bid at least 10 per cent. exclusive of the expenses of a new sale may be obtained. Probate Code, §§ 760, 761, 785.

4. Executors and administrators ⚡375

Upon hearing of petition for confirmation of sale of realty by executor, superior court sitting in probate should be permitted to exercise a wise discretion in determining whether to confirm a sale by another bidder on a bid made in open court of exactly 10 per cent. more in amount than that named in the return exclusive of expenses of new sale or to order a new sale. Probate Code, § 785.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William R. McKay, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of Louise Naftzger, deceased. Fred E. Naftzger, executor of the estate of Louise Naftzger, deceased, petitioned for approval of the sale of the real property to Lawrence A. Weiss and others for $11,500, and Beth M. Preninger made a written bid of $12,650 in open court for the property. From an order confirming a sale of the property to Beth M. Preninger and from an order refusing to set aside such confirmation order, Lawrence A. Weiss and others appeal.

Orders affirmed.

Prior opinion 144 P.2d 614.

Ernest C. Griffith, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

L. S. B. Ritchie, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SCHAUER, Justice.

This appeal presents the question of whether on the hearing of a petition to confirm a sale of real property of a decedent's estate the probate court is authorized by section 785 of the Probate Code (hereinafter quoted) to confirm a sale to a new bidder for a price which is "ten per cent more in amount than that named in the return [petition]" but is not 10 per cent more than such amount plus expenses of sale. We have concluded that such increased price may properly be accepted and the sale to the new bidder forthwith confirmed.

Respondent Fred E. Naftzger, as the duly appointed and qualified executor of the last will and testament of Louise E. Naftzger, deceased, and pursuant to authority granted by such will, sold to contestants-appellants, at private sale, for the sum of $11,500 cash, certain real property of the estate. A petition for confirmation of the sale, reciting that "No broker's commission is payable on said sale," was duly filed with the superior court, sitting in probate, and at the hearing upon such petition respondent Beth M. Preninger (to whom the designation "respondent" will hereinafter refer) made a written bid in open court for the property. The bid offered $12,650 cash (exactly 10 per cent more than the original bid) and stated that "The name of real estate agent procuring within bid, and to whom commission is to be paid, according to law, if confirmed by court to within bidder is as follows: Geo. S. Preninger." The court accepted such bid, confirmed the sale to respondent, and ordered the payment of a commission of $345 to the real estate agent named in the bid.

Thereafter appellants petitioned the probate court to set aside the order of confirmation. From an order denying such petition and from the order confirming the sale to respondent this appeal is taken.

Determination of the limits within which the probate court has discretion to act under the circumstances outlined above rests on the construction to be placed upon the provisions of section 785 of the Probate Code. That section reads as follows: "Upon the hearing the court must examine into the necessity for the sale, or the advantage, benefit and interest of the estate in having the sale made, and must examine the return and witnesses in relation to the sale; and if it appears to the court that good reason existed for the sale, that the sale was legally made and fairly conducted, and complied with the requirements of the previous section, that the sum bid is not disproportionate to the value, and it does not appear that a sum exceeding such bid at least ten per cent exclusive of the expenses of a new sale may be obtained, the court shall make an order confirming the sale and directing conveyances to be executed; otherwise it shall vacate the sale and direct another to be had, of which notice must be given and the sale in all respects conducted as if no previous sale had taken place. But if a written offer of ten per cent more in amount than that named in the return is made to the court by a responsible person, and the bid complies with all provisions of the law, it is in the discretion of the court to accept such offer and confirm the sale to such person or to order a new sale."

Appellants contend, in effect, that the last sentence of the quoted section must be understood as merely providing an alternative procedure for a factual situation already governed by the preceding sentence and not as authorizing a special procedure peculiar to a different or excepted situation. In other words, it is appellants' contention that the last sentence should be interpreted as though it read: "But if a written offer of at least ten per cent more in amount than that named in the return, exclusive of the expenses of a new sale [we assume that appellants intend to include the meaning: exclusive of any expense on confirmation of sale to the new bidder in the original sale proceeding] is made to the court by a responsible person and the bid complies with all provisions of the law, it is in the discretion of the court to accept such offer and confirm the sale [to such person] or [to] order a new sale"; that the phrase "expenses of a new sale" (which we assume is intended to include "expenses on confirmation of sale to new bidder") must be "read into" the last sentence of the section to "avoid a conflict between such last sentence and the one which immediately precedes it, governing the probate court's powers and duties"; and that inasmuch as the bid which respondent made in open court at the time of the hearing on the petition for confirmation of sale was a "bare ten per cent above the amount of appellants' bid, and expressly provided for the payment of real estate agent's commissions" the probate court erred in accepting such bid and confirming the sale to respondent.

Respondent, on the other hand, asserts, in effect, that the last sentence of section 785 operates to add a special procedure for a certain factual situation which is specifically defined therein and which is not included in the first sentence. If the language of the first sentence could be construed to include such situation then the last sentence constitutes an exception or proviso to the first. In any event, contends respondent, the unambiguous language of the last sentence gives the probate court the authority, in its discretion, to accept a bid of at least 10 per cent more in amount than that named in the return or to order a new sale, and the requirement that the expenses of a new sale be included in any increased bid applies only in case the court vacates the entire sale and directs "another to be had, of which notice must be given and the sale in all respects conducted as if no previous sale had taken place."

No case has been cited to us and we have discovered none in which the precise point here involved has been heretofore ruled upon by an appellate court of this state. Each party to this appeal argues that certain language which appears in Re Estate of Flaherty (1924), 69 Cal.App. 429, 231 P. 591, supports his position here. There, however, disregarding all question of the expenses of sale, the bid made in open court fell short of being 10 per cent more in amount than that named in the return. Therefore the remarks of the District Court of Appeal in directing the trial court to confirm the sale to the bidder named in the return can have no persuasive force for or against either party here; the situations materially differ. Nor can it be said that the factual situation upon which the court acted in Re Pearsons' Estate (1893), 98 Cal. 603, 613, 33 P. 451, or in Re Estate of Reed (1906), 3 Cal.App. 142, 85 P. 155, is analogous to that in the instant case.

[1] We are of the opinion, however, that the section under consideration should be read and interpreted exactly as it is written. The second sentence thereof begins with the word "But," which word, it has been said, "indicates that what follows is an exception to that which has gone before, and that, therefore, what is said before the word does not control that which follows it; that it is an appropriate term to indicate the intention of those who use it to limit or restrain the sense or effect of something which had before been said, or to indicate a proviso, condition, or qualification. * * * The word has been held synonymous with, or equivalent to, 'except,' and 'provided.' * * *" (12 C.J.S., But, pp. 858, 859.) So construing the use of the word here, it appears that the authority granted the probate court either to accept an increased bid of 10 per cent made in open court and forthwith confirm the sale to the bidder or, if the court's discretion so dictates, "to order a new sale," does not contemplate that such bid in open court must include in addition to the specified 10 per cent increase, "the expenses of a new sale."

[2,3] The term "new sale" is apparently used in the quoted statute as referring to a new and independent proceeding "of which notice must be given and the [new] sale in all respects conducted as if no previous sale had taken place." (Prob.Code, § 785.) If the court does not order such

"new sale" but acts in the other alternative and confirms forthwith in the initial sale proceeding the sale to the new bidder there is apparent no sound basis for requiring the new bidder to increase his bid by the amount of the expenses of a "new sale" which is not going to occur. The sale to the new bidder confirmed in the initial proceeding apparently is not a "new sale" within the contemplation of the code section. It is perhaps significant, in this connection, that provision is made in section 761 of the Probate Code for division of a real estate agent's commission between an agent who, in reliance on a written contract of employment (Prob.Code, § 760), has secured the bid named in the return and another agent who secures an increased bid which is made and accepted in open court, but there is no requirement that additional commission payable by reason of the increased bid must be added to the amount of such bid.

[4] We are of the view that the probate court should be permitted "the exercise of a wise discretion" (see In re Estate of Griffith (1900), 127 Cal. 543, 544, 59 P. 988; see also, Gossman v. Gossman (1942), 52 Cal.App.2d 184, 194, 195, 126 P.2d 178) in determining whether to confirm a sale on a bid made in open court of barely 10 per cent more in amount than that named in the return, or to order a new sale. We perceive no sufficient reason for reading into the second sentence of section 785 the requirement that to "ten per cent more in amount than that named in the return"—which amount "named in the return" in the contemplation of the statute may be subject to the payment of commissions and other expenses—there be added some assumed amount equal to the expenses of "a new sale" which is not to take place or an amount equal to an expense which may be incident on confirmation of the sale in the original proceedings to the new bidder. (See In re Estate of Bradley (1914), 168 Cal. 655, 660, 144 P. 136.) The statute itself does not specify such requirement; we shall not add it.

For the reasons above stated the orders appealed from are affirmed.

Where one sustains injuries as result of negligence of tort-feasor and exercises due care in securing services of a physician and his injuries are aggravated by physician's negligence, original tort-feasor's act is proximate cause of damages flowing from subsequent negligent medical treatment.

2. Action ⇨53(2)

Plaintiff injured in automobile accident could sue motorist for damages resulting from such injury alone and could separately sue physicians for additional injury resulting from malpractice in treating such injury, and the order of bringing such actions would be immaterial.

3. Judgment ⇨590(2, 3)

In action against physicians for aggravation of injury sustained in automobile accident because of physicians' malpractice in treating such injury, plea of former recovery from motorist involved consideration of what plaintiff did in fact recover in her previous action against motorist rather than what she could have recovered therein.

4. Release ⇨29(3)

The common-law rule of unity of discharge of one tort-feasor by release of another tort-feasor is based on the concept of unity of cause of action against joint tort-feasors and does not apply to independent tort-feasors whose separate acts cause injuries to same party.

5. Release ⇨27

The rule that release of original wrongdoer causing personal injury releases attending doctor from liability for malpractice in treating such injury, applied in some jurisdictions and reached by treating the independent wrongdoers as joint tort-feasors, does not apply in California.

6. Release ⇨29(3)

A release of a cause of action against one wrongdoer is not a release of a separate cause of action against another independent wrongdoer.

7. Release ⇨27

The action of plaintiff, injured in an automobile accident, in releasing motorist from liability after motorist paid part of judgment recovered against him did not discharge cause of action against physicians for malpractice in treating injury sustained in such action.

8. Release ⇨27

A release of original wrongdoer whose negligence in driving automobile caused injury should release an attending physician from liability for aggravation of the injury by malpractice if there has been full compensation for both injuries, but not otherwise.

9. Release ⇨27

Where plaintiff recovered $15,000 judgment against motorist for injuries sustained in automobile accident and, on payment of a little over third of such judgment plaintiff released motorist from liability, plaintiff could recover from physicians for malpractice in treating the injury, there being no evidence that until plaintiff received an amount in excess of amount of such judgment she would be compensated twice for same injury.

10. Release ⇨29(3)

The presumption sometimes indulged that payment of any sum in consideration of release of one of several joint or independent concurrent tort-feasors has been made and accepted as full compensation for the injury where claim based thereon constitutes an unliquidated tort demand, cannot be indulged where claim embraces separate injuries caused by independent successive tort-feasors and is liquidated by a judgment against original tort-feasor.

11. Judgment ⇨585(3), 590(2)

The jury's award of damages in action against motorist for injuries is not res judicata as to physicians whose alleged malpractice in treating the injury aggravated such injury, and such physicians have right to show what damages, if any, were actually suffered by alleged malpractice and to have jury's award in action against them restricted to the difference between such damage and any sum already received by plaintiff from motorist as compensation therefor.

12. Release ⇨57(1)

Where plaintiff, after recovering judgment against motorist for injuries in automobile accident and after receiving payment of a little over one third thereof, satisfied judgment of record and released motorist from further liability, and in subsequent action against physicians for malpractice in treating such injury, physicians successfully objected to plaintiff's attempt to introduce evidence of nature and extent of the separate injuries caused by the successive wrongdoers, record did not show that recovery of judgment against physicians would amount to a double recovery.

Action by Edith M. Ash against W. S. Mortensen and another for malpractice. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Anne O'Keefe and Ralph C. Curren, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chase, Barnes & Chase and Wm. M. Rains, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

Plaintiff was injured in an automobile accident and received medical and surgical treatment necessitated thereby. In 1940 she sued Robert Wubben, the negligent motorist, and recovered judgment in the sum of $15,000. Upon payment by Wubben of $5,753.22 the judgment was satisfied of record and plaintiff signed a document releasing him from further liability.

In August, 1941, plaintiff brought the present malpractice action against W. S. Mortensen and W. L. Mortensen, the doctors who treated her injuries. Among other things, it was alleged that defendants negligently treated a fracture of the femur bones by failing to secure them in position, and that, notwithstanding the fact that an X-ray picture showed the bones were out of position, defendants failed to reset them and knowingly permitted them to heal in improper alignment as a result of which plaintiff's legs were shortened and bowed and their use practically lost to her for life.

In their answers defendants set up the affirmative defense that the judgment, satisfaction of record and release in the first action against Wubben operated to discharge any liability on their part. The issues thus tendered by the answers were separately tried, and the court concluded that the facts pleaded constituted a complete defense to this action. Accordingly, judgment was entered in favor of each defendant, with costs, and this appeal followed.

Plaintiff urges that under general principles of tort law the release of Wubben in consideration of part payment of the judgment against him does not bar this malpractice action against defendants who allegedly were negligent in treating the injuries inflicted by Wubben. Defendants, on the other hand, contend that since a person should not be twice compensated for the same injury and since plaintiff could have recovered compensation for damages resulting from the alleged malpractice in the action against Wubben, the release of Wubben and the satisfaction of the judgment in that action are a complete defense to this action.

[1-3] It is settled that where one who has suffered personal injuries by reason of the tortious act of another exercises due care in securing the services of a doctor and his injuries are aggravated by the negligence of such doctor, the law regards the act of the original wrongdoer as a proximate cause of the damages flowing from the subsequent negligent medical treatment and holds him liable therefor. Dewhurst v. Leopold, 194 Cal. 424, 433, 229 P. 30; Rest., Torts, § 457; McCormick, Damages, p. 272; note, 39 A.L.R. 1268. But the fact that plaintiff could have obtained full compensation for all damages in the action against Wubben, the original wrongdoer, does not establish that she has been so compensated. The independent and successive acts of Wubben and defendant doctors, differing in time and place of commission as well as in nature, produced two separate injuries and gave rise to two distinct causes of action. Plaintiff was at liberty to sue Wubben for damages resulting from the original injury alone, and to sue defendants for damages resulting from the additional injury or aggravation, in separate actions; and the order in which such actions might be brought would be immaterial. See Parkell v. Fitzporter, 301 Mo. 217, 256 S.W. 239, 243, 29 A.L.R. 1305; Rest., Torts, § 879, Illus. 3. The plea of former recovery, therefore, involves a consideration of what the injured party did in fact recover in her action against the original wrongdoer rather than what she could have recovered therein. Wheat v. Carter, 79 N.H. 150, 106 A. 602; Parkell v. Fitzporter, 301 Mo. 217, 256 S.W. 239, 29 A.L.R. 1305, supra; Staehlin v. Hochdoerfer, Mo.Sup. 235 S.W. 1060; cf. Smith v. Coleman, 46 Cal.App.2d 507, 116 P.2d 133; Viita v. Dolan (Viita v. Fleming), 132 Minn. 128, 155 N.W. 1077, 1080, L.R.A. 1916D, 644, Ann.Cas.1917E, 678.

[4, 5] Defendants insist, however, that without regard to the evidence introduced in the action against Wubben, and thus without regard to the nature and extent of the recovery therein, the release of Wubben from all liability operated to discharge them from liability for any negligent aggravation of the original injury. In their view, the amount of damages sustained by plaintiff, the sum received as consideration for the release, and the relation between the two, the intention of the parties, and the fact that Wubben and defendant doctors are independent rather than joint wrongdoers, are immaterial. In other words, defendants seek to substitute a rule of law for the factual defense of double recovery. The rule contended for has been adopted in a number of jurisdictions. Feinstone v. Allison Hospital, 106 Fla. 302, 143 So. 251; Paris v. Crittenden, 142 Kan. 296, 46 P.2d 633; Smith v. Mann, 184 Minn. 485, 239 N.W. 223; Adams v. DeYoe, 166 A. 485, 11 N.J. Misc. 319; Milks v. McIver, 264 N.Y. 267, 190 N.E. 487; Tanner v. Espey, 128 Ohio 82, 190 N.E. 229; Thompson v. Fox, 326 Pa. 209, 192 A. 107, 112 A.L.R. 550; Martin v. Cunningham, 93 Wash. 517, 161 P. 355, L.R.A.1918A, 225; Mier v. Yoho, 114 W.Va. 248, 171 S.E. 535; cf. Wells v. Gould, 131 Me. 192, 160 A. 30; 112 A.L.R. 553. But the conclusion that the release of the original wrongdoer releases the attending doctor from liability for malpractice has been reached by treating the independent wrongdoers as joint tortfeasors or applying, by analogy, the common-law rule of unity of discharge affecting joint tortfeasors. The common-law rule of unity of discharge is based on the concept of the unity of a cause of action against joint tortfeasors, and its application to the facts of the present case would give the independent tortfeasors herein an advantage wholly inconsistent with the nature of their liability. Moreover, the rule contended for by defendants would stifle compromises, favored in the law, inasmuch as the injured person could not effect a settlement with the original wrongdoer without surrendering his separate cause of action against one who, by his independent tortious act, aggravated the injury.

[6-8] A release of a cause of action against a wrongdoer is not a release of a separate or distinct cause of action against another independent wrongdoer. It follows that the mere release of Wubben from liability did not result in the discharge of the cause of action against defendants. We are of the opinion that a release of the original wrongdoer should release an attending doctor from liability for aggravation of the injury "if there has been full compensation for both injuries, but not otherwise." Prosser, Joint Torts and Several Liability, 25 Cal.L.Rev. 413, 435; Wheat v. Carter, 79 N.H. 150, 106 A. 602; cf. Smith v. Coleman, 46 Cal.App.2d 507, 513, 116 P.2d 133; Wallner v. Barry, 207 Cal. 465, 473, 279 P. 148.

[9] Defendants next contend that plaintiff has in fact received full compensation for both injuries. They argue, in this respect, that Dr. W. L. Mortensen, appearing as a witness for plaintiff in her action against Wubben, gave testimony concerning injuries which plaintiff now asserts resulted from their negligence and for which she seeks damages in this suit, and that the judgment against Wubben necessarily included an award for damages suffered by reason of malpractice. Even if we assume, for purposes of argument, that in her action against Wubben plaintiff sought to recover all the elements of damages to which she may be entitled, the record does not support the contention that plaintiff has received full compensation for both injuries. The only approximation of fair compensation for all the damages sustained by plaintiff which the record in this case offers is the sum of $15,000, the amount of the judgment against Wubben. Until plaintiff has received money in excess of that figure, there is nothing to show that she has been compensated twice for the same injury. It is undisputed that plaintiff received only $5,753.22, or slightly more than one-third of the amount of the judgment, and, in our opinion, she is entitled to recover from defendants for actual damages suffered by reason of their tortious acts, if any, for which she has received no compensation.

[10] It has been held in some cases involving unliquidated tort demands that the payment of any sum in consideration of the release of one of several joint or independent concurrent tortfeasors will be presumed to have been made and accepted as full compensation or satisfaction for the alleged injury. Hawber v. Raley, 92 Cal. App. 701, 268 P. 943; Flynn v. Manson, 19 Cal.App. 400, 126 P. 181; Dwy v. Connecticut Co., 89 Conn. 74, 92 A. 883, L.R.A. 1915E, 800, Ann.Cas.1918D, 270; Masterson v. Berlin St. R. Co., 83 N.H. 190, 139 A. 753; see Dougherty v. California Kettleman Oil Royalties, Inc., 13 Cal.2d 174, 181, 88 P.2d 690; cf. Tompkins v. Clay St. R. R., 66 Cal. 163, 4 P. 1165. There is also authority to the contrary. McKenna v. Austin, 77 U.S.App.D.C. 228, 134 F.2d 659, 148 A.L.R. 1253. But whatever may be the rule with regard to a settlement with joint or independent tortfeasors whose acts concur to produce a single injury, it does not follow that such presumption should be indulged where, as here, the injured person's claim embraces separate injuries caused by independent successive tortfeasors and is liquidated by a judgment against the original tortfeasor. The presumption of full compensation or satisfaction found in the cited cases must be based on the fact that there is but a single indivisible injury and that the claim arising therefrom is unliquidated. Under the circumstances of this case, it would be more logical to presume that part payment of the Wubben judgment represented merely the best obtainable compromise for the liability of the judgment debtor. Cf. McKenna v. Austin, supra, 77 U.S.App.D.C. 228, 134 F.2d page 664, 148 A.L.R. 1253.

[11, 12] We do not wish to be understood as holding that in every case of this kind the question of double recovery is to be determined solely by reference to the amount awarded in the first action. The jury's award in the action against Wubben is not binding on defendants or res judicata as to them. They have the right to show what damage, if any, was actually suffered by reason of malpractice and to have the jury's award in this action restricted to the difference between such damage and any sum already received by plaintiff as compensation therefor. Defendants, however, successfully objected to an attempt by plaintiff to introduce evidence of the nature and extent of the separate injuries caused by the successive wrongdoers. There was therefore no consideration of the actual facts, and the record is devoid of evidence from which double recovery could be inferred.

The judgments are reversed.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

I concur in the judgment. When plaintiff's action against Wubben was tried, she was still under the medical care of the defendants. On the trial of the action one of the defendants testified with regard to the nature of the injury suffered by plaintiff, the progress of her recuperation until the date of trial, and her prospects for recovery. He stated that plaintiff's right leg had improved enough so that she could put weight on it, but that the fracture of the left leg had not healed as well, because the ends of the bone were not end to end, and that it might be another month or two before there was a callous formation. Unless the hardening took place within that time it would be necessary to use surgery to fasten the ends of the bone with a metal plate and screws. As to the probability of plaintiff's future ability to walk he said: "In any event, she probably will not be able to walk at all normally with these legs in less than a year's time, from the time of the accident. At that time she may be left with some impairment to her walking." Plaintiff contends that the defendants were negligent, on the grounds that they failed to secure the bones in proper position before making the cast, and failed to reset the bones properly after discovering the improper alignment through X-rays. She claims that as a result of this negligence she is not able to walk for more than short distances. The $15,000 judgment, insofar as it took into account plaintiff's impaired physical condition, was based on the expert testimony of one of the defendants; therefore neither defendants' possible negligence nor its possible consequences beyond the complications of the healing process described in the testimony had any influence on the judgment. There is nothing in the record to indicate that plaintiff had any information as to the alleged malpractice when she entered into the agreement with Wubben after the judgment. For the purposes of this appeal it must therefore be assumed that at the time of the trial of her action against Wubben and of her agreement with him, plaintiff was ignorant of any negligence of the defendants and acted on the advice received from the defendants as her physicians.

If the improper alignment of the bones in the left leg was a consequence of defendants' negligence, it was also a consequence of the accident which the jury could properly consider in reaching its verdict, since defendants' testimony revealed plaintiff's aggravated condition. Other consequences of defendants' alleged negligence, however, such as the alleged failure to reset the bones properly, were not considered on the trial, and the $15,000 judgment therefore does not fully reflect the injury allegedly caused by negligence of the defendants.

Any injury caused by malpractice of defendants that was not disclosed by the expert testimony at the trial and that was therefore not reflected in the judgment can be recovered in this action, although the judgment rendered in plaintiff's action against Wubben is res judicata insofar as it was based on the same facts as in the present action. Bernhard v. Bank of America, 19 Cal.2d 807, 812, 122 P.2d 892; Good Health, etc., Corp. v. Emery, 275 N.Y. 14, 9 N.E.2d 758, 112 A.L.R. 401. Defendants cannot rely on the former judgment as res judicata insofar as their own misrepresentations, though innocently made, led to plaintiff's failure to include her entire claim in the original action. White v. Adler, 289 N.Y. 34, 43 N.E.2d 798, 142 A.L.R. 898, 905; Vineseck v. Great Northern R. Co., 136 Minn. 96, 161 N.W. 494, 2 A.L.R. 530, 531, 534; Restatement: Judgments, § 62(b) and Comment; see Panos v. Great Western Packing Co., 21 Cal.2d 636, 134 P.2d 242.

As to that part of the injury caused by defendants and included in plaintiff's action against Wubben, the judgment in that action cannot alone discharge defendants, but satisfaction of that judgment would discharge them in the absence of duress, fraud, or mistake. The applicable rule is set forth in section 95 of the Restatement of Judgments: "The discharge or satisfaction of a judgment against one of several persons each of whom is liable for a tort, breach of contract, or other breach of duty, discharges each of the others from liability therefor." See, also, Restatement: Torts, § 886. This rule applies when the original wrongdoer satisfies a judgment that includes damages for aggravation of the injury because of the negligence of an independent tort-feasor. Restatement: Judgments, § 95, Comment c; see Butler v.

Where a judgment against a defendant responsible for the entire harm is satisfied as a whole, the obligation of another obligor is extinguished, whether the judgment was discharged by payment of its full amount or by any other performance received in satisfaction of the judgment. "The fact that plaintiff recovered only part of the damages to which he was entitled is immaterial" (2 Freeman on Judgments (1925), § 578, p. 1225; Blackman v. Simpson, 120 Mich. 377, 79 N.W. 573, 58 L.R.A. 410; Westbrook v. Mize, 35 Kan. 299, 10 P. 881), if the injured person has received "what in law is deemed the equivalent" to actual satisfaction. Urton v. Price, 57 Cal. 270, 272; see Dawson v. Schloss, 93 Cal. 194, 199, 29 P. 31; Chetwood v. California Nat. Bank, 113 Cal. 414, 45 P. 704; Tompkin v. Clay St. R. R., 66 Cal. 163, 4 P. 1165; Butler v. Ashworth, 110 Cal. 614, 43 P. 4, 386; Grundel v. Union Iron Works, 127 Cal. 438, 442, 47 L.R.A. 467, 59 P. 826, 78 Am.St.Rep. 75; Black v. Bringhurst, 7 Cal.App.2d 711, 46 P.2d 993; Minehan v. Silveria, 11 Cal.App.2d 266, 53 P.2d 770; 6 Cal.L.Rev. 230.

Plaintiff, according to the instrument she executed, received $5,753.22 "for the purpose of making a full and final compromise, adjustment and settlement of all claims for injuries, losses and damages resulting or to result from said accident" and discharged Wubben "from any and all actions, causes of actions, claims and demands of whatsoever kind or nature on account of any and all known and unknown injuries, losses and damages." It was therefore the obvious intention of the parties to have the payment of $5,753.22 extinguish the entire judgment, not merely a part of it. By thus discharging Wubben's entire obligation, the parties did not intend to reserve plaintiff's rights against the other tortfeasors for any damages covered by the judgment; nor could they have so intended, for neither of them knew or suspected that plaintiff had any claim against defendants. If "facts and intentions * * * control" (McKenna v. Austin, 77 U.S.App.D.C. 228, 134 F.2d 659, 664, 148 A.L.R. 1253), the settlement was made and accepted in full satisfaction of the judgment. Plaintiff's right of action against defendants for any damages covered by the judgment would therefore be barred were it not for the fact that the agreement between her and Wubben was made in ignorance of her claim against them. A general release purporting to cover all claims does not extend to claims that the creditor does not know or suspect exist in his favor at the time of executing the release, if knowledge of such claims would have materially affected his settlement with the debtor. Civ.Code, § 1542; Backus v. Sessions, 17 Cal.2d 380, 110 P.2d 51; O'Meara v. Haiden, 204 Cal. 354, 268 P. 334, 60 A.L.R. 1381; see 30 Cal.L.Rev. 111; 96 A.L.R. 1144. The provision in the release making it applicable to "unknown injuries, losses and damages" relates only to unknown claims against Wubben (see Berry v. Struble, 20 Cal.App. 2d 299, 66 P.2d 746), but not to unknown claims against others.

Plaintiff in the present action may therefore recover: (a) damages for that part of the injury that can be attributed to malpractice of the defendants, which, because of their representations, innocent or otherwise, were not included in the judgment against Wubben; (b) that part of the damages included in the judgment against Wubben that can be attributed to malpractice of defendants, less such part, if any, of the $5,753.22 already received from Wubben as exceeds the amount of damages for which Wubben is alone responsible.

stayed by perfection of appeal. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 942, 946, 949.

2. Appeal and error ⇨441

An appeal from judgment and stay of all proceedings thereon in court below do not deprive such court of jurisdiction to settle bill of exceptions. Code Civ.Proc. § 946.

3. Appeal and error ⇨441

After appeal from judgment and stay of all further proceedings thereon in trial court, such court ordinarily has jurisdiction and owes duty to take all steps and make all orders necessary for preparation of proper and correct record on appeal.

4. Army and navy ⇨24

The trial court had jurisdiction to make and enforce an order staying proceedings on appeal from judgment for defendants, pursuant to Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, on ground of plaintiff's inability to prosecute action because of his military service. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 521.

5. Certiorari ⇨5(1)

An order staying proceedings on appeal from judgment for defendants, pursuant to Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, for period of plaintiff's military service and 60 days thereafter, was not a "special order made after final judgment", but merely extended time for preparation of record on appeal, and hence was not appealable, but reviewable on certiorari. See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Order Affecting the Judgment".

7. Appeal and error ⇨441

The trial court had jurisdiction to make order staying proceedings in personal injury action, pursuant to Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, after appeal from judgment for defendants, as against contention that jurisdiction over action was vested in appellate court, since appeal merely stayed judgment, not proceedings to prepare record on appeal, and order was limited to proceedings necessary to perfect appeal. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 521.

8. Army and navy ⇨24

The trial court's order, granting plaintiff's motion to stay proceedings in personal injury action pursuant to Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, after plaintiff filed notice of appeal from judgment for defendant, was valid until revoked by such court, though it denied plaintiff's previous motion for stay of proceedings after entry of judgment and plaintiff made no affidavit showing new facts claimed, but based second motion on same facts as first motion. 11. Army and navy ⇨24

Under provision of Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act that any court proceeding in which person in military service is involved shall be stayed on his application at any stage thereof, unless his ability to prosecute or defend action is not materially affected because of such service in court's opinion, trial court has power to grant motion by soldier plaintiff in personal injury suit to stay proceedings therein after filing of his notice of appeal from judgment for defendants. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 521.

12. Army and navy ⇨34

The Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act must be liberally construed to protect persons in military service, and discretion vested in trial court thereby to stay proceedings in which such persons are involved should not be withheld on nice calculations as to whether prejudice may result from such person's absence or absence result from service. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 521.

13. Army and navy ⇨24

In personal injury action by person in military service, evidence was sufficient to justify conclusion that plaintiff's ability to prosecute appeal from judgment for defendants was materially affected by such service, so that court did not abuse its discretion in granting plaintiff's motion to stay further proceedings in action after filing of notice of his appeal from judgment. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 521.

SCHAUER, EDMONDS, and CARTER, JJ., dissenting in part.

Certiorari proceedings by the Imperial Beverage Company and another and by the Charles E. Hires Company to review orders of the Superior Court of Alameda County staying proceedings in an action against petitioners by Dino Preftokis for personal injuries.

Orders affirmed.

Hoge, Pelton & Gunther and A. Dal Thomson, all of San Francisco, for petitioners Imperial Beverage Co. and others.

Theodore Hale and Carroll B. Crawford, both of San Francisco, for petitioner Charles E. Hires Co.

John J. Healy, Jr., of San Francisco, and Louis Deadrich, of Oakland, for respondents.

CURTIS, Justice.

These two proceedings grew out of a personal injury action brought by one Dino Preftokis in the Superior Court of the County of Alameda against the three petitioners herein. One of the petitions is a joint petition by the Imperial Beverage Company and the New Century Beverage Company, and the other is by the Charles E. Hires Company alone. All of them were defendants in said personal injury action and they will occasionally be referred to as defendants. The trial of said action was before the court with a jury and resulted in a verdict in favor of the defendants, upon which a judgment was entered against the plaintiff, Dino Preftokis, who will be referred to herein as the plaintiff. Thereafter plaintiff moved for a new trial and for a stay of all proceedings in said action under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, §§ 501-585; hereinafter referred to as the act. The trial court denied both of these motions. The plaintiff then filed a notice of appeal from the judgment and made a second motion for a stay of proceedings under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940. This motion for a stay was granted. The order of the court granting said motion was of date February 15, 1943, and, as subsequently modified, is as follows: "That the motion to stay any further proceedings including proceedings on appeal be and the same is hereby granted, on the ground, that, in the opinion of this Court, the plaintiff cannot properly prosecute this action, by reason of his military service; and that said plaintiff, Dino Preftokis, is granted a stay of proceedings for the period of his military service in the armed forces of the United States of America and for a period of sixty days thereafter, in which to prepare his record on appeal, together with the bill of exceptions."

Thereafter these two proceedings were instituted to review said order of the court staying the proceedings in said action. In compliance with an order of this court granting the petitions for review, all proceedings in the trial court relating to each of the two stay orders have been certified to this court by the respondents and are now before us for our consideration. The same factual situation is presented in each of these two proceedings, and the same legal questions involved in one proceeding are present in the other. For this reason only one opinion will be necessary for the decision of both matters.

It may be well to state at the outset that the order under review was made by the trial court and these proceedings were instituted to review the same prior to the adoption of the "New Rules on Appeal" effective July 1, 1943. The discussion therefore of the question herein involved deals with the procedure on appeal prior to the effective date of the new rules.

The first question with which we are confronted is whether the writ of review is a proper proceeding to test the validity of the order staying proceedings in said action before the court. Neither the respondents nor the plaintiff in the trial court, who, besides the petitioners, is the only real party in interest in the proceedings now before us, have made any appearance herein nor has either of them furnished us with any brief or argument in any form in opposition to the granting of the present petitions.

By section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure a writ of review may be granted when an inferior court, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded its jurisdiction and there is no appeal nor other adequate remedy. We know of no other remedy that could be employed to test the challenged order now before us except that of appeal or review. Accordingly, if the order of stay is appealable, review will not lie. Appealable orders are enumerated in section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Among such orders is "any special order made after final judgment." An order to stay proceedings in a court where the action is pending is not specifically mentioned in said section or elsewhere in the Code of Civil Procedure, and petitioners tacitly admit that if the order of stay now before us is a special order made after judgment within the meaning of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is an appealable order and not reviewable under certiorari proceedings. They contend, however, that it is not such an order and therefore certiorari will lie to review it.

Section 521 of the act reads as follows: "Stay of proceedings where military service affects conduct thereof.

"At any stage thereof any action or proceeding in any court in which a person in military service is involved, either as plaintiff or defendant, during the period of such service or within sixty days thereafter may, in the discretion of the court in which it is pending, on its own motion, and shall, on application to it by such person or some person on his behalf, be stayed as provided in this Act, unless, in the opinion of the court, the ability of plaintiff to prosecute the action or the defendant to conduct his defense is not materially affected by reason of his military service." (Italics ours.) This section is § 201, chap. 888, 54 U.S. Stats. 1178, 1181.

[1] It will thus be seen that the provisions of the act are made applicable at any stage of the action, either before or after trial and judgment, and before or after an appeal has been taken from the judgment. If made after appeal and the execution of the judgment is stayed by the appeal, the order of the court under the act cannot in any manner be held to stay execution on the judgment, for the judgment is already stayed by the appeal. (Code Civ. Proc. § 946.) The judgment in the present action, as entered upon the verdict of the jury, provided that plaintiff take nothing by said action and that defendants recover from plaintiff their costs, amounting to the sums of $19.64 and $135.40. Although judgment was rendered in defendants' favor for their costs, such a judgment is not one directing the payment of money mentioned in section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is therefore stayed by the provisions of section 949 of the same code. McCallion v. Hibernia, etc., Society, 98 Cal. 442, 445, 33 P. 329; Jensen v. Hugh Evans & Co., 13 Cal.2d 401, 406, 90 P.2d 72.

[2-4] Section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Whenever an appeal is perfected * * * it stays all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from, or upon the matters embraced therein, * * *; but the court below may proceed upon any other matter embraced in the action and not affected by the order appealed from." (Italics ours.) An appeal from the judgment and a stay of all proceedings therein does not deprive the trial court of jurisdiction to settle a bill of exceptions. Colbert v. Rankin, 72 Cal. 197, 13 P. 491; Hennessy v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 368, 228 P. 862. Under the alternative method of appeal it is made the duty of the court to settle the record on appeal and to certify to the truth and correctness of the reporter's transcript before the same may become a part of the record on appeal. (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a.) In fact, after an appeal and the stay of all further proceedings in the trial court upon a judgment, the trial court ordinarily has jurisdiction, and it is its duty to take all necessary steps and make all necessary orders that a proper and correct record on appeal may be prepared. Such proceedings are not stayed by an appeal, but they might be stayed in a proper case by the trial court in making an order under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act. The action in so far as the preparation of a record on appeal was involved was then pending in the trial court, and that court was the only court which had jurisdiction to control those proceedings. Therefore, the order staying proceedings, while limited to proceedings on appeal, was within the jurisdiction of the trial court to make and enforce.

[5, 6] Considering the stay order in its limited application, we are called upon to decide whether such an order is a "special order made after final judgment." If it is such, it is appealable, and certiorari will not lie to review it. Such an order neither stays nor enforces the judgment. It is only an order in a procedural matter in connection with the preparation of a record on appeal. In Lake v. Harris, 198 Cal. 85, 243 P. 417, there was before this court an order striking the certificate of the trial judge from the clerk's transcript; and it was contended that such an order was a special order made after final judgment and therefore appealable. In passing upon the question, this court ruled as follows (198 Cal. at page 89, 243 P. at page 419): "As to the first ground of refusal, we think the contention of the respondent that the order striking his certificate from the said clerk's transcript was not an appealable order must be sustained. In order that a special order, made after final judgment, as contemplated by subdivision 2 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, be appealable, such order must affect the judgment in some manner or bear some relation to it either by way of enforcing it or staying its execution. Griess v. State Invest., etc., Co., 93 Cal. 411, 28 P. 1041; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 136 Cal. 675, 69 P. 497; Watson v. Pryor, 49 Cal.App. 554, 193 P. 797; 2 Cal.Jur. 153. The order striking said certificate is but an order in an ancillary or procedural matter prescribed by statute in connection with the preparation of a record on appeal and the making thereof neither added to nor subtracted from the relief granted by the judgment. It is obvious that to compel the respondent judge to certify a record on appeal from an order which is not appealable would be to require a vain and useless thing." See, also, Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 136 Cal. 675, 677, 69 P. 497, and Williams v. Superior Court, 14 Cal.2d 656, 666, 96 P.2d 334.

In view of our determination that the order here challenged is not appealable because it served merely to extend or continue the time for the preparation of the record on appeal, we need not discuss at length the case of Wood v. Peterson Farms Co., 214 Cal. 94, 3 P.2d 922. That case involved an order terminating proceedings for a record—the exact converse of the situation here presented. As stated above, the order under review in the present case did not stay the judgment. The judgment for defendants for costs was automatically stayed by the appeal itself. The order here involved simply continued the time within which the appellant was required to prepare his record on appeal. It has long been recognized that such an intermediate, procedural order as one extending time to prepare the record on appeal is in no sense an order affecting the judgment, and consequently is not appealable as a special order after final judgment. Obviously, the length of such extension (whether for a fixed or an indefinite time) cannot affect the appealability of the order.

[7] While said order is nonappealable and for that reason it is subject to be annulled on certiorari, the petitioners contend that the court was without jurisdiction to make said order as it was made after an appeal had been taken from the judgment, and that by virtue of said appeal jurisdiction over the action was vested in the appellate court. This contention we think has already been answered, and answered adversely to petitioners' contention. As noted above, the appeal stays the judgment but not proceedings to prepare a record on appeal from said judgment. The order on review therefore is limited to such proceeding as may be necessary to perfect appellant's appeal. The trial court had jurisdiction over these proceedings and, under the authority of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, entered its order expressly staying such proceedings.

[8,9] As noted above, the trial court first denied appellant's motion to stay proceedings under said act, and then later granted a second motion for the same relief asked for by the first motion. Petitioners contend that the order granting the second motion was in violation of section 1008 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that when an application is made for an order which, prior to the making of said application, had been refused in whole or in part, an affidavit must be filed by the applicant showing, among other matters, "what new facts are claimed"; and that no such affidavit had been filed by the plaintiff at the time he made his motion for a stay, which was granted, but, on the other hand, the second motion was based upon the same state of facts as the first motion. The penalty for the violation of this section of the code is that the order made under those circumstances may be revoked or set aside by the court in which the action is pending. It is not shown that the trial court has ever revoked said order, and the only inference to be drawn from the provisions of this section is that the order is valid until revoked. At most, the granting of the motion may have been erroneous, but not in excess of the jurisdiction of the court. Creditors' Adjustment Co. v. Newman, 185 Cal. 509, 513, 197 P. 334. "In order that the writ of certiorari be granted, there must have been an excess of jurisdiction by the inferior tribunal, exercising judicial functions." (4 Cal.Jur. § 4, p. 1022.)

[10] It is further contended that the order denying the first motion for a stay is res judicata as to the subsequent motion. While the plea of res judicata may be a good defense to an action in which it is interposed, it does not deprive the court of jurisdiction over the action nor does it deprive the court of jurisdiction to pass upon and decide a motion after it has previously decided a like motion. Its action upon the second motion may be erroneous, but it is not in excess of jurisdiction. Harth v. Ten Eyck, 16 Cal.2d 829, 832, 108 P.2d 675.

[11] In addition to what we have just stated respecting the power of the court to act upon and grant this second stay order, we think it pertinent to call attention to that section of the act which provides that a motion to stay proceedings may be made at any stage of the proceedings. (§ 521, supra.) If for no other reason, we think the order made under this provision of the act may be within the power of the trial court.

[12] Finally, the petitioners contend that as this case is now on appeal and plaintiff's personal attendance in court is not required, nor is his assistance needed in the preparation and presentation of his appeal, he is not entitled to the benefit of said act. This same contention was made before the trial court, and affidavits on behalf of plaintiff and defendants were received by said court in support of and against the motion. After giving this evidence consideration, the trial court in the exercise of its discretion granted the motion. It will be noted that section 521 of the act expressly provides that a proceeding in which a person in military service is involved may be stayed in the discretion of the court in which it is pending. Construing this section of the act (which is referred to as § 201, chap. 888, 54 U.S. Stats. 1178, 1181), the Supreme Court of the United States in Boene v. Lightner, 319 U.S. 561, at page 575, 63 S.Ct. 1223, at page 1231, 87 L.Ed. 1587, stated the applicable rule in the following language, "The Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act is always to be liberally construed to protect those who have been obliged to drop their own affairs to take up the burdens of the nation. The discretion that is vested in trial courts to that end is not to be withheld on nice calculations as to whether prejudice may result from absence, or absence result from the service. Absence when one's rights or liabilities are being adjudged is usually prima facie prejudicial. But in some few cases absence may be a policy, instead of the result of military service, and discretion is vested in the courts to see that the immunities of the Act are not put to such unworthy use."

[13] As just stated, the motion for stay of proceedings in this action resulting in the order of February 15, 1943, was heard upon affidavits. The plaintiff was not present in court but was somewhere with the armed forces of the United States. An affidavit was prepared and sent to him at what was his last-known address, but no response was made to the communication enclosing to him the affidavit, and the information received by the attorney sending him the affidavit was that plaintiff was ill with the measles and isolated in a hospital. His mother had made an affidavit used upon the hearing of the first motion, in which she stated that plaintiff was in the military service of the United States, that his pay was $50 per month, and that he was without other income and was financially unable to prosecute an appeal while in military service. One of his attorneys by affidavit stated that their employment only continued up to the rendition of judgment, and since that time they had acted gratuitously. They have not appeared in the present proceeding in behalf of plaintiff, or at all, nor has any other attorney appeared for plaintiff at the hearing of this matter before this court. The official reporter in the case, although he signed a statement to the effect that plaintiff had made satisfactory arrangements with him for the payment of costs of preparing the record on appeal, and waived the filing of a bond, later by affidavit denied that any such arrangements had been made with him, that he signed the waiver "without considering the legal or factual effect of said document" and "that in truth and in fact neither" plaintiff nor his attorneys "nor any other person had made any agreement or contract for the preparation of said transcript on appeal." Evidently the trial court came to the conclusion from the evidence before it that the ability of plaintiff to prosecute his appeal was materially affected by reason of his military service. In our opinion there was a sufficient showing before the court to justify this conclusion. Plaintiff has no attorney nor means to employ an attorney or to meet the costs necessary to the preparation of a record on appeal. Under these circumstances it cannot be successfully claimed that the trial court abused its discretion in granting the order to stay further proceedings in said action.

Defendants rely upon the case of Rosenthal v. Smith, Ohio App., 42 N.E.2d 464. In that case the application was made to the appellate court to stay proceedings in that court. The court in its discretion denied the motion and stated as the reason for its denial that the act does not accord the benefits thereof to a person in the military service represented by legal counsel who were "authorized to act for and on behalf of him as to all requisites incident to the appeal."

Two cases based upon section 521 of the act have been decided by the appellate courts of this state, and in each of those cases the court denied the application for a stay. Those cases are Briner v. Briner, 60 Cal.App.2d 473, 140 P.2d 995, and Levin v. Levin, 64 Cal.App.2d 298, 148 P.2d 714. In each of those cases the application was made in the appellate court to stay proceedings in that court. The court in each instance in the exercise of its discretion denied the application. The facts in neither of those cases are analogous to those in the present action, and even if they were, the decisions therein would not necessarily affect the decision in the present case. The motions were made before the very court in which those decisions were rendered. Whether the courts, in denying the motions, acted within the discretion contemplated by the act was not before either of said courts. Had there been a petition for a hearing in either of said cases, then this court might have considered the question whether the appellate court properly exercised its discretion in denying the motion; but that question was not before either of the appellate courts at the time they had the motion for a stay under consideration.

In view of our conclusion as hereinbefore stated, we are of the opinion that the orders, and each of them, should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

SCHAUER, Justice.

I concur in the judgment of affirmance but dissent from the holding that the order appealed from is not appealable.

The motion to stay proceedings was made under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 (§ 201, chap. 888, 54 U. S. Stats. 1178, 1181). The order entered on such motion provides "That the motion to stay any further proceedings including proceedings on appeal be and the same is hereby granted, on the ground that, in the opinion of this Court, the plaintiff cannot properly prosecute this action, by reason of his military service; and that said plaintiff, Dino Preftokis, is granted a stay of proceedings for the period of his military service in the armed forces of the United States of America and for a period of sixty days thereafter, in which to prepare his record on appeal, together with the bill of exceptions."

I would agree that an order merely extending the time for preparation of a record on appeal is not appealable but the above-quoted order effectuates more than a mere extension of time to prepare a record. It is an absolute stay, for the time indicated, of all proceedings in the cause. Whether an order made after final judgment is a "special order made after final judgment" within the meaning of section 963 (2) of the Code of Civil Procedure depends on whether such an order affects the final judgment in some manner or bears some relation to it either by way of enforcing it or staying its execution.

The judgment in this case, from which the appeal was taken, is a judgment that plaintiff take nothing and that defendants recover "their costs amounting to the sum of $19.64 and $135.40." In so far as concerns enforcing the judgment for the costs the taking of the appeal automatically stayed execution. McCallion v. Hibernia, etc., Society (1893), 98 Cal. 442, 445, 33 P. 329; Whitaker v. Title Ins., etc., Co. (1918), 179 Cal. 111, 114, 175 P. 460. Under these circumstances, then, the effect of the order staying indefinitely all proceedings in the case is to stay indefinitely execution on the judgment. In fact, such stay order operates to suspend the judgment and all of the defendants' rights thereunder for the duration of the war and sixty days thereafter.

Such an order, it seems to me, is appealable within the purview of section 963 (2) of the Code of Civil Procedure. It follows that this proceeding should be dismissed and the order appealed from affirmed.

A complaint showing that plaintiff claimed $2,200 as net amount allegedly due him, after certain deductions, was within superior court's jurisdiction, even if statement of account, as it appeared in opinion of District Court of Appeal was erroneous on its face.

Action by N. E. Druley against J. A. Peyton to recover money alleged to be due under an agreement. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion to vacate and set aside the judgment, and to enter another and different judgment, the defendant appealed to the District Court of Appeal, which affirmed the judgment and order, 149 P.2d 478. On petition for hearing in Supreme Court.

Petition denied.

George P. Cook and L. E. Dadmun, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

McLaughlin & McGinley, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Petition for a hearing in this court is denied. Assuming, as contended by petitioner, that the statement of account in the foregoing opinion is erroneous on its face, nevertheless, the resume in the opinion of the facts stated in the complaint discloses that the amount claimed is within the jurisdiction of the superior court.

According to such resume the plaintiff was entitled to one-half the profits of his venture with defendant. Those profits totalled $7,900 ($2,500 credited on the purchase price and $5,400 paid to defendant). Offsetting plaintiff's claim for $3,950 (one-half of $7,900) was the $750 due on his share and the $1,000 which defendant had paid to him on account, a total of $1,750. Deducting this sum from plaintiff's share of the profits (as distinguished from charging it, or any part of it, against the joint account) leaves $2,200 as the amount claimed in the complaint.

J. H. O'Connor, Co. Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Asst. Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CARTER, Justice.

Respondent County Clerk of Los Angeles County has refused to accept for filing or file without the payment of a fee of $3.50, an answer of the State Franchise Tax Commission in his capacity as such, in an action pending in the superior court of that county to recover franchise taxes paid under protest pursuant to the Bank & Corporation Franchise Tax Act (Stats.1929, p. 19, as amended, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 8488). The action is against the commissioner in his official capacity as an officer of the State and is in accordance with the provision for such actions contained in section 30 of the Bank & Corporation Franchise Tax Act. In the instant proceeding petitioner, the State of California, seeks a writ of mandate to compel respondent to accept and file the answer.

The difficulty arises over the interpretation of section 261b which was added to the Code of Civil Procedure in 1943 (Stats. 1943, ch. 1031, p. 2968). That section provides for the appointment in counties having a population of 900,000 or more of phonographic reporters for the superior court in such counties who shall receive an annual salary of $4,800 in lieu of any fee from the parties to the litigation excepting for transcription. The salary is made payable out of the salary fund of the county. Parties litigant are required to pay to the county clerk, in addition to fees received by any other law, a fee of $3.50 in the "following instances: (1) Where Section 4300a of the Political Code requires such party to pay said clerk a fee for the filing of the first paper in a civil action or in a special proceeding, except in an appeal from an inferior court.

"(2) Where Section 4300a of the Political Code requires such party to pay said clerk a fee for filing papers transmitted from another court * * * except in an appeal from an inferior court.

"(3) Where section 4300a of the Political Code requires such party to pay said clerk a fee on the appearance in a civil action or special proceeding of a defendant, intervener, respondent, correspondent or adverse party, except in an appeal from an inferior court.

"(4) Where Section 4300a of the Political Code requires such party to pay said clerk a fee for the filing of a petition or other paper in a probate or guardianship matter.

"The fee so required shall be taxed as costs in favor of any party paying the same and to whom costs are awarded by the judgment of the court. Such fee shall not be subject to the provisions of Section 6103 of the Government Code." (Italics added.) The fees so collected are deposited in the county salary fund.

Section 6103 of the Government Code, referred to in section 261b of the Code of Civil Procedure was enacted in 1943 (Stats. 1943, ch. 134 p. 896). It states that neither the State, county, etc., nor any public officer acting in his official capacity on behalf thereof shall pay any fee for the filing of any paper or performance of any official service, except where the officer is acting with reference to private assets or where it is specifically provided otherwise. That section was based upon section 4295 of the Political Code which was repealed in 1943. The later section read substantially the same as its successor.

[1] It will be recalled that section 261b of the Code of Civil Procedure states that the fee of $3.50 shall not be subject to section 6103 of the Government Code, indicating that the State or an officer thereof would not be exempted from the payment of such fee. Yet the forepart of section 261b states that the fee shall be paid where, in the various instances, one is payable under 4300a of the Political Code, possibly indicating that if no fees were payable thereunder the fee specified in section 261b need not be paid. Section 4300a, as amended by St.1943, p. 2846, after setting forth the fees to be charged by the clerk for various services states: "No fee shall be charged by the clerk for service rendered in any criminal action or adoption proceeding, nor for any service to the State of California. No fee shall be charged by the clerk for service rendered to any municipality or county in said State, or to the National Government, nor for any service relating thereto, except for making or certifying to a copy of a filed paper, record or proceeding, when not otherwise provided by law." (Italics added.) It cannot be doubted that the language is broad enough to include an officer of the State as well as the State itself acting in his official capacity on behalf of the State. It has been held that an action against an officer in his official capacity is equivalent to and may be treated as an action against the State or a political subdivision thereof. See Bacich v. Board of Control, 23 Cal.2d 343, 144 P.2d 818; California Securities Co. v. State, 111 Cal.App. 258, 295 P. 583. And the Bank & Corporation Franchise Act specifically provides for such a suit against the commissioner. (§ 30.) Likewise, a suit to recover taxes paid under protest although against a state officer rather than the State is treated as an action against the latter in regard to the immunity of the State from costs. See Innes v. McColgan, 52 Cal.App.2d 698, 126 P.2d 930.

[2] The reference to section 6103 of the Government Code in section 261b is clear and unambiguous. It is susceptible of only one meaning, and that is, that neither the State nor an officer thereof may avail themselves of the exemption from the payment of fees authorized by section 6103. The reference to section 4300a of the Political Code in section 261b may be susceptible of a contrary interpretation, that is, that the fees specified are not chargeable where they would not be payable under section 4300a by reason of the above quoted portion thereof. The question arises therefore as to whether those two provisions of section 261b are wholly irreconcilable and if so which one controls. That issue must be resolved in light of the cardinal rule of statutory construction that, as expressed in 23 Cal.Jur. 760:

"* * * a statute must be read and considered as a whole, in order that the true legislative intention may be determined. All the parts of a statute must be construed together, and harmonized, so far as it is possible to do so without doing violence to the language or to the spirit and purpose of the act, so that the statute may stand in its entirety. For the purpose of harmonizing apparently conflicting clauses, each should be read with direct reference to every other which relates to the same subject, and so read, if possible, as to avoid repugnancy."

[3, 4] It is our opinion that the later provision in section 261b referring to section 6103 is controlling and the State is not exempt from the fees; that conclusion may be harmonized with the earlier reference to section 4300a. It will be noted that the later provision is specific and definite. It singles out section 6103 and specifically states that the exemption shall not apply. Likewise, the terms of the latter section are concrete and clear and it deals solely with the subject of exemption of the State and its officers from the payment of fees. On the other hand the earlier reference to section 4300a is general and the words have more of a descriptive character. It is clearly susceptible of the construction that it is referring to the times and the particular events which call for the payment of the fee. For illustration the event in the instant case is the filing of an answer. Section 261b states that the fee shall be paid where section 4300a requires a party to pay the clerk a fee on appearance of a defendant in a civil action, but excepts an appeal from an inferior court. Section 4300a is more definite and requires a fee "On the appearance of any defendant, intervenor, respondent, co-respondent, or adverse party, whether separately or jointly, except for the purpose of making disclaimer, to be paid upon filing the first paper in the action on his behalf, one dollar ($1)." Italics.

added.) It is to be noted that additional clauses appear in 4300a which do not appear in 261b(3), namely, the fee must be paid whether the appearance is joint or separate and no fee is required in case of a disclaimer. Hence, meaning and effect is given to the reference to section 4300a. The reasonable conclusion is that that reference is for the purposes above mentioned, rather than that the intent was to include the exemption in the latter part of section 4300a. At least it may be said that it is equally reasonable that the reference to section 4300a is so limited while on the other hand there can be no doubt that by the reference to section 6103 the only purpose was to free the fee from the exemption. In cases of conflict between the provisions of the same statute, those susceptible of only one meaning will control those susceptible of two if the statute can thereby be made harmonious. See Dennis v. Moses, 18 Wash. 537, 52 P. 333, 40 L.R.A. 302; Street v. Commercial Credit Co., 35 Ariz. 479, 281 P. 46, 67 A.L.R. 1549.

[5-7] As above stated the reference to section 6103 is specific and that section deals solely with exemption of the State from the payment of fees. Assuming there is a conflict in the provisions of section 261b, the rule should be applied that specific provisions of a statute control over general provisions where there is a conflict. Rose v. State of California, 19 Cal.2d 713, 123 P. 2d 505; Long Beach City School Dist. v. Payne, 219 Cal. 598, 605, 28 P.2d 663. This is especially true when it is possible at least partially to iron out the inconsistencies and make the whole harmonious. Stated in another way where one provision of a statute treats specially and solely of a matter, it prevails over other provisions which make only incidental reference thereto because the attention of the Legislature was directed to the particular matter. County Board of Education v. Fiscal Court, 221 Ky. 106, 298 S.W. 185. The rule is particularly applicable in the instant case inasmuch as the reference to section 6103 was added by an amendment to the bill after it was introduced. The attention of the Legislature was therefore particularly directed to it.

[8,9] Section 261b should be interpreted in the light of the purpose sought to be achieved and any inconsistency should be harmonized to the end that such purpose is not thwarted. Department of Motor Vehicles v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 14 Cal.2d 189, 93 P.2d 131. The obvious purpose in the enactment of section 261b was to provide that the compensation of court reporters in counties with a population of 900,000 or over would be placed upon a salary basis as distinguished from a per diem fee. In some counties the reporter is paid by the parties a fixed fee for each day's services in court. (See Code Civ.Proc. § 274; Pol.Code, §§ 4231-4287a). In others he receives an annual salary from the county and the parties pay the per diem rate to the county. Under section 261b the reporters are paid from the county salary fund, and into that fund are paid the fees specified which are received upon the filing of certain papers rather than the per diem rate for official court reporting. Obviously, it was the purpose of the Legislature in providing for such fees to create a fund at least partially sufficient to pay the annual salaries. Hence, any exemptions from the payment of those fees would to some extent defeat that aim. In this connection it should be observed that the exemption in section 4300a relates to fees for services performed by the clerk, whereas fairly construed the fees mentioned in section 261b are for reporters' services, thus indicating that such exemption was not intended to apply.

[10] Finally, if it be assumed that the earlier and later provisions of section 261b cannot under any circumstances be reconciled, as a last resort it would be appropriate to apply the rule that the later provision in point of position controls the earlier provision although both are in the same statute and passed at the same time. People v. Dobbins, 73 Cal. 257, 14 P. 860; Wilhelm v. Silvester, 101 Cal. 358, 35 P. 997; Alameda County v. Dalton, 148 Cal. 246, 82 P. 1050; In re Roberts, 157 Cal. 472, 108 P. 315; In re Estate of Steehler, 195 Cal. 386, 233 P. 972; Smith v. Board of Trustees of Barnes City, 198 Cal. 301, 245 P. 173. A cogent reason for applying the rule in the instant case is the addition of the reference to section 6103 after the bill was introduced.

For the foregoing reasons the alternative writ of mandate is discharged and the petition for peremptory writ denied.

WERNER v. STATE BAR.

L. A. 18983.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 4, 1944.

1. Stipulations Ⓒ14(8)

Where it was stipulated in disbarment proceeding that transcript of testimony taken in criminal prosecution against attorney should be admissible in disbarment proceeding, which stipulation was made while appeal from conviction was pending, such transcript was admissible even after reversal on appeal although amendment was filed charging specific acts instead of commission of a felony.

2. Evidence Ⓒ577½

Under Code of Civil Procedure, the transcript of evidence at criminal trial of an attorney was admissible hearsay in subsequent disbarment proceeding against the attorney, where it was stipulated that the unavailability of witnesses need not be shown. Code Civ.Proc. § 1870, subd. 8.

3. Attorney and client Ⓒ49, 53(1)

Disbarment proceedings are not governed by the rules of procedure governing civil or criminal litigation and rules of evidence need not be invoked unless necessary to insure a fair hearing. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 8.

4. Evidence Ⓒ578

Where attorney had the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses against him in criminal prosecution and he fully exercised that right, admitting in evidence, in subsequent disbarment proceeding, the transcript of testimony at the criminal trial did not deprive attorney of a fair hearing in disbarment proceeding. Code Civ.Proc. § 1870, subd. 8.

5. Evidence Ⓒ579, 580

The parties and subject matter in criminal prosecution against attorney and subsequent disbarment proceeding, were the same within meaning of civil procedure rule permitting use in subsequent proceeding of testimony given in former action. Code Civ.Proc. § 1870, subd. 8.

6. Evidence Ⓒ578, 579, 580

The requirement that parties and subject matter must be the same to make admissible evidence given in the former action is designed to make certain that the cross-examination in the first proceeding can serve as well as in the second. Code Civ.Proc. § 1870, subd. 8.

7. Attorney and client Ⓒ42

The making of an offer by an attorney to bribe a deputy district attorney, whether or not there was any intention to carry it out, was an act of "moral turpitude" justifying disbarment.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Moral Turpitude".

8. Evidence Ⓒ314(1)

The hearsay rule does not forbid the introduction of evidence that a statement has been made when the making of the statement is significant irrespective of the truth or falsity of its content.

9. Witnesses Ⓒ414(1)

Evidence as to the statements made by attorney's wife, in attorney's absence, respecting an offer to bribe a deputy district attorney, was admissible in disbarment proceeding as lending credibility to testimony that attorney made a similar offer.

10. Witnesses Ⓒ362

Where an attorney and wife were charged with a crime of which they had already been found guilty at time of disbarment hearing against attorney, it was reasonable to attach less credence to their testimony than to testimony of other witnesses.

11. Attorney and client Ⓒ53(1, 2)

The findings of the State Bar in a disbarment proceeding must be given great weight, and burden is on petitioner to show that the finding is clearly erroneous or unsupported in the record.

12. Attorney and client Ⓒ38, 53(2)

A finding that attorney had agreed to a plan to obtain a sum of money from another, representing that part of said amount would be utilized for the purpose of illegally arranging for the dismissal of criminal charges pending against such other party, was supported by evidence, and whether attorney intended to use the money to bribe a public officer, or to secure it for himself, his action involved "moral turpitude" constituting cause for disbarment.

SHENK and CARTER, JJ., dissenting in part.

Proceeding by Erwin P. Werner against the State Bar to review a recommendation of disbarment.

Petitioner disbarred.

Mark L. Herron, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. W. Ashburn and Jerold E. Weil, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

The Board of Governors of The State Bar of California has recommended that petitioner be disbarred on the ground that in 1937 he proposed to William McNeil that the latter give him $2,500 for the purpose of bribing William E. Simpson, a Deputy District Attorney of Los Angeles County. The ensuing transaction led to petitioner's indictment or attempted grand theft, and he was tried three times. On the first trial the jury disagreed; on the second the verdict was guilty, but the judgment was reversed in the District Court of Appeal (People v. Werner, 29 Cal.App.2d 126, 84 P.2d 168); on the third, petitioner was again convicted, but the judgment was reversed in this court. People v. Werner, 16 Cal.2d 216, 105 P.2d 927. While petitioner's appeal was pending in this court, The State Bar instituted proceedings against him, charging him with having been convicted of a felony. After the conviction was reversed, the notice to show cause was amended to charge that petitioner made the offer to McNeil with the intention of defrauding him. The local committee found that petitioner committed the acts charged. The Board of Governors found that petitioner offered to use the funds he solicited to obtain the illegal dismissal of a charge against McNeil, and that he made the offer with the intention of defrauding McNeil. The only evidence introduced before The State Bar was the record of the third trial. Early in the course of the proceeding, petitioner stipulated that "the testimony as transcribed by the reporter in the case of The People of the State of California versus Erwin P. Werner * * * may be read and used in this proceeding with like force and effect as if the witnesses whose testimony as found in said transcript were on the stand and testifying in person, subject to all legal objections either as to form or as to substance." Petitioner concedes that if this stipulation is applicable, it is irrevocable, and that the evidence was properly admitted, but contends that the stipulation became inapplicable because the notice was amended to charge specific acts instead of conviction of a felony and that his objection to the admission of the transcript of the criminal trial should have been sustained.

[1] The stipulation provides that the transcript is admissible "in this proceeding." When it was made, it was reasonable to expect that the proceeding would involve precisely the type of amendment made. Since The State Bar proceeding was stayed pending outcome of petitioner's appeal, and since that outcome was unknown, the proceeding could not be continued, in the event of a reversal, without an amendment of the notice to make it charge the commission of certain acts involved in the criminal trial rather than conviction at that trial. The stipulation could hardly be construed as applicable only to a charge of conviction of crime without becoming meaningless, for it provides for the reading of the testimony of witnesses, and there would be no reason for reading such testimony merely to establish conviction of a crime.

[2,3] Even if the stipulation were regarded as inapplicable, this evidence was admissible. The transcript of the evidence at the criminal trial was admissible hearsay in the State Bar proceeding. Such hearsay is admissible in civil proceedings if it is "The testimony of a witness deceased, or out of the jurisdiction, or unable to testify, given in a former action between the same parties, relating to the same matter." Code Civ.Proc. § 1870, subd. 8. In criminal proceedings the rule governing the testimony of witnesses other than defendant is contained in Penal Code, section 686, which provides that the testimony of a witness deceased, insane, out of the jurisdiction, or who cannot be discovered, given at a previous trial of the action, may be admitted. See People v. Bird, 132 Cal. 261, 64 P. 259. Petitioner, relying on section 1870, subdivision 8, of the Code of Civil Procedure, contends that the conditions imposed therein are not met. It has been repeatedly held, however, that disbarment proceedings are not governed by the rules of procedure governing civil or criminal litigation. Johnson v. State Bar, 4 Cal.2d 744, 52 P.2d 928; Herron v. State Bar, 212 Cal. 196, 298 P. 474; Matter of Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 430, 108 P. 322; In re Vaughan, 189 Cal. 491, 209 P. 353, 24 A.L.R. 858. There is no legislative requirement, therefore, that the rules of evidence in the Code of Civil Procedure be applied in disbarment proceedings, although they are frequently invoked to insure a fair hearing. See In re Richardson, 209 Cal. 492, 288 P. 669; In re Lacy, 234 Mo.App. 71, 112 S.W.2d 594; In re Durant, 80 Conn. 140, 67 A. 497, 10 Ann.Cas. 539; 5 Wigmore on Evidence (3d ed. 1940), § 1388, p. 103. There is no reason for invoking them, however, if they are not necessary to serve that purpose.

[4] Hearsay evidence is often excluded to insure that all evidence may be tested by cross-examination. Englebreton v. Industrial, etc., Comm., 170 Cal. 793, 151 P. 421, see 5 Wigmore on Evidence (3d ed. 1940) § 1362. On three successive trials petitioner had the opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses against him and the record shows that he fully exercised the right at the last trial so that there is little likelihood that any significant weakness in the testimony of the witnesses was overlooked. On essentially similar facts, in Re Durant, 80 Conn. 140, 67 A. 497, 10 Ann. Cas. 539, and In re Lacy, 234 Mo.App. 71, 112 S.W.2d 594, it was held that the record of a previous trial was admissible in a disbarment proceeding, and it was noted that when the court thus exercises its power to supervise its officers in a proceeding in which a jury has no part, there is no need to adhere strictly to rules made primarily to govern jury trials.

[5, 6] In any event the requirements of section 1870, subdivision 8, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which petitioner contends is applicable to this proceeding, have been met. That section imposes three conditions upon the use of testimony given in a former action: the witnesses must be unavailable, the parties must be the same, and the subject matter of the proceedings must be the same. It was stipulated that The State Bar need not establish that the witnesses were unavailable. Petitioner was prosecuted in the name of the People of California, and the trial was conducted by attorneys representing the People. In the present proceeding the case against petitioner is presented by The State Bar, acting as the arm of this court and also representing the People of the State. In reality the parties are the same. Petitioner's contention that the subject matter is not the same is based on the fact that this proceeding is for disbarment, whereas the earlier case was a criminal prosecution. The Legislature, however, aware that a disbarment proceeding is different from any other type of action, could hardly have intended to preclude the use of the transcript of an earlier proceeding in a proceeding for disbarment.

The State Bar seeks to prove the same facts that the public prosecutor sought to prove so that both proceedings actually do concern the same matter. Fredericks v. Judah, 73 Cal. 604, 15 P. 305; McAlister v. Dungan, 108 Cal.App. 185, 291 P. 419. The requirement that parties and subject matter be the same is designed to make certain that the cross-examination in the first proceeding can serve as well in the second. Lyon v. Rhode Island Co., 38 R.I. 252, 94 A. 893, L.R.A.1916A, 983; 5 Wigmore on Evidence (1940), § 1388, p. 95. Since this purpose is fulfilled, the transcript was properly admitted. Moreover, petitioner was free to introduce additional evidence in his own behalf but did not avail himself of this right.

Petitioner contends that this evidence, even if admissible, does not establish that he offered to bribe the deputy district attorney. McNeil was under indictment for grand theft because of certain transactions in securities with a Mrs. Bovell. Petitioner had served as his attorney in similar situations until they had a disagreement over fees. Some time after the commencement of this prosecution against McNeil, however, petitioner attempted to communicate with him, calling on McNeil's attorney in the litigation over the fee as well as on his attorney in the Bovell matter. McNeil, while at first unwilling to see him, finally telegraphed petitioner that he get in touch with him. On the 19th or 20th of August, 1937, petitioner called on McNeil, and in the following week several conferences took place between petitioner, McNeil, and petitioner's wife. After the first visit by petitioner, when McNeil allegedly offered to bribe Simpson, McNeil communicated with the district attorney's office. A dictaphone was placed in McNeil's home and listeners were posted in his basement.

McNeil was the principal witness against petitioner. He testified that petitioner said, when he first called on August 19th or 20th, that "Mrs. Werner had some good ideas and that he had some good ideas as to how to handle it in the District Attorney's office * * * and he said that Mrs. Werner was very well acquainted with Mr. Simpson, the Chief Deputy District Attorney there, and that for about $2,500 he could get Mr. Simpson to, as he said, kick this case out of the District Attorney's Office; in other words, he could square it up, but it would be necessary, naturally, to satisfy Mrs. Bovell. * * *" McNeil testified that on the same occasion petitioner stated "that he was satisfied that he could take care of it in the District Attorney's Office, by paying Mr. Simpson $2,500, and spreading some money around the police department. * * *" Petitioner and his wife called on McNeil the following Monday, and after a brief conversation petitioner went upstairs. McNeil testified that meanwhile he and Mrs. Werner discussed the arrangements to be made with the district attorney's office, and that "She said anything that was to be handled in the settlement of this matter in the District Attorney's Office, she would handle, herself; and if she didn't get to handle the money she would not have anything to do with it, because any time theretofore when they had any cases of this kind, if Pete got hold of the money she never got any of it, and that she could have this case dismissed in the District Attorney's Office by paying to Bill Simpson, the Chief Deputy District Attorney, $2,500." McNeil then testified that subsequently petitioner returned to the room and the conversation devolved upon possible arrangements with Mrs. Bovell. Thereafter petitioner went out to a drugstore, and during his absence discussion of the arrangements with the district attorney's office was resumed, Mrs. Werner again insisting that she handle the money and direct the arrangements. On the following Thursday when the three met again there was a dispute between petitioner and McNeil as to the funds required for settling the case. Petitioner testified that " * * * he [McNeil] said, 'I will put up $10,000 to clear up your situation, Bergman and Mrs. Bovell, and give up the equity in the Crenshaw house and the furniture and these two houses in Culver City as soon as you can come and tell me that the District Attorney will dismiss my case * * *.'" Petitioner replied, "You want me to settle this case for you on jawbone," but "It can't be done." According to McNeil it was then arranged that Mrs. Werner visit McNeil's house alone, but there is some dispute as to petitioner's knowledge of this arrangement. In any event, on Friday afternoon Mrs. Werner called and indicated that arrangements with Simpson had been completed, and again warned that she must handle the cash and the arrangements with the district attorney's office. On Friday evening petitioner and Mrs. Werner returned to McNeil's house. After petitioner was told that the cash for all the arrangements would be turned over Saturday, McNeil turned over to Mrs. Werner, while petitioner was out, an envelope supposedly containing the cash. Actually it contained some paper and one dollar bills. Petitioner and Mrs. Werner were arrested as they left the house.

The testimony of McNeil thus describes an offer to bribe Simpson by petitioner, acting through Mrs. Werner who repeated the offer several times. The fraudulence of such an offer is revealed by Simpson's testimony that he did not know Mrs. Werner, although he had met her once, and that he was absent from Los Angeles at the time the offer was made.

[7] In any event, the making of such an offer, whether or not there was any intention to carry it out, is an act of moral turpitude.

McNeil's own testimony was impeached, for it was shown that he was hostile to petitioner, that he had been convicted of a felony, and that he had made various inconsistent statements as to the time and substance of some of the conversations described. His testimony, however, was corroborated by the employees of the district attorney who had been posted in the cellar, Miss Ruthe Wood, a secretary who took notes of the conversations in shorthand, and Mr. Frank T. Allen, an investigator who took some longhand notes.

Miss Wood's notes record that at the Wednesday conference, while petitioner was absent, Mrs. Werner said, "I want you before we leave here to make Erwin promise that he will talk with me and we will agree with you on everything that is to be done, because what Pete will do—and I want you not to let him do is have any contact with the District Attorney's office * * * I wouldn't go up there. I see Mr. Simpson—very old friend." Werner insisted on having control of the funds, saying, "I want you to pay me the money that is a part of this frame-up." Mr. Allen's notes likewise show that Mrs. Werner stated, "I will see Mr. Simpson; very old friend," and that she insisted on control of the funds.

Miss Wood's notes record further that on petitioner's return McNeil said to petitioner, "Helen and I had a talk while you were out. * * * Helen is cocksure and you are and I am that this Bovell matter will be settled. This house and furniture plus $5,000. I don't care if you pay Bergman and the Police Department. As quick as we can all arrive at just what is necessary and the quicker I can hand it over—I don't want a receipt—it is a deal between three people. * * * I am willing to go on that and I am willing to split another $5,000. There is no use to go ahead and hire a lawyer and go to trial and not know what the outcome is * * * I will let Helen and you work out the details. I believe it would be best that this thing can be worked out under her direction of what she has in mind. * * * If Helen and you can come out at noon tomorrow and tell me that is all set and another $5,000 on the outside. * * * Mrs. Werner: "I am not going to take you for one thing so far as my little end of it goes." McNeil: "You come out and tell me what you can do, it is worth something like that." Mrs. Werner: "I want to see one person and I can do that in the morning. They won't know what I want."

Miss Wood and Mr. Allen were away at the time of the Thursday conversation, but took notes again on Friday afternoon when Mrs. Werner appeared alone. Miss Wood's notes show that Mrs. Werner told McNeil that Simpson would instruct Mr. Arterberry, the deputy in charge of the McNeil case, to dismiss it; and that the following conversation occurred: McNeil: "The house, furniture and a deed to those houses out there and $10,000." Mrs. Werner: "That is Bovshover (Mrs. Bovell's manager)." McNeil: "The other to slide through D. A. office." Mrs. Werner: "This one usually charges $2,500."

Miss Wood testified that there was a conversation on Friday night between petitioner, McNeil, and Mrs. Werner as follows: McNeil: "About the other part. I am going to let Helen handle the money. I want you to be sure and be down here by the 12th. * * * This case is going to come up the 27th and I want it booted out of the District Attorney's office. I suggest this: Two fingers in the pie is a bad thing. If you are going to handle the District Attorney's end of it, if you want Pete to come in, he comes in, but not unless you want it. Is that right Pete?" Werner: "Yes." McNeil: "Pete handles the other end; you handle the District Attorney's office. Pete does only as you tell him and if it goes wrong, you are the one that gummed it up, Helen." Mrs. Werner: "I won't gum it up. I have never gotten in a mess up there on anything I have tried." The testimony of these witnesses shows that Mrs. Werner spoke of approaching Simpson and of a charge of $2,500 in that connection, and that petitioner was aware that his wife was to approach the office of the district attorney.

The fact that all references to Simpson occurred while petitioner was absent may be attributed to Mrs. Werner's desire to retain control of the funds, and to the likelihood that petitioner wished to remain in the background, having recently been subjected to criminal prosecution and to suspension proceedings by The State Bar. See Werner v. State Bar, 13 Cal.2d 666, 91 P.2d 881. There was evidence that petitioner had previous experience with dictaphones, and some of the conversations were carried on in tones so low that Allen and Miss Wood were unable to hear them. It was Mrs. Werner who claimed to know Simpson, and was therefore the logical person to plan the approach to his office. The fact that Mrs. Werner proposed to bribe Simpson shortly after she arrived with petitioner to establish means to free McNeil, suggests that she had been led by petitioner to believe that such object was contemplated in the negotiations. There is additional corroboration of McNeil's testimony in the testimony of Mrs. Schapiro, McNeil's attorney in the litigation over fees, that petitioner told her when trying to communicate with McNeil, "You know I can have that case of the People against McNeil dismissed," and by the testimony of Mr. Newmire, McNeil's attorney in the Bovell matter, that petitioner stated to him that "he was in a position to square the beef for Mac," and "that it was not too late yet to fix the matter."

[8, 9] It is contended by petitioner that the testimony of McNeil, Allen and Miss Wood, relative to the statements made by Mrs. Werner were hearsay as to petitioner. The hearsay rule, however, does not forbid the introduction of evidence that a statement has been made when the making of the statement is significant irrespective of the truth or falsity of its content. Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 293, 30 P. 529; see 6 Wigmore, op. cit. supra, § 1772, p. 191; see cases collected at 10 Cal.Jur., § 288, p. 1036. Mrs. Werner's declarations that she would see Simpson were not offered as evidence that she intended to do so, but the making of the offer lends credibility to McNeil's testimony that petitioner made a similar offer.

People v. Werner, 16 Cal.2d 216, 105 P.2d 927, does not establish that Mrs. Werner's statements may not be considered in determining whether petitioner offered to bribe Simpson. Petitioner was there appealing from a conviction for attempted grand theft. The conviction was reversed, first, because McNeil's knowledge of the intention of petitioner and his wife, and his cooperation in turning over the envelope supposedly containing the funds made impossible either theft or an attempt at theft; secondly, because an attempt requires a direct effectual act in furtherance of the crime attempted, and although Mrs. Werner took the envelope she did so without petitioner's knowledge with the intention of keeping the proceeds from him, so that her act could not be attributed to him. The statement that the taking by Mrs. Werner was "foreign to the alleged common plan" cannot be regarded as denying the existence of such a plan.

Petitioner questions the accuracy of Miss Wood's notes, specifying various omissions, testimony that her symbols for "I" and "he" were much alike, and her dependence on the context of her notes and on her memory to determine their meaning. There is no showing, however, that the similarity in symbols led to any substantial error, and it was not essential for Miss Wood to attempt to record everything.

[10] Much of the testimony indicating petitioner's guilt was contradicted by petitioner and Mrs. Werner. It was reasonable, however, to attach greater credence to the testimony of McNeil, for it was corroborated by independent witnesses, than to that of petitioner and his wife. It is reasonable to suppose that the testimony of the latter would be influenced by the fact that they were charged with a crime of which they had already been found guilty. Caldwell v. Weiner, 203 Cal. 543, 264 P. 1100; Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 128, 113 P. 147; Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 723, 141 P. 217.

The evidence shows unquestionably that petitioner was trying to make some arrangement for the dismissal of the charge against McNeil. Petitioner contends, however, that the evidence shows that the arrangement contemplated was restitution to Mrs. Bovell and a demonstration to Mr. Arterberry, the Deputy District Attorney in charge of the Bovell matter, of the weakness of the prosecution's case. It appears from Miss Wood's notes and from testimony of other witnesses that there was much conversation on the possibility of satisfying Mrs. Bovell and of convincing her that she overstated the case against McNeil, so that she would lose her effectiveness as principal witness for Arter-berry. Thus Miss Wood's notes show that petitioner said, "I think we can put a story in her mind to the effect that there is nothing criminal about this; that Mr. Bovshover got her to say certain things that weren't true." The concern of petitioner and Mrs. Werner over Mrs. Bovell's attitude and the presentation of a strong case to Arterberry is not inconsistent with the evidence that they proposed to bribe Simpson. The reason given for bribing Simpson was that Arterberry was subject to his authority. Miss Wood's notes record that when Mrs. Werner was asked by McNeil, "Do you think he [Simpson] has control of Arterberry?" she replied, "Completely." Simpson, however, could hardly direct Arterberry to dismiss the prosecution without giving some reason; otherwise, not only Arterberry but Mrs. Bovell and her attorney, Mr. Bergman, would question the dismissal. An adjustment with Mrs. Bovell and an explanation to Arterberry for the dismissal of the prosecution would be natural if Simpson were to be bribed.

Petitioner contends also that Mrs. Werner was not going to bribe Simpson, but was going to hire another attorney to present the case to the district attorney's office; that this plan was implicit in her reference, made in petitioner's presence, to seeing a certain person; and that this plan accounts for the $2,500 of the $10,000 that was to be given Mrs. Werner, otherwise unaccounted for except for the testimony that it was to be used for a bribe. To support this argument, the attorney who defended Mrs. Werner on the criminal trial, and who now represents petitioner, testified that he was to be the attorney to present the case to the district attorney's office. This evidence was brought forward for the first time on the third trial and the conflict between it and the testimony of McNeil, Miss Wood, and Allen was resolved against petitioner by the local committee and the Board of Governors.

[11] It is well established that the findings of The State Bar must be given great weight. Light v. State Bar, 14 Cal. 2d 328, 94 P.2d 35; Furman v. State Bar, 12 Cal.2d 212, 83 P.2d 12; Hizar v. State Bar, 20 Cal.2d 223, 124 P.2d 812; Utz v. State Bar, 21 Cal.2d 100, 104, 130 P.2d 377; Peterser v. State Bar, 21 Cal.2d 866, 870, 136 P.2d 561. The burden is on petitioner to show that the finding is clearly erroneous or unsupported in the record. Hizar

v. State Bar, supra, 20 Cal.2d at page 227, 124 P.2d 812; Petersen v. State Bar, supra, 21 Cal.2d at page 870, 136 P.2d 561; Moura v. State Bar, 18 Cal.2d 31, 112 P.2d 629; Kennedy v. State Bar, 13 Cal.2d 236, 240, 88 P.2d 920. Petitioner has not sustained this burden.

[12] Petitioner contends that the finding of the Board of Governors is not within the issues raised by the notice. The notice stated that petitioner proposed to pay a sum of money to William Simpson for the purpose of bribing him in connection with the case of People v. McNeil, and that petitioner attempted to defraud McNeil by seeking to obtain from him a sum of money on the false representation that it would be used to bribe Simpson. The local committee found that petitioner made such an offer, and that it was intended as a means of defrauding McNeil. The finding of the Board of Governors was less explicit, declaring that petitioner entered into a plan with his wife to obtain $10,000 from William McNeil, and "represented to said McNeil that a part of said amount would be utilized for the purpose of illegally arranging for the dismissal of a criminal charge pending against McNeil. * * *" While this finding does not follow the language of the notice, it is amply supported by the evidence, and shows a plan to defraud and an offer to bribe a public officer. The board also found "that as a part of said plan the respondent, with his wife, sought to obtain $10,000 from William McNeil with intent to commit grand theft of a portion of said amount."

Whether petitioner intended to use the money to bribe a public officer or whether he intended to secure it for himself, he committed acts involving moral turpitude that constitute a cause for disbarment.

It is therefore ordered that the petitioner be disbarred from the practice of law in California and that his name be struck from the roll of attorneys, this order to become effective thirty days after it is filed.

GIBSON, C. J., and CURTIS, and EDMONDS, J., concurred.

SHENK, J. (concurring and dissenting).

I concur in the order of disbarment on the ground that the transcript of the testimony of witnesses taken on the trial of the petitioner for the criminal offense was admissible in evidence in the disbarment proceeding pursuant to the stipulation entered into by the petitioner, and that the evidence supports the conclusion that disbarment should follow. However, I dissent from the determination that, aside from the stipulation, and assuming unavailability of the witnesses, the transcript of the testimony taken at the trial of the petitioner on a felony charge as to which there was no final judgment of conviction, may be introduced in a disbarment proceeding against him to prove the commission of acts of moral turpitude. In a case of conviction, the testimony would be unnecessary as the fact of conviction is ground for disbarment. In my opinion this court should not in the absence of a stipulation, approve the introduction in evidence in a disbarment proceeding of the transcribed testimony of witnesses taken in the trial of an attorney on a charge of which he was not finally convicted, to prove acts of moral turpitude, much less in a case, such as this, where the determination of the question is not a necessary ground for disbarment.

Furthermore, I am in disagreement with the statement in the majority opinion that the requirements of section 1870, subdivision 8 of the Code of Civil Procedure have been met, in that the testimony was "given in a former action between the same parties, relating to the same matter." The majority do not come to the conclusion that the parties and subject matter are the same. Cf. United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, D.C.N.Y., 1 F.R.D. 48. The opinion avoids the necessity for such a conclusion by stating in essence that the effect is the same; that in disbarment proceedings the law does not require a strict adherence to the rules of procedure governing civil and criminal cases, and that there is no reason for invoking such rules unless they are necessary to insure a fair hearing. This court has recognized that in hearings in disbarment proceedings there is a measure of freedom from the rules of procedure applicable to the courts. But this court has also adhered to the requirement that an attorney may not be stripped of his privileges except on competent and legal evidence. In Matter of Richardson, 209 Cal. 492, 288 P. 669, it was pointed out that it is not so much a matter of procedural rules, as it is the kind of evidence that is necessary and sufficient to deprive an attorney of his right to practice. In that decision, in holding that hearsay evidence is not competent for the purpose, it was said at page 499 of 209 Cal., at page 671 of 288 P.: "Legal evidence alone should be required to deprive a duly admitted attorney of the vitally important and valuable right to practice his profession, and to impose upon him the stigma of disbarment. The court can be asked in such review only to consider the sufficiency of legal evidence. We are of the view, therefore, that only legal evidence, as that term is understood among lawyers, should receive the consideration of the Board of Governors and committees of the State Bar in the exercise of the disciplinary features of the Bar Act." That view was followed with reliance on the Richardson case in Masters v. Board of Dental Examiners, 15 Cal.App.2d 506, 59 P.2d 827.

The well understood test in this state as to the admissibility of the testimony of witnesses taken at a previous trial, where there has been opportunity for cross-examination, is not the court's opinion as to the adequacy of the cross-examination and fairness in the particular case, but is the identity of subject matter and parties. In Neblett v. State Bar, 17 Cal.2d 77, 109 P.2d 340, it was noted that the differences in the nature of the proceedings, in the parties, and in the subject matter inherent in a previous trial and in a disbarment proceeding, might greatly affect the interests and therefore the results produced by cross-examination of the same witnesses.

The cases supporting the majority and minority rules governing the admissibility of testimony taken in a previous trial when the witnesses are unavailable, as an exception to the rule excluding hearsay, are collected in 21 Ann.Cas. page 179, et seq. The majority rule, prevailing in England, Canada, and in our federal and state courts, requires essential identity of the matter in issue and of the parties, the latter comprehending privies in blood, in law or in estate. The statement in the text of the minority rule permitting opportunity for cross-examination (instead of requiring identity of parties and subject matter), as the test of admissibility—the rule applied by the decision in the present case—is supported by the citation of a case from each of two states, Connecticut and Nevada. The decision adds one from the State of Missouri. There may be others, but it seems to me that the majority rule, which has been adopted in this state by statute, should not be disregarded in any determination of the question.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carl A. Stutsman, Judge.

Action for divorce by Paul Litvinuk against Anna Litvinuk. From a judgment for plaintiff, from an order denying the defendant's motion to vacate judgment for plaintiff and from order denying motion to reopen case and for a new trial, defendant appeals.

Order denying motion to vacate judgment reversed and appeals from judgment and order denying motion to reopen case and for new trial dismissed.

Prior opinion, 149 P.2d 882.

A. P. Coviello, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ernest Best, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHINN, Justice.

Plaintiff brought this action for divorce, charging desertion and mental cruelty. Defendant, who resided in Pennsylvania, came to California, employed attorneys and filed an answer. In August, 1942, an order was made for the payment of $25 fees to defendant's attorney and $4 a week for the support of the 17-year-old son of the parties, who was residing with defendant. On October 6 defendant changed attorneys and employed one A. P. Coviello, who was then engaged in the trial of a criminal case in which his client, with many others, was charged with murder. Prior to that time the divorce trial had been set for March 15, 1943. On October 9 plaintiff served on defendant's first attorneys a notice of a motion to advance the case for trial; the motion was heard October 16 and the trial was advanced to November 23; on the latter date Mr. Coviello made a motion for a continuance on the ground that he was then actually engaged in the trial of the murder case. The motion was denied by a judge who was acting as presiding judge, the case was sent out to a trial department and, because of other engagements of the judge of that department, was sent back to the calendar department, where it was continued to December 4. In granting the continuance the court ordered that the case be tried on December 4 and that Mr. Coviello or some other attorney be prepared to try it at that time. On December 4 Mr. Coviello was still engaged in the criminal case and made a motion for a further short continuance, supported by affidavit. This motion was denied, but on account of the condition of the calendar the case went over from Friday to Monday, December 7, when it was again sent out to a trial department. Mr. Coviello was still engaged in the criminal case. He sent a clerk to the trial department to inform the court that he was so engaged. Defendant during these proceedings had been accompanied to court by an adult son of the parties. In the trial department she requested a continuance until her attorney could be present. The court denied a continuance and proceeded with the trial in the absence of Mr. Coviello and without communicating with him. Plaintiff was sworn and gave testimony which, if believed and corroborated, would have justified the granting of a divorce to him. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony and that of a witness which was offered under the label of corroboration, the following proceedings took place:

"The Court: Take the stand, Mrs. Litvinuk.

"The Defendant: Your Honor, I can't understand without my attorney here. I would like to have him here.

"The Court: The record shows your attorney has had plenty of chance to be here.

"The Defendant: He told me I should say this to you.

"The Court: You get up on the stand and I will be your attorney.

"The Defendant: But my attorney, I want him to be here, please.

"The Court: He has had plenty of chance to be here. Do you want to tell me about your side of the case?

"The Defendant: I can't tell it without my attorney.

"The Court: All right. Decree granted to the plaintiff."

Later, on the same day, Mr. Coviello gave notice of a motion, to be heard on December 16, to vacate the minute entry ordering a decree in favor of plaintiff and for reopening of the case. He made an affidavit by which he represented that on December 7 he was actually engaged in the trial of the criminal case, and defendant made an affidavit in which she stated that on December 4, when the motion had been made for a short continuance in the calendar department, Mr. Coviello's client in the criminal case was then under cross-examination by the district attorney and it was impossible for him to leave the trial to attend the trial of the instant case. Her affidavit further stated that plaintiff, shortly before coming to California, had instituted an action for divorce in the State of Pennsylvania; that the case had been tried and that plaintiff had been denied a divorce. No affidavit by plaintiff was filed denying these statements concerning the Pennsylvania case. Plaintiff's attorney filed an affidavit which contained the following equivocal statement: "That affiant also alleges that to his knowledge no action was ever filed for divorce in the State of Pennsylvania wherein the divorce was denied." Unaccountably, Mr. Coviello failed to make an appearance on December 16 to present his motion and it was denied. Immediately thereafter findings and a decree of divorce were signed and filed. On February 17 Mr. Coviello gave notice of a motion, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate the decree on the grounds of "mistake, inadvertence, and surprise." With the motion was tendered a verified proposed cross-complaint for separate maintenance, charging plaintiff with willful neglect. It was alleged in the cross-complaint that plaintiff herein on or about March 5, 1940, had instituted a divorce action in the Court of Common Pleas for Philadelphia County, Pennsylvania; that said divorce proceeding continued for approximately one year, and that plaintiff herein had been denied a divorce in that action.

In an affidavit of defendant's attorney filed shortly before the argument of the motion to vacate the judgment, it was stated that in several conversations between the affiant and plaintiff's attorney, prior to the trial, mention had been made of the Pennsylvania case and of the fact that plaintiff had not complied with an order made in that case for the payment of costs and attorney's fees. Plaintiff's attorney filed an affidavit on the following day in which there was no denial of these conversations or of the existence of the Pennsylvania decree.

[1] Defendant so framed her notice of motion to vacate the judgment that it could be construed as also a notice of intention to move for a new trial but she filed the notice on the 61st day after the judgment was entered. Her right to appeal from the judgment expired with the 60th day and with it the right to have a review of the order denying her motion in so far as it related to her motion for a new trial. Code of Civ.Proc. § 939; Pacific Light, etc., Corp. v. Kauffman, 1919, 39 Cal.App. 499, 179 P. 452; Bates v. Ransome-Crummey Co., 1919, 42 Cal.App. 699, 184 P. 39. The question is suggested by these facts whether defendant upon her appeal from the order refusing to vacate the judgment has a right to have reviewed rulings which were made before the findings and judgment were signed and which were specified as a ground for a new trial. We do not answer this question for reasons which will hereinafter appear. We deem it immaterial whether as a matter of strict right and according to established procedure defendant could attack the judgment by motion under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure (but see Foley v. Foley (1898), 120 Cal. 33, 52 P. 122, 65 Am.St.Rep. 147; Rehfuss v. Rehfuss, 1915, 169 Cal. 86, 91, 145 P. 1020).

The case, in our opinion, is clearly one in which the interest of the state was and is paramount to the interests or procedural rights of either or both of the parties. We think it was the duty of the court to vacate the judgment when it was made to appear that the plaintiff, shortly before coming to California, had been denied a divorce after a trial in Pennsylvania.

[2] It appears from the record that the court was not advised at the time of the trial of the case that plaintiff had previously sued for divorce and had been denied a decree. As the record stands, it appears as an admitted fact that after being denied a divorce in Pennsylvania plaintiff came to California and instituted the present action as soon as he had established a residence and that he concealed the fact of the former judgment from the California court. No claim was made at the trial that any grounds for divorce had arisen recently; plaintiff accused his wife of cruelty and desertion and it appeared that they had not lived together since 1934 and that he had made no effort to bring her to California.

[3] Only one witness was produced to corroborate the plaintiff's testimony, one Mary Dimitroff, whose testimony we quote in full, as follows: "By Mr. Best: Q. You know both parties to this action, Anna and Paul Litvinut? A. I know Anna Litvinut from 1912, when I come to the United States.

"Q. You know Paul has lived in this County and State since February, 1941? A. In this State, yes; he has been to my house.

"Q. You knew both these parties when they were married back East, did you not? A. Yes.

"Q. Do you know of your own knowledge these parties separated in 1934? A. Yes; I was on a trip back East then, and I heard from my parents they are separated. They fight, and they lead an unhappy life.

"Q. You also saw Paul at that time, did you not? A. Yes.

"Q. You knew he had left the house? A. Yes.

"Q. Because he was going to be beaten up? A. I heard they fighting and don't live together.

"Q. You know that separation was against his will and consent? A. That's right.

"Q. You know they have lived separated and apart ever since that time? A. That's right.

"Q. Were these parties very happily married? A. I know they was not.

"Q. Tell the Court what you have observed about the married life—fighting on the streets, and all that? A. Well, I believe it was 1921; I am not very sure; I saw them on Easter Day, another lady fighting her.

"Q. On the street? A. Yes.

"Q. A fist fight? A. Yes; they been fighting.

"Q. Do you know that Paul and Anna were never happy in the house? A. That's what I heard.

"Q. You were in the house too, weren't you? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you ever see how Anna treated Paul? A. No, I never saw.

"Q. Never saw her treat him affectionately? A. No.

"Mr. Best: That's all."

We think it must be conceded that the testimony of this witness was wholly ineffective as evidence to establish either cruelty or desertion and that the proof failed to meet the requirements of section 130 of the Civil Code that no divorce shall be granted upon the uncorroborated testimony or admission of the parties.

[4, 5] When the court was called upon to vacate the judgment it was confronted not alone with the claims of error asserted by the defendant, but with established rules of law and public policy which affect the interests of the state and of the court. Through inadvertent failure of the court to properly appraise the testimony, a decree of divorce had been granted to plaintiff which it was not within the power of the court to grant, for under no construction of the attempted corroboration could the evidence of Mary Dimitroff have been deemed sufficient to meet the requirement of the statute. The court has no general power to grant divorces. Its authority is derived from statutory law and must be exercised within legal limitations. It was said in Grannis v. Superior Court, 1905, 146 Cal. 245, at page 253, 79 P. 891, at page 895, 106 Am.St.Rep. 23, "The provision forbidding the granting of a divorce solely upon the admission, stipulation, or testimony of the parties goes to the sufficiency of the proof, which is not ordinarily disclosed upon the record. A disregard of this provision cannot be made to appear of record except upon appeal, and for this reason it cannot be made the subject of inquiry upon any collateral attack. But on appeal, where such disregard appears, it is always held to be an act beyond the power of the court to do, or of the parties to sanction, and absolutely void."

We mention the obvious insufficiency of the evidence because it should have appealed to the court as a good reason for vacating the decree as being unauthorized by law and also because the requirement for corroboration is a manifestation of the interest of the state in the matter of divorce, which should be considered with other questions of public policy which confronted the trial court and confront us on the appeal. At the risk of redundancy we will mention a few of the pertinent expressions of our courts touching the subject of divorce. In McBlain v. McBlain, 1888, 77 Cal. 507, at page 509, 20 P. 61, it was said: "Not only can no divorce be granted upon the default of the defendant, or a finding of fact made by a referee, but the law inhibits the granting of divorces upon the uncorroborated testimony or admission of the parties. The parties to the action are not the only people interested in the result thereof. The public has an interest in the result of every suit for divorce; the policy and the letter of the law concur in guarding against collusion and fraud; and it should be the aim of the court to afford the fullest possible hearing in such matters." See also Cottrell v. Cottrell, 1890, 83 Cal. 457, 23 P. 531. In Grannis v. Superior Court, supra, 146 Cal. at page 252, 79 P. at page 894, 106 Am.St.Rep. 23, it was said: "The parties to such an action have not the right to control procedure as in other actions. The court is not bound by admissions in the pleadings, nor by the stipulations of the parties, nor is its inquiry as to the facts limited by the pleadings" and the court quoted from Deyoe v. Superior Court, 1903, 140 Cal. 476, 482, 74 P. 28, 98 Am.St.Rep. 73, as follows: "While an action to obtain a decree dissolving the relation of husband and wife is nominally an action between two parties, the state, because of its interest in maintaining the same unless good cause for its dissolution exists, is an interested party. It has been said by eminent writers upon the subject that such an action is really a triangular proceeding in which the husband and the wife and the state are parties." See also Kegley v. Kegley, 1936, 16 Cal.App.2d 216, 60 P.2d 482. In Rehfuss v. Rehfuss, supra, 169 Cal. 86, at page 92, 145 P. 1020, at page 1022, the court said: "Where it becomes manifest to the court, before it loses jurisdiction of the case, that a judgment decreeing a divorce has been obtained by collusive agreement between the parties, or through fraud practiced upon the court, the court has the inherent power to set aside the judgment. This it may do on its own motion. [Citing cases.]"

[6] An attempt to procure a divorce in this state which had recently been denied by the courts of Pennsylvania, by concealing information as to the earlier case, would have been a flagrant fraud. It would be scandalous and a reproach to the administration of justice to allow one who had been denied a divorce in the state of his domicile to go to another state and, through concealment of the earlier judgment, obtain relief which his own courts had denied him. The interest which the state has in the institution of marriage and the preservation of family ties and sound public policy call for the assertion by the courts of their dignity and independence and for prompt and effective action to learn whether a litigant is attempting or has perpetrated deceit upon the court by the concealment or misrepresentation of material facts. The divorce laws of California are moderately strict and the legislature has repeatedly refused to relax them. By reason of this attitude and the vigilance of the courts in requiring adequate proof in divorce cases, including corroboration as to material facts, the courts of California have been free from the criticism that divorces may be had for the mere asking, with little or no regard for the merits of the case. So far as the record shows, defendant had a complete defense to the action. The fact that the former adjudication was not alleged by answer evidences neglect upon the part of defendant or her counsel or both. But where matters of grave public policy are involved, the ignorance or negligence of the parties or the mere mistakes or derelictions of their attorneys cannot affect the power and duty of the court to withhold a judgment which is undeserved or to vacate one which has been obtained wrongfully. It is the policy and the practice of the courts to allow and even to encourage a full disclosure of the facts in divorce cases. The rules of procedure are relaxed as in no other class of cases so as to accord a hearing as to the merits of defenses asserted in apparent good faith. This policy has been consistently followed in our state and we regard it as controlling upon this appeal. The defendant had come to California with a son of the parties for the purpose of defending the action. Both were in court for the purpose of testifying and they had been accused by the testimony of plaintiff of having forcibly ejected him from the home. The son was accused of having struck his father on that occasion. Defendant, through no fault of her own, found herself without the services of her attorney on the day of the trial. It does not appear that she had ever been advised that she would have to procure the services of another attorney on the trial if Mr.

Coviello was unable to attend, nor does it appear that Mr. Coviello made any effort to procure the services of other counsel for her. She should not be held accountable for her attorney's mistakes or lack of co-operation to the extent of having the case go against her without a full hearing. She was given an opportunity to tell her story, but in insisting that she could not do so in the absence of her attorney she appears to have been acting under his instruction. She was not questioned as to the acts of which she and the son had been accused in the testimony of the husband. It is not at all surprising that she felt helpless and incapable of presenting her defense when asked if she wanted to tell about her side of the case. She must have had an earnest desire to tell it when she came from Pennsylvania to California for that purpose. The opportunity which she had to present her defense might have been sufficient in an ordinary civil action but we think it was not sufficient in this suit for divorce. As said in Rehfuss v. Rehfuss, supra, 169 Cal. 86, at page 92, 145 P. 1020, at page 1022: "An action for divorce concerns not only the parties immediately interested, but also the state. The attorneys in the case represent the respective parties—the court in a sense represents the state. It is the duty of the court, representing the state, in accordance with the letter and policy of the law, to guard strictly against fraud, collusion, or imposition when the husband or wife seeks to dissolve the bonds that bind them together."

[7] No excuse has been offered for the failure to plead the former adjudication as a defense to the action, and if this were an ordinary civil action, defendant's motion to vacate the judgment could have possessed little merit in view of the manner in which her case had been handled. But the decision of the court as to whether a divorce will be granted cannot be influenced by the agreements or stipulations of the parties nor can it be affected, where questions of public policy are involved, by the mistakes or negligence of the parties. Even if the decree should not have been vacated upon any of the grounds of defendant's motion, the facts alleged by defendant and not contradicted should have caused the court to vacate the decree on its own motion. The alleged facts as to the Pennsylvania decree were not brought to the attention of the court until the case had been tried. They were first alleged in the affidavit filed December 7 with defendant's motion to reopen the case. At the time set for hearing the motion Mr. Coviello made no appearance. The record does not show that defendant's affidavit was called to the attention of the court or that the court was, otherwise informed of the alleged facts as to the Pennsylvania case. Mr. Coviello's failure to appear and press the motion may well have indicated to the court that the effort to reopen the case had been abandoned. But however that may be, the motion to vacate the decree was submitted March 19, 1943, on the record and the affidavits of the attorneys for plaintiff and defendant, and no objection was made by plaintiff that the questions involved had previously been submitted to the court and that they had been ruled upon directly or indirectly. It was within the jurisdiction of the court to vacate the decree and to allow a trial of the action on the merits. For the reasons we have stated, we think there was also a duty to vacate it so as to allow a full inquiry into the facts, which showed, prima facie, that the court had been imposed upon by plaintiff's concealment of the alleged facts concerning the Pennsylvania case. It is quite probable that the court had no knowledge of the claims made with reference to that case until the motion to vacate was presented, but if the facts could have been or were known to the court before and no action had been taken thereon, no theory of estoppel or res judicata could deprive the court of its inherent power to correct the mistake.

The order is reversed for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed. The appeals from the judgment and the order denying the motion to reopen the case and for a new trial are dismissed.

COSTA v. MAGGIO.
Civ. 2898.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Aug. 8, 1944.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 29, 1944.

1. Partnership ⇨336(3)

In action for termination of partnership and an accounting, evidence supported finding that profits from a certain transaction, in which plaintiff allegedly had released his interest in consideration of advance of partnership funds, were part of partnership assets, and that there was no breach of agreement by plaintiff.

2. Partnership ⇨336(3)

In action for termination of partnership engaged in buying and selling lettuce and carrot crops and an accounting, evidence supported finding that defendant was chargeable with amounts not credited to partnership account received from purchasers in repayment of shipping expenses paid by partnership, and was not entitled to a packing charge in excess of actual cost of packing.

3. Partnership ⇨345

Conflict of evidence as to items of accounting between partners was for trial court.

4. Accord and satisfaction ⇨23

Compromise and settlement ⇨17(1)

Executed agreement of accord and satisfaction, which was made by parties dealing upon equal terms, without fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake and adjusted existing differences concerning relative rights and obligations under a valid pre-existing agreement, is conclusive as to merits of controversy on which settlement was based.

5. Accord and satisfaction ⇨10(1)

Compromise and settlement ⇨6(2)

An agreement of accord and satisfaction can be predicated upon a dispute concerning a claim for money alleged to be due under existing contract only if it is shown that such dispute was bona fide.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1)

Whether purported dispute on which alleged accord and satisfaction is predicated was in truth and fact a bona fide dispute is for trial court to determine from all the circumstances.

7. Accord and satisfaction ⇨26(3)

Compromise and settlement ⇨23(3)

Evidence supported finding that, though check accepted and cashed by one partner bore indorsement "according to final settlement of dealings in partnership," there was no true accounting, and that no accord and satisfaction resulted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; V. N. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Angelo J. Costa against Joe Maggio for termination of partnership and an accounting. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Whitelaw & Whitelaw, of El Centro, and Henry O. Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry W. Horton, of El Centro, for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

This is an action for termination of partnership and for accounting. In August, 1941, plaintiff and respondent discussed with defendant and appellant the matter of transacting business in jointly buying and selling certain lettuce and carrot crops in Imperial Valley. As defendant expressed it: "We go out and buy certain patches and we joint. We are supposed to put up so much money apiece and joint them, pack them and split the profits." To furnish the necessary funds to carry out this enterprise plaintiff Costa, on January 7, 1942, delivered to defendant Maggio, $3,200, which amount was, according to agreement, to be placed in Maggio's private bank account at Holtville. On January 7, 1942, Maggio had $596.83 in his private account. He deposited an additional $900 and also deposited plaintiff's $3,200. Maggio was an experienced buyer and had partnership deals with persons other than plaintiff. He had conducted a packing business and owned sheds and machinery used in connection therewith. As of April 1, 1942, there had been ten patches of carrots and two of lettuce purchased by the partnership. Five patches of carrots and two of lettuce had been harvested. On March 16, 1942, carrots from the "Watanabe Ranch" were purchased and on May 6-14, 1942, were sold at a net profit of $4,446.71. According to the audit of a referee appointed by the trial court the gross sales by the partnership during the several months of the partnership enterprise were $159,949.12. The operating expenses were $124,422.62. The net profit was $35,526.50.

The main dispute here presented is whether the "Watanabe Ranch" deal was a partnership deal in which plaintiff and defendant were entitled to participate in the profit, or whether it was a private deal of defendant Maggio and should not have been included in the partnership accounting.

On January 12, 1942, and thereafter, Maggio executed certain chattel mortgages and notes to one Sam Andrews. They were executed to secure advancements made by Andrews to carry on and conduct the packing business, pay expenses, labor in digging carrots and transporting same. These loans approximated several thousands of dollars. The notes and mortgages were signed by Maggio personally. In addition to the partnership patches of carrots the mortgage also covered two patches of carrots (115 acres) in which Maggio personally had a one-half interest. On January 7, 1942, Maggio deposited $2,250 additional in his bank account. All monies received from the sale of the carrots and lettuce were deposited in Maggio's bank account. All expenses were paid from that account. Costa spent a considerable part of his time in harvesting and looking after the patches of carrots which Maggio had purchased. On February 23, 1942, Costa asked Maggio for and received $200. On March 7, 1942, an additional $300 was paid. Later, on March 18, 1942, Maggio advanced Costa, at his request, $2,700, and on April 1, 1942, $3,900. The $2,700 was to be used by Costa in some claimed personal cherry deal in Northern California. Costa was to go north and negotiate his cherry transaction. A few days before the cherry deal was mentioned, Maggio had purchased the "Watanabe Patch." Maggio claims that before he would pay Costa the $2,700 above mentioned, Costa agreed to release all of his interest in the "Watanabe Patch" to Maggio unless Costa returned soon and replaced the sum so drawn to the credit of the partnership venture. Costa left, but in a few days returned to the valley and continued looking after the harvesting of carrots which were purchased by Maggio under their joint venture agreement. Costa went to the "Watanabe Patch" and found that Maggio had had a disagreement with the pickers and had walked off of the ranch.

Through the efforts of Costa the harvesting continued and the crop was spared, resulting in a net profit of $4,446.71.

[1] It appears from Maggio's testimony that the reason the profits on the "Watanabe carrots" were to be excluded from the partnership accounting is because Costa violated his agreement and did not return the $2,700 to the bank account of Maggio but placed it in a personal account of Costa in the same bank. The evidence shows that the net profits from all partnership transactions as of April 1, 1942, were in excess of $20,000. No demand was made on Costa to return the amount of $2,700 to Maggio's bank account. No impairment of working capital was shown by failure of Costa to return the $2,700 to the particular account suggested. Maggio admitted that the only reason he desired the return of the $2,700 to the partnership account was to cover the possible loss of partnership operations. The evidence fully supports the trial court's finding that the profits from the "Watanabe Patch" were a part of the assets of the partnership and that there was no breach of agreement on the part of plaintiff.

The trial court found that the mortgage and notes were repaid from the profits of the partnership; that after all debts and expenses were paid there remained a net profit of $35,526.50, exclusive of advances made by each of the copartners; that one-half thereof belonged to the respective parties; that $11,026.95 had been paid from the profits to plaintiff from time to time and that a balance of $6,736.30 was now owing from the partnership funds to plaintiff. Judgment was given accordingly.

[2, 3] In the accounting that was had it was discovered that the partnership had paid $30 per car for "top ice" in shipping; that the purchaser repaid this amount to Maggio but that he made no record of the return of such amounts in the partnership accounts. Maggio admitted that such practice had been indulged in but claimed an offset of this amount in that he was entitled to 10¢ per crate as a packing charge and that he instructed the bookkeeper to recalculate the cost of operation accordingly. Costa testified that there was no such arrangements and that everything was to be done on an actual cost basis. Defendant, in the final accounting, was charged with the amount returned for "top ice" and his claim to the 10¢ per crate packing charge was disallowed. The evidence supports this finding. The question of conflict of evidence was for the trial court's determination.

The last point raised involves the question of accord and satisfaction. On July 1, 1942, defendant Maggio drew a check on the partnership account in the sum of $7,126.95, which was payable to Costa. Defendant alleges in his answer that he rendered an accounting to plaintiff from time to time; that a dispute arose as to the "top ice charge" and the claimed credit due on the "Watanabe Patch"; that plaintiff agreed to allow defendant 10¢ per crate packing charge; to exclude the "Watanabe Patch" from the partnership accounting; and that he accepted, in settlement of the dispute and partnership accounting, the $7,126.95 check. The check, received by plaintiff on July 1, 1942, and cashed on September 10, 1942, had endorsed thereon: "According to final settlement of dealings in partnership." As to this transaction, the evidence shows that not until July 1, 1942, had Maggio's bookkeeper made up any form of final statement; that a rough pencil account was prepared which set forth only the ultimate result of profits realized on the respective patches. The accuracy or inaccuracy of the statement could only be determined by an investigation of vouchers, checks, invoices and other voluminous records. The document as thus prepared was not such an accounting as would disclose the entire transactions. Defendant's bookkeeper admitted that he was to prepare a further accounting for plaintiff. Such an accounting was not prepared until a few days before trial. Plaintiff, at the time he attempted to cash the check, struck off the words contained thereon regarding the settlement. The bank refused to cash the check as thus modified. On advice of counsel, plaintiff later reinstated that portion, cashed the check, and, by letter, notified defendant that the sum received on the check was to apply on the amount due him; that a full accounting had not been furnished him as promised and indicated that certain discoveries had been made by him respecting the accounting which would show that more money was due him. Plaintiff demanded another and corrected accounting. Defendant called at plaintiff's attorney's office and promised to render one as soon as his bookkeeper, who was away, had returned. No further accounting was made until time of trial.

[4-7] After hearing all of the evidence the trial court found that there was no agreement between the parties to the effect that defendant was to have 10¢ per crate over actual cost of packing; that $30 per car received by defendant for "top ice" was omitted from the accounting rendered to plaintiff; that certain discounts were obtained by defendant for material purchased which were not reflected in the statement; that plaintiff demanded an accounting but defendant failed and refused to furnish one; that when the complaint in this action was filed defendant was about to depart from the County of Imperial for parts unknown; that on July 1, 1942, defendant drew the check for $7,126.95 and delivered it to plaintiff. But the court found "that said check * * * represented only the amount which the defendant admitted owing to the plaintiff in connection with said partnership operations and nothing in excess thereof and that the plaintiff accepted said check only upon account, and * * * that there was not an accounting, accord or satisfaction between the plaintiff and the defendant in connection with said partnership operations and profits." Where the parties to an executed agreement of accord and satisfaction have met upon equal terms, and without fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake, have adjusted their existing differences concerning their relative rights and obligations arising out of a valid, pre-existing agreement, it is neither necessary nor permissible to go behind a settlement actually made, for the purpose of ascertaining which of the parties was right in a controversy which preceded and constituted the basis of such settlement. However, before a dispute concerning a claim for money alleged to be due under an existing contract can be made the basis of an agreement of accord and satisfaction, it must be shown that such dispute was bona fide. It is for the trial court to determine from all the circumstances of the transaction whether the apparent or purported dispute or the controversy claimed to exist by the one urging the accord and satisfaction was in truth and fact a bona fide one. When the court in this case found that there was not an accord and satisfaction, it may have done so upon the basis of all of the facts submitted to it and determined that the defendant was not in good faith in his conduct or his contentions; that he was in fact acting fraudulently and in bad faith and that he was attempting to fraudulently evade and avoid the obligation he knew to be due. Other cases bearing upon the subject and emphasizing the necessity of there being good faith in the dispute are Cloyne v. Levy, 26 Cal.App. 637, 148 P. 224; Work v. Associated Almond Growers, 102 Cal.App. 232, 282 P. 965; Everhardy v. Union Finance Co., 115 Cal. App. 460, 1 P.2d 1024; Messer v. Tait's, Inc., 121 Cal.App. 698, 9 P.2d 536; B. & W. Engineering Co. v. Beam, 23 Cal.App. 164, 137 P. 624.

The evidence fully supports the trial court's finding that there was no true accounting and that no accord and satisfaction resulted.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte ANGELUS.

Cr. 2313.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California,

Aug. 8, 1944.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨601

The right to zone may be resorted to by municipality on proper invocation of the police power, but such zoning must be reasonably necessary and reasonably related to health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the community.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨63(2)

Municipal by-laws and ordinances undertaking to regulate useful business enterprises are subject to investigation in courts with view to determining whether law or ordinance is lawful exercise of police power, or whether, under guise of enforcing police regulations, there has been an unwarranted and arbitrary interference with right to carry on lawful business, to make contracts, or to use and enjoy property.

3. Constitutional law ⇨70(3)

A large discretion is vested in Legislature with reference to exercise of police power, and every intendment is to be indulged in favor of its validity, and it is only when it probably has no substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals, and general welfare that it will be nullified by the court.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨621

An ordinance of city of Oakland requiring property owner to secure permit from city managers to make excavation in property, except an excavation for foundation for erection of a building for which a building permit has been issued, is valid as a proper exercise of the police power. St.1917, p. 1419.

Special Proceeding for Writ of Habeas Corpus from Superior Court, Alameda County; S. Victor Wagler, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the application of Louis Angelus for a writ of habeas corpus for purpose of determining validity of certain sections of the Municipal Code of the City of Oakland.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody of Chief of Police of the City of Oakland.

J. Paul St. Sure, Edward H. Moore, and James R. Agee, all of Oakland, for petitioner.

F. Bert Fernhoff, City Atty., Archer Bowden, Deputy City Atty., and Ralph E. Hoyt, Dist. Atty., all of Oakland, for respondent Chief of Police of City of Oakland.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus brought for the purpose of determining the validity of sections 2—6.01 and 7—1.08 of the Municipal Code of the City of Oakland. Further facts will be stated as we proceed.

The charter under which it is now acting was adopted by the city of Oakland July 1, 1911. Zoning ordinances were authorized by the act of 1917, page 1419. On February 5, 1935, a zoning ordinance thereafter codified in the Municipal Code was adopted. Section 2—6.01 is as follows:

"Excavations other than in streets. It shall be unlawful for any person to make, or cause or permit to be made, any excavation in or under the surface of any land, public or private, in the City of Oakland, without first obtaining a permit so to do from the City Manager in the manner hereinafter provided, excepting, however, excavations provided for in Article 2 of Chapter 6 of this Code, and excavations for foundation or basement for the erection of a building on the premises in which the excavation is to be made and for which a building permit has been issued. Any excavation referred to herein shall include the removal of any soil, rock, sand or other material for purposes of sale, fill, building, or other construction usage off the premises from which removed."

Section 7—1.08 is as follows:

"'A' District Uses. In the 'A' One-Family District the following regulations shall apply, and the following uses only are permitted:

"One family dwellings,

"Museums, libraries, parks, playgrounds or community centers owned and operated by the City of Oakland.

"Golf Courses.

"Farms and truck gardens.

"Churches.

"Public and parochial elementary and high schools.

"Cemeteries, mausoleums, columbariums and crematories existing on January 1, 1935; alterations or additions thereto; uses requisite to, necessary for, related to, or incidental thereto.

"Accessory buildings on the same lot with any of the above uses, including one private garage, or one private stable for the keeping of not to exceed three (3) horses, when located not less than sixty (60) feet from the front lot line nor less than five (5) feet from any other street line, or a private garage constructed as a part of the main building.

"No outdoor advertising or display or sign of any character shall be permitted in the 'A' District, except: a name plate not exceeding one (1) square foot in area, a sign not exceeding six (6) square feet in area appertaining only to the lease, hire, sale or display of a building or premises; provided further, that no sign or name plate shall be permitted in a front yard or its projection across the entire width of the lot."

Within the extreme southeast corner of the boundary lines of the city of Oakland is a tract called Sheffield Village. It comprises about 100 acres. As shown by photographs introduced in evidence the village is small and stands at the foot of some hills which nearly surround it and gently roll back from the village. Like all rolling hills they do not have any uniform slope. On some the slope is very gradual, say one foot in four. In other places the slope seems to be nearly one foot in one. The photographs do not indicate any out-croppings of rock. On the 20th day of July, 1942, the petitioner entered into a conditional contract of purchase under the terms of which E. B. Field Corporation, as owner, contracted to sell a tract of about 29 acres to petitioner for the price of $11,000. The first installment was fixed at $1100 and was payable on the delivery of said contract and the balance was payable in installments of $250 every three months until the purchase price was fully paid. The boundaries of the tract so agreed to be sold are not contained in the contract. It recites that the boundaries are contained in Exhibit "A", however no copy of Exhibit "A" is contained in the record.

Prior to June 22, 1944 the petitioner entered upon the tract which he had agreed to purchase, proceeded to dig and excavate a truck load of soil, hauled it off the tract and sold and dumped the truck load. Later he was arrested and thereafter applied for a writ of habeas corpus. Had he not been arrested it was his plan and intention to remove 900,000 yards of the surface soil from his property and haul it away and sell it. The cut which the petitioner proposed to make is not clearly shown by the record before us. There are a number of gullies or small creek beds leading down the side of the hill toward Sheffield. They are studded with live oak trees. The petitioner had done some work and had at that time driven trucks through the village of Sheffield. The excavation involved at the time of the trial was work which he expected to perform by using trucks which he proposed to drive around the village rather than through it. His property laid across one of these small canyons taking in a part of the slope on one side and a part of the slope on the opposite side. How deep he proposed to cut is not clear. However he did propose to cut off the sloping banks on a grade of one and a half to one. There was evidence that the bottom of the canyon was approximately 100 feet above the village. How deep that cut was to sink in the gully or canyon does not appear. However it distinctly appears that the work, if completed, would leave immediately adjacent to said village in the place of the canyon studded with live oak trees two naked sloping banks more or less in the form of the letter "V", having a valley in between of approximately seven acres. In the work already done the operation of the steam shovel caused a noise that was heard throughout the village. The hauling that was done caused rock to be scattered on the roads and highways which impeded travel. Dust and broken rock rolled over the side of the road. Some broken rock rolled against the fences of the residential district and broke or loosened the boards on the fences. The petitioner claimed he was placing a private road over the lands of the scavenger company. The length of that new road is not stated. However it was not claimed by the petitioner that he would not use any of the roads. It was shown in detail that he would be operating as many as fifteen loaded trucks and the empties over some of the roads. The village of Sheffield contains 198 residences which had cost from $4500 to $7500. The residences are occupied by young families. There are 180 children, many of them attending schools that are closely adjacent to the roads which the petitioner expected to use. As the Superintendent of Streets testified: "I started to say as to the safety of the inhabitants of that neighborhood, Revere Avenue runs through about the center of Sheffield Village, and that is the street that would be used in hauling rock from this quarry under Mr. Angelus' original application. The street passes the land that has been set aside for a public school and is now used as a grade school. Also, right in front of a small nursery school. Naturally—the street bisecting the village, the children on one side would have to cross the road to get to the school. I made a computation of the hauling operation, based on the estimated quantity set forth in the application, and found that under ideal operating conditions, maximum capacity of one and one-half yard shovel, loading trucks as fast as they could be put in place, there would be fifteen loaded trucks and fifteen empty trucks passing up and down this street every hour. In other words, there would be a truck using the street every two minutes. To me that indicated a dangerous condition in a residence community where ordinarily you would not have that kind of traffic. Other elements of the general welfare clause and the health clause, I think, can be best answered by relating the particular use as proposed here. An operation of this magnitude can only be compared to an industrial operation. It is a heavy operation and it is customary to segregate those heavy industrial uses from residential uses. Ordinarily we recite in the list of uses that are permitted in an industrial zone and wind up with a stock covering clause which says, 'And other uses which, because of the existence of odor, dust, gas, smoke or excessive noise are obnoxious or objectionable.' That is the light in which we consider a quarry operation of this size, operation of heavy machinery, blasting, noise and dust is objectionable in a residential neighborhood."

There is not in the immediate neighborhood of Sheffield Village any railroad track of any kind or nature, nor are there any industrial plants operated by equipment which emit objectionable gases, scatter dust or create noises.

The petitioner has taken every step and means within his power under the laws and ordinances of the city of Oakland to obtain relief from the legislative body of that city, but he has been denied any relief whatever.

On the 22nd day of September, 1943, he filed an application for a permit to excavate. Among other things that application recited that he desired to excavate and haul rock, sand, gravel, etc., from 29.50 acres of land adjacent to tract 537 in Sheffield Village; that said material was to be sold or given to persons whom applicant might select; it was to be hauled over Revere Avenue to Foothill Boulevard and then along such streets as the superintendent might permit; that the excavation was estimated at 897,000 cubic yards and that the purpose of the excavation was to grade and subdivide petitioner's tract into lots according to a contour map "filed herewith." No such map is before us. The application further provided that the excavating would be done mechanically and blasting when necessary slope $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $1\frac{2}{3}$ super-elevation. Bulldozer shovels will be used to dig. Hauling will be by trucks. After granting a permit excavation to be commenced within ten days and to be completed in five years.

When that application was filed it was referred to Mr. Frickstad, the superintendent of streets. Under date of October 15, 1943, he reported that "under the application 7 acres would be reclaimed to a grade suitable for building and the remainder will lie on a $1\frac{1}{2}$ to one slope facing to the southeast. The land so reclaimed would be relatively unsuitable for building purposes. The excavation is therefore obviously the major feature for the project. An excavation project in this locality is not desirable. Heavy blasting will no doubt be required with its accompanying possibilities of hazard and damage to persons and property in the neighborhood. The streets will be damaged if not wholly destroyed, as they are not designed for such heavy hauling purposes. The project commenced and left uncompleted would be even worse in all respects than the completed project. The excavation's costs being of such great magnitude the completion of the project is dependent upon a market for the excavated material. This market is extremely uncertain, and I would say for the next five years or even a greater period, will be unable to absorb the quantities of excavated materials offered within that time. Therefore if for any reason you decide to grant the permit of the petitioner it is suggested that the bond be sufficient to guarantee the completion of the project in accordance with the terms of the application. The cost of excavating this material and carrying it to a place suitable for deposit will be a minimum of 50¢ per cubic yard and may easily be \$1 per cubic yard. An adequate bond for this purpose would be not less than half a million dollars, and such bond is entirely "justified, in my opinion, for the protection of the surrounding properties and the public in general." On the hearing of the application the same was denied.

Mr. A. R. Rowell, attorney for Sheffield Village Home Owners Association, testified that the petitioner's property was subject to a deed of restrictions filed March 10, 1939. One of those restrictions was: "No portion of said property * * * shall be used except for private residential purposes."

A district map, together with a copy of Ordinance 474 C.M.S., the ordinance under attack in the instant case, were introduced. Evidence was also introduced tying the calls of said map to the petitioner's tract. Mr. W. E. Alworth testified that he had been city planning engineer of the city of Oakland since September 1, 1943. Prior to that he had been from 1928 city planning engineer of Pasadena. He testified that he made an examination of the application above mentioned and thereafter made a report to the city manager's office. The contents of that report are not contained in the record, however he testified that the petitioner's property falls within district "A", a residence district as defined by the zoning ordinance. "The homes are all single family dwellings, all above average in cost, all well maintained, with lawns and shrubbery and flowers in each yard. * * * The subdivision (Sheffield Village) itself is very well done. It is designed to discourage through traffic in the subdivision. It makes provision for the shopping center at the edge of the subdivision so that no through traffic will need to go along the residential streets. There is provision for a school ground. There is land set aside for tennis courts. The streets are curved. The lots are adequate in size, in width and in length. The streets are planted with street trees. The whole development is an exceptionally fine residence development. A quarry operated where petitioner proposes to operate would have an effect on the residence area. As to safety for instance, the operation of the quarry would require the use of Revere Avenue through Sheffield Village. This street runs through about the center of the village. I am talking about the application on which I made my report." Mr. Litt, a resident of Sheffield, testified regarding the operation of trucks: "Well, this village as a whole, as you know, is located in sort of a bowl shape valley, and when that steam shovel operated you could hear it going in almost any part of the village. As to the trucks going through the village, up and down the street, the village is somewhat on a slope. The trucks would have to shift gear several times, usually heavy trucks, and every time the trucks were coming or going through the village either first or second gear, and there was necessarily grinding, because they were using their gears for a brake, resulting in back-fire and general noise which results in using the gears as brakes."

Many points were made by counsel when filing briefs. However the petitioner clarifies that situation by stating in his reply brief: "Comprehensive zoning is a valid exercise of a municipality's police power; lack of reasonableness is the only ground upon which such a zoning ordinance may be attacked; particular occupations or businesses even though not injurious to public health, safety, or general welfare, may nevertheless be excluded from certain districts, when the same can be carried on elsewhere. If an ordinance is based on a proper exercise of police power the delegation of power thereunder to designated city officials to determine whether applications for a permit shall be granted or denied is proper. That 'financial hardship alone does not entitle owners of property to relief,' is conceded and requires no discussion. Petitioner is not applying for a writ of mandate." Again, quoting the petitioner: "The sole question is, may a municipality prohibit the removal of surface soil material from private property under the guise of its police power?"

[1,2] The petitioner answers the question as just stated in the negative. We think he is in error. Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 38 A.L.R. 1479, and other cases all of which will be noted below. The petitioner cites and relies on In re Kelso, 147 Cal. 609, 82 P. 241, 2 L.R.A.,N.S., 796, 109 Am.St.Rep. 178, and Matter of Application of Throop, 169 Cal. 93, 145 P. 1029. We think neither case is pertinent because neither case involved a zoning ordinance. He also cites and relies on People v. Hawley, 207 Cal. 395, 279 P. 136. That case is more nearly in point but is to be distinguished in its facts. Three separate actions were brought regarding certain excavations being made by the Los Angeles Rock and Gravel Company. One action involved a nuisance per se and was brought pursuant to the provisions of Section 731, C.C.P. The other actions involved provisions of the zoning ordinances of Los Angeles. All three actions were tried together. The trial was conducted primarily as a trial of facts. In the action involving a nuisance per se the trial court made findings including injunctions affirmative and injunctions negative which resulted in allowing the defendant to proceed but in a legal and proper manner. As to the other two actions the trial court found that to permit the company to continue its excavation operations on its own land subject to the conditions imposed upon said operations by the judgment and decree first mentioned would not result in any substantial injury to any adjoining property or to persons residing or owning property in the near vicinity of the lands of the owner and that any ordinance of said city which would enjoin and prohibit the company from thus using its property was void.

On page 410 of 207 Cal., 279 P. at page 143, the court said:

"In this state the law governing the power of municipalities to enact reasonable zoning legislation has been definitely settled by the recent decisions of this court, notably the cases of Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 38 A.L.R. 1479; Zahn v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 497, 234 P. 388; In re White, 195 Cal. 516, 234 P. 396, and Pacific Palisades Ass'n v. City of Huntington Beach, 196 Cal. 211, 237 P. 538, 40 A.L.R. 782. These decisions, with others of this and the several District Courts of Appeal, establish without question that the right to zone may be resorted to by municipalities upon a proper invocation of the police power. 'But such zoning must be reasonably necessary and reasonably related to the health, safety, and morals, or general welfare of the community.' Pacific Palisades Ass'n v. City of Huntington Beach, supra, 196 Cal. at page 216, 237 P. 539. Further, the court in the opinion in that case says (page 217 of 196 Cal. [237 P. 540]): 'Ordinances having that effect must be reasonable, and must be for the purpose of protecting the public health, comfort, safety, or welfare. Every intendment is to be made in favor of the lawful exercise of municipal power making such regulations, and it is not the province of courts, except in clear cases, to interfere with the exercise of that authority. But, as was recently said by the Supreme Court of the United States, "While property may be regulated to a certain extent if regulation goes too far it will be recognized as a taking." (Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393, 415, 43 S.Ct. 158, 67 L.Ed. 322, 28 A.L.R. 1321; see, also Rose's U. S. Notes). Therefore, notwithstanding this general grant of power, it is a thoroughly well-settled doctrine that municipal by-laws, and ordinances undertaking to regulate useful business enterprises are subject to investigation in the court, with a view to determining whether the law or ordinance is a lawful exercise of the police power; or whether, under the guise of enforcing police regulations, there has been an unwarranted and arbitrary interference with the right to carry on a lawful business, to make contracts, or to use and enjoy property. (Dobbins v. [City of] Los Angeles, 195 U.S. 223, 25 S.Ct. 183, 49 L.Ed. 169;

In re Application of Throop, 169 Cal. 93, 99, 145 P. 1029; Curtis v. City of Los Angeles, 172 Cal. 230, 234, 156 P. 462.)”

Bearing said rules in mind in that case the trial court heard a large amount of evidence and made findings among others including the following. That the work which the defendant was doing when done properly under the findings made by the trial court would be a positive benefit to the adjoining property by controlling flood waters and carrying them off; as to the objectionable noise the trial court found that if the work was done as directed by said findings that the noise would be less than the noise made by the equipment used on the Santa Fe, Union Pacific, and Pacific Electric Railways which operated railroads immediately adjacent to and along the entire length of the Arroyo Seco in which the defendant was operating; and that the defendant proposes to conduct the business and excavations in such a way as to create no menace to public health, safety or morals.

Petitioner also relies on Hadacheck v. Sebastian, Chief of Police of City of Los Angeles, 239 U.S. 394, 36 S.Ct. 143, 60 L. Ed. 348, Ann.Cas.1917B, 927. Hadacheck owned a brickyard in the city of Los Angeles. The city enacted an ordinance prohibiting the manufacture of brick in that territory. Nevertheless Hadacheck proceeded. He was arrested and convicted under the terms of the ordinance. He took out a writ of habeas corpus and in presenting his case he contended that he was conducting a lawful business in a lawful manner. The prosecution introduced evidence to the effect that the brick yard was in a neighborhood that had become built up as a distinctly residential section and that the residents were seriously annoyed by the petitioner's operations. The court held that the ordinance was valid and that the petitioner was legally found guilty of violating it.

The petitioner also relies on Stone v. Kendall, Tex.Civ.App., 268 S.W. 759. The facts in that case are much the same as in In re Kelso, supra. Kendall owned a gravel pit at Waco in the state of Texas. The city passed an ordinance prohibiting the removal of soil. The owner prepared a complaint setting forth that the officers of the city were about to enforce the provisions of said ordinance. The record does not show the allegations of that complaint. In open court the owner presented the complaint and asked for an injunction. The city officers did not file an answer but objected to the issuance of the injunction. The trial court overruled the objection and issued the injunction. On appeal the court of civil appeals stated the condition of the record and then said: “Can it be said that the excavation, removal, and sale of gravel by appellees in the operation of said gravel pit will in itself necessarily, or even probably, injuriously affect the health, safety, comfort, or welfare of the inhabitants of said city? We think not.”

Village of Terrace Park v. Errett, 6 Cir., 12 F.2d 240, is more nearly in point. However in that case the court states facts showing that the plaintiff was the owner of certain farm lands; that the Village of Terrace Park adopted a zoning ordinance covering a strip of territory including said farm land. The plaintiff sought to remove certain gravel. Before doing so he commenced an action to restrain the Village from interfering with his work. The facts show that the moving of the gravel was beneficial and not injurious to the inhabitants of the Village. The court found: “Upon a full consideration of all of this evidence we have reached the conclusion that the health of the citizens of Terrace Park will not be imperiled by the operation of this plant at such a remote distance from their homes, and that the possibilities of discomfort and annoyance are more imaginary than real, and in no wise to be compared with the inconvenience or annoyance of the noise and soot of the trains that pass through this village every 30 minutes.” Thereupon the court affirmed the issuance of an injunction in behalf of said owner.

Bartsch v. Ragonetti, 123 Misc. 903, 207 N.Y.S. 142, 144, is also relied on by the petitioner. It was a case involving a zoning ordinance. No specific section of the ordinance is set forth. The acts of the owners were temporary in their nature. The court said:

“It appears by the evidence in this case that there have been some structures of a temporary nature which have been erected by these defendants upon portions of this land, such as small shanties and a small office, or something of that kind, and that these may be thought or claimed to be violations of the provisions of this zoning ordinance by the introduction of business buildings in a residential district. But, as before, they are not permanent in their nature; they are temporary, and purely adjuncts and accessories to the work that is being prosecuted, in the removal of sand from the defendants' land, and so I think they come within the same rule as regards the sand itself. When the sand shall have been removed and its place filled with earth, unquestionably these structures will not be permitted to remain there, and after their use has ceased, if the defendants choose to leave them there, resort may be had to the courts at that time to compel their removal." It should be noted that said case was a decision by the Supreme Court and not by the highest court of the state of New York.

People v. Linabury, Westchester Co. Ct., 209 N.Y.S. 126, involved the zoning ordinance of the city of New York. It involved a construction of section 3 of said ordinance. Said ordinance contained nothing prohibiting excavations. It was contended that excavations were impliedly prohibited. The court held otherwise.

In his closing brief the petitioner states: "The cases cited by respondent in support of his contention are Town of Lexington v. Menotomy Trust Co., 304 Mass. 283, 23 N.E.2d 559, and West Bros. Brick Co., Inc. v. City of Alexandria, 169 Va. 271, 192 S.E. 881. Assuming, without admitting, that these decisions support respondent's position, we respectfully state that they are contrary to: In re Kelso, 147 Cal. 609, [82 P. 241, 2 L.R.A.,N.S., 796, 109 Am.St.Rep. 178]; In re Throop, 169 Cal. 93, [145 P. 1029]; People v. Hawley, 207 Cal. 395, [279 P. 136]; Hadacheck v. Sebastian, 239 U.S. 394, [36 S.Ct. 143, 60 L.Ed. 348, Ann.Cas.1917B, 927]; Village of Terrace Park v. Errett, 6 Cir., 12 F.2d 240; Bartsch v. Ragonetti, [123 Misc. 903], 207 N.Y.S. 142, affirmed 214 App. Div. 799, 210 N.Y.S. 825; People v. Linabury, [Westchester Co. Ct.], 209 N.Y.S. 126; Stone v. Kendall, [Tex.Civ.App.], 268 S.W. 759." With that conclusion we do not agree. As shown above we have no quarrel with any one of those cases. However, we do not concede that any one of them is in conflict with the cases cited from the brief of respondent. West Bros. Brick Co. v. City of Alexandria, 169 Va. 271, 192 S.E. 881, as stated above, was decided by the Supreme Court of Virginia. It is a leading case with reference to excavations in gravel pits. It treats all of the problems involved in the instant case and many others. It cites with approval Zahn v. Board of Public Works, 274 U.S. 325, 47 S.Ct. 594, 71 L.Ed. 1074, which approved the decision of our Supreme Court, Id., 195 Cal. 497, 234 P. 388. Moreover, it distinguished In re Kelso, 147 Cal. 609, 82 P. 241, 2 L.R.A.,N.S., 796, 109 Am.St.Rep. 178. Finally it closed with this paragraph [169 Va. 271, 192 S.E. 890]:

"An eighteen-acre clay pit in a growing town, contiguous either to residences or business establishments, would doubtless be objectionable. Where it is forbidden by statute (a zoning ordinance), the burden of showing that it is necessary, or even desirable, as adding to the comfort and welfare of the city, does not rest upon it. Statutes are presumed to be valid expressions of legislative will and stand until this is disproven."

After the decision of the Supreme Court of Virginia was rendered an appeal was taken to the United States Supreme Court. That court dismissed the appeal because the record presented no federal question. 302 U.S. 781, 58 S.Ct. 480, 82 L.Ed. 603. Regarding excavating gravel pits within territory covered by a zoning law other decisions are in accord with the case of West Bros. Brick Co. Town of Lexington v. Menotomy Trust Co., 1939, 304 Mass. 283, 23 N.E.2d 559; Town of Saugus v. B. Perini & Sons, 1940, 305 Mass. 403, 26 N.E.2d 1.

[3] As we stated in the beginning in Re Kelso, supra, did not involve a zoning ordinance, however Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 38 A.L.R. 1479, did. Therefore in the very beginning of that case, 195 Cal. on page 483, 234 P. on page 383, the court quoted the provisions of the enabling act of 1917 which authorized the enactment of zoning ordinances. Then at page 484 of 195 Cal., 234 P. at page 383, the court said:

"In short, the police power, as such, is not confined within the narrow circumspection of precedents, resting upon past conditions which do not cover and control present-day conditions obviously calling for revised regulations to promote the health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the public; that is to say, as a commonwealth develops politically, economically, and socially, the police power likewise develops, within reason, to meet the changed and changing conditions. What was at one time regarded as an improper exercise of the police power may now, because of changed living conditions, be recognized as a legitimate exercise of that power. This is so because: 'What was a reasonable exercise (of this power) in the days of our fathers may to-day seem so utterly unreasonable as to make it difficult for us to comprehend the existence of conditions that would justify same; what would by our fathers have been rejected as unthinkable is to-day accepted as a most proper and reasonable exercise thereof.' Streich v. Board of Education, 34 S.D. 169, 147 N. W. 779, L.R.A.1915A, 632, Ann.Cas.1917A, 760."

"It is scarcely necessary to reiterate here the well-recognized principle that courts are loath to substitute their judgment as to the necessity for a particular enactment for the legislative judgment as to the need of such enactment with reference to the exercise of the police power. A large discretion is vested in the legislative branch of the government with reference to the exercise of the police power. Mehlos v. City of Milwaukee, 156 Wis. 591, 146 N.W. 882, 51 L.R.A.,N.S., 1009, Ann. Cas.1915C, 1102; Carter v. Harper, supra, [182 Wis. 148, 196 N.W. 451, 33 A.L.R. 269]. Every intendment is to be indulged by the courts in favor of the validity of its exercise, and, unless the measure is clearly oppressive it will be deemed to be within the purview of that power. It is only when it is palpable that the measure in controversy has no real or substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare that it will be nullified by the courts. The courts may differ with the Legislature as to the wisdom and propriety of a particular enactment as a means of accomplishing a particular end, but as long as there are considerations of public health, safety, morals, or general welfare which the legislative body may have had in mind, which have justified the regulation, it must be assumed by the court that the legislative body had those considerations in mind and that those considerations did justify the regulation. State ex rel. Civello v. City of New Orleans, supra, [154 La. 271, 97 So. 440, 33 A.L.R. 260]. In Hadacheck [v. Sebastian], supra, the court held in effect that, when the necessity or propriety of an enactment was a question upon which reasonable minds might differ, the propriety and necessity of such enactment was a matter of legislative determination."

Those passages make it clear that what was not proper practice at the time the court decided In re Kelso, supra, was by virtue of the enactment of the statute of 1917 a proper enactment within the purview of the police power.

The petitioner's counsel quotes testimony of petitioner and argues that under the terms of the ordinance the result will be that petitioner's property will stand confiscated. That claim rests on the assertion that petitioner's lands are good for nothing but a pit of surplus filling material. That argument falls when one examines the exhibits introduced in evidence. The photographs show said lands to be sightly building lots.

[4] In the instant case under the facts it now appears, and when the legislative body adopted the ordinance we must assume that the facts then showed, or from the facts it could reasonably be apprehended, that the commencement or carrying on of an undertaking such as the petitioner seeks to carry on would result in objectionable noise and turmoil; would create and cause the spreading of clouds of dust; that rock would be scattered on the roads, streets and highways and would greatly impair their usefulness; that the wear and tear of the streets not constructed or intended for heavy traffic would result in the deterioration of said streets, roads and highways; that the hills hereinabove mentioned were in place when the zoning plan was adopted; and that the matter of the future use thereof was manifestly then before the municipal bodies preparing the ordinance under attack. Moreover, that the proposed excavation will clearly result in creating a scarecrow in the face of the inhabitants of Sheffield Village and by reason of the precipitous banks numerous slides will occur in the winter time greatly enhancing the objectionable appearance of the excavated territory. Under such circumstances it is apparent that no court may say that the minds of reasonable men may not differ as to the advisability of allowing such excavation. Having reached that conclusion, under all of the authorities the power of the courts is limited by the determinations heretofore made by the legislative department of the municipality. It follows that it may not be said the ordinance under attack is invalid.

The writ is discharged and the petitioner is remanded to custody of the chief of police of the City of Oakland, State of California.

Where 1,200 turkeys of wife were taken under claim that they were covered by chattel mortgages executed by husband, but 600 of the turkeys were returned to wife, judgment for wife for value of all turkeys taken was reduced by value of turkeys returned.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edward J. Kelly, Judge.

Action in claim and delivery by Fred G. Gleeson and another, substituted in the place of Ontario Feed & Milling Company, against C. W. Freeman and Belle Freeman, to recover the possession of certain turkeys, wherein Belle Freeman filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for Belle Freeman, the plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment modified, and as modified, affirmed.

Wright, Thomas & Dorman, of San Diego, and Davidson & Bartlett, of Ontario, Cal., for appellants.

Fred O'Farrell and E. V. Winnek, both of San Diego, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

The plaintiffs brought this action in claim and delivery to recover the possession of certain turkeys, claiming that the same were covered by three chattel mortgages executed by C. W. Freeman.

Gleeson conducted a feed store and C. W. Freeman operated a turkey ranch. To secure certain indebtedness and future advances Mr. Freeman gave three notes and chattel mortgages to Gleeson covering all turkeys on his ranch with the increase thereof and the eggs therefrom. The first mortgage was dated July 10, 1939, the second February 9, 1940, and the third May 27, 1940. In May, 1940, Gleeson assigned the second and third of these notes and mortgages to the Ontario Feed and Milling Company as security for his account with that company.

Mr. Freeman was required under the mortgages to buy his feed and supplies from Gleeson. He also marketed his turkeys through Gleeson, and in the account kept at all times by Gleeson many payments were credited on these mortgages and various charges were made against Freeman. At the time this action was brought the plaintiffs claimed that Freeman owed Gleeson about $6000 balance on the three notes.

On November 9, 1940, Belle Freeman married C. W. Freeman and they occupied his ranch during the year 1941. In January, 1941, Gleeson informed Freeman that he would not furnish him feed or finance him longer and Freeman said he would be unable to raise any more turkeys. Freeman was then delivering turkey eggs to Gleeson but certain small or cull eggs were regarded as unsalable for hatching purposes. There is evidence that Gleeson told Freeman he could do what he pleased with these eggs, that Freeman told Gleeson that Mrs. Freeman had money of her own and that he would give these eggs to her and she would raise what turkeys she could, and that Gleeson consented to this arrangement.

Mrs. Freeman hatched out about 1700 turkeys from these eggs and raised about 1300 of them. She paid for the feed and other expenses with her own funds and in this connection gave a chattel mortgage on these turkeys to another dealer named Elliott, from whom she purchased some of the feed.

In the fall of 1941, the plaintiffs brought this action to obtain possession of the turkeys thus raised by Mrs. Freeman, claiming that they were covered by their three chattel mortgages. Pursuant to this action the sheriff removed 1200 turkeys from the Freeman ranch. For some reason in connection with the failure to give a bond, 600 of these turkeys were returned to the Freeman ranch and with the consent of Mrs. Freeman these were turned over to Elliott, to whom she had given a chattel mortgage.

In this action Mr. Freeman filed an answer in which he attacked various charges made against him by Gleeson and claimed that the three chattel mortgages were paid in full. He also alleged that the turkeys in question were owned by his wife. Mrs. Freeman answered and filed a cross-complaint alleging that the turkeys were her separate property, that they were not covered by the mortgages which had been given by her husband before her marriage, and that they were worth $2500.

The court found that the three notes given by Mr. Freeman to Gleeson had been fully paid; that the turkeys claimed in this action were not covered by the mortgage; that they were the property of Mrs. Freeman; that Gleeson was the agent of the Ontario Feed and Milling Company; that the sheriff had taken possession of 1200 turkeys in this proceeding; that they were of the value of $2400; and that Mrs. Freeman had been damaged in that sum. Judgment was entered that the plaintiffs take nothing and that Mrs. Freeman recover $2400, with costs. From that judgment the plaintiffs have appealed.

It is unnecessary to consider many of the points discussed in the briefs. The pleadings on each side were insufficient in form and some findings are not supported by the evidence. It may be assumed that the finding that the three notes given by Mr. Freeman had been fully paid falls in this category. However, the record rather indicates that if anything at all was still owed on the original three mortgages, after deducting improper charges, it was very little.

[1] The controlling issue here is whether these turkeys were covered by the mortgages given by Mr. Freeman. The court found to the contrary and that the turkeys belonged to Mrs. Freeman. While sharply conflicting, the evidence supports those findings. The turkeys in question were not produced in the manner contemplated by and provided for in the three chattel mortgages and practically all of their value was produced as a direct result of money, credit and labor furnished by Mrs. Freeman who was not a party to those mortgages. As found by the court, this was done with the consent of Gleeson who released from the mortgages certain eggs which were of small value at best.

[2] The appellants further argue that, regardless of the situation of Gleeson as thus disclosed, the release of these eggs was not binding on the Ontario Feed and Milling Company which had taken an assignment of the three mortgages. It is argued that the only evidence that Gleeson was acting as the agent of that corporation is found in the testimony of Gleeson and his bookkeeper, and that agency cannot be established in that manner. While other evidence in this regard is meager it does appear that the assignment of these mortgages to the corporation was made for security only, and there is considerable evidence of subsequent actions on the part of Gleeson, and of business transacted by him in connection with the property which had been mortgaged, which justifies an inference that he was permitted to and did act as an agent for the corporation in handling the business in connection with which the mortgages were given and of which they were a part. In our opinion, the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding of agency and also the finding that these particular turkeys were not covered by the three mortgages.

[3] However, while the court found that 1200 of these turkeys were taken by the appellants, which were worth $2 apiece, it appears without contradiction that 600 of these turkeys were returned to the Freeman farm and were delivered by Mrs. Freeman, or with her consent, to another person to whom she had mortgaged them. So far as here appears, she received the value of these turkeys and no reason has been advanced, and we can find none in the record, why she should be paid twice for these turkeys. It follows that the judgment in her favor should be correspondingly reduced.

That part of the judgment in favor of Belle Freeman is modified by reducing it from $2400 to $1200. As thus modified, the judgment appealed from is affirmed. Neither party to recover costs on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Donald Geary, Judge.

Creditor's suit by Saracco Tank & Welding Company, Limited, against Albert E. Platz and others as officers and directors of Contact Mercury Mines Company, Inc., a Nevada corporation, on the statutory liability of such officers and directors for wrongful distribution of assets of such foreign corporation while it was insolvent to other creditors to exclusion of plaintiff. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Bryce Swartfager, individually and as trustee, appeals.

Affirmed.

Joseph Maddux and Bryce Swartfager, both of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Gunther R. Detert, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Bryce Swartfager, individually and as trustee, has appealed from a judgment which was rendered against him and other officers and directors of Contact Mercury Mines, Co., Inc., a corporation organized under the laws of Nevada, in a creditor's suit for liability under Section 412 of the Civil Code, for materials sold to the mine, no part of which was paid. None of the other defendants appealed from the judgment. The judgment was rendered against the appellant and other directors and agents of the foreign corporation on their statutory liability for wrongful "distribution of assets" of the insolvent foreign corporation to other creditors, to the exclusion of the plaintiff. The plaintiff was awarded judgment for the amount of its unpaid claim in the sum of $3,718.99, together with interest and costs. A lien on 137,640 shares of stock of the new California corporation, which were held by the appellant as security for payment of an attorney's fee of $5,000 due from the last-mentioned company, was also granted in this case, with authority to sell the same to satisfy the judgment.

The estate of John E. Grover, deceased, is the owner of a 20 acre quicksilver mining claim in Pine Flat District 18 miles northwest of Healdsburg in Sonoma County. The estate of Grover, deceased, was in the process of probate in Sonoma County. The appellant, Bryce Swartfager, was attorney for Hattie E. Ward, administratrix of the estate. October 8, 1937, the defendant, H. G. Walker, in behalf of himself and other investors, entered into a written agreement and option with said administratrix to purchase the mining claim for the sum of $40,000, to be paid in specified installments. The contract of sale was duly confirmed by the Probate Court July 28, 1938. January 11, 1938, the Contact Mercury Mines Company, Inc., was incorporated in the State of Nevada for mining purposes. February 11, 1938, Walker assigned and transferred the option and property to that corporation. H. G. Walker, Albert E. Platz and Bryce Swartfager were directors and officers of that corporation. Appellant admitted that he became a director of the corporation April 12, 1939. Mr. Swartfager was also the secretary and attorney for the corporation. It was duly authorized to transact business in California, and its principal place of business was in Santa Rosa, California, where the appellant resided. He had charge of the accounts of the mining corporation after he became an officer and director.

August 3, 1938, the Contact Mercury Mines Company became indebted to the plaintiff, Saracco Tank and Welding Company, for machinery and materials purchased for the mine in the sum of $3,176.52, no part of which has been paid. The appellant knew that indebtedness was due and unpaid. Plaintiff repeatedly demanded of the appellant payment of that debt. The appellant also knew that the corporation owed unpaid debts aggregating some $9,000. No dividends were ever earned or paid to stockholders. The corporation became insolvent. It was in default of payment to the Grover estate of an installment of $10,000 due upon the purchase price of the mining property.

February 25, 1939, in consideration of the expressed sum of $10, the Nevada mining company assigned and transferred to H. G. Walker all of its right, title and interest in said option and mining property. March 8, 1939, the appellant organized a new California corporation for mining purposes, called Contact Mining Company. He then became and still is a director of the new corporation. February 27, 1939, for the expressed consideration of $10, Mr. Walker assigned and transferred the option and property of the Nevada corporation to the new California mining company. The real consideration for the assignment and transfer of the option to purchase, together with all mining equipment and personal property, to the new California corporation, as appears from the written offer of Walker dated March 22, 1937, was the sum of $62,000, to be paid by issuing and delivering the following number of shares in the new California corporation to the parties named, to wit:

200,000 shares to H. G. Walker
50,000 shares to R. L. Page
30,000 shares to C. E. Halliburton
5,000 shares to H. H. Warde

The remaining portion of that purchase price is expressed in that document as follows: "The remaining balance of said consideration, to wit, Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000.00) shall be paid by the assumption and payment by said corporation of obligations outstanding against said property and said H. G. Walker in a total amount limited to the sum of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000.00), and limited to items and persons to be designated by the said H. G. Walker."

That offer was duly accepted by the new California corporation, and the shares were accordingly issued and delivered to the individuals previously mentioned, and said sum of $5,000 was paid to Mr. Swartfager with instructions to pay the same to certain creditors named by Walker. The claim of this plaintiff was not mentioned.

This appellant testified that: "This trustee stock and the $5,000.00 is money paid to a portion of the old creditors constituted the consideration given by the Contact Mining Company for the option agreement and mining claims obtained from Mr. Walker."

Clearly Mr. Walker was acting for and in behalf of the Nevada corporation in all the negotiations and transactions of the mining enterprise. The appellant had complete knowledge of those transactions as secretary of the Nevada corporation, and he drew many of the documents as an attorney for Mr. Walker and for the organizers of the original corporation. He testified: "I have been the attorney for the Contact Mercury Mines Co. at all times to and including the present, since October, 1938."

He also testified: "Contact Mercury Mines Co. received for the transfer to the Contact Mining Company of its interest in the lease and option to purchase payment of creditors claims in the sum of $5,000.00, and thereupon the Contact Mining Company issued 160,000 shares of its stock to me as trustee for the benefit of Mr. Walker, Mr. Platz, Mr. Swartfager, Mr. Halliburton and Mr. England in the amounts set forth in the Walker trust agreement."

The appellant received said consideration of $5,000 belonging to the original Nevada corporation and distributed it among certain creditors as directed. He said in that regard: "Following incorporation of Contact Mining Company I received from Mr. Walker a list of creditors of the Contact Mercury Mines Company to be paid from the $5,000.00 to come from the new company. * * * The list for payment did not include plaintiff's account. I knew that plaintiff's account remained unpaid. I was told by Walker at the time that plaintiff's account was to be taken care of later in stock. The $5,000.00 from the new company was received in various amounts over a period of a year. I paid all the $5,000.00 as received to the creditors of the old company, most of whom had attachments or other claimed liens against the mine."

The appellant wrongfully paid out the assets of the Nevada corporation without notice to the unpaid creditors, knowing that the money was insufficient with which to pay all of them. Regarding the failure to give that notice he said: "No notice to creditors of dissolution of Contact Mercury Mines Co., a corporation, was sent out at the time of the transfer of its assets. No dissolution legal or otherwise of the corporation was undertaken for the Contact Mercury Mines Co. I never informed the plaintiff that the Contact Mercury Mines Co. had transferred all its assets to the Contact Mining Company or that said Contact Mining Company, after the transfer, was operating said mine. I did not give this notice."

When the appellant subsequently learned of the transfer of all the assets of the Nevada corporation to the new California company and appellant's payment of said sum of $5,000 to other creditors without giving it notice of said transactions, it brought suit in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and recovered judgment against the Contact Mercury Mines Company and H. G. Walker. That judgment remains wholly unsatisfied. This suit against the directors of the Nevada corporation for personal liability on account of said unauthorized distribution of assets was then instituted.

Upon the foregoing testimony and other competent evidence adduced at the trial the court adopted findings adverse to the defendants, to the effect that the foreign corporation was possessed of the lease and option to purchase the Sonoma County mine, together with its machinery and equipment; that the directors of the Nevada corporation, acting through H. G. Walker as agent, negotiated to transfer all of its assets to the new Contact Mining Company in consideration of $40,000 "payable to said H. G. Walker on behalf of said three directors and for the further consideration of $5,000.00 in cash from the new company to be paid to creditors of the old company"; that the original Nevada corporation was then indebted to creditors in the sum of $9,000; that no provision was made to satisfy plaintiff's unpaid claim of $3,718.99; that the appellant became a director of the Nevada corporation April 12, 1939, and as secretary and attorney of that company he was familiar with all said proceedings and knew plaintiff's claim was wholly unsatisfied; that he personally organized the new California corporation to which said assets were subsequently transferred, and he became a director and attorney for the new corporation; that pursuant to said agreement "the new company paid the old company $5,000.00 cash" and all of the assets of Contact Mercury Mines Company were transferred to the new company; that said $5,000 was paid to Bryce Swartfager, who thereafter distributed and paid said sum to certain creditors of the old corporation, without notice to plaintiff and without provision for the satisfaction of any portion of its debt; that the new company issued to Bryce Swartfager, as trustee, 137,646 shares of the stock of said new company, which are held to secure his attorney's fees in the agreed sum of $5,000, and that said transfer of assets rendered the Nevada corporation wholly insolvent.

Based upon those findings, the court rendered judgment against this appellant and the other directors of the Contact Mercury Mines Company upon their statutory liability created by Section 412 of the Civil Code, for the amount of plaintiff's claim in the sum of $3,718.99, and gave plaintiff a lien on said shares of stock standing in the name of Bryce Swartfager, as trustee, to secure the payment of said claim, directing the sale of said stock to satisfy the judgment.

A motion for new trial was denied. From the judgment Bryce Swartfager only has appealed.

The appellant contends that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence; that the court erred in rendering a personal judgment against him for the debt of the Nevada corporation; that his title to the shares of the Contact Mining Company, which are held in trust to secure payment of his attorney's fees, is superior to that of the plaintiff; that the court erred in refusing to make Contact Mercury Mines Company a party defendant in this action, and that the court failed to adopt findings upon certain specified issues presented by the pleadings.

[1,2] We are of the opinion the findings and judgment are adequately supported by the evidence. The judgment is founded on the statutory liability in favor of creditors and against directors of a foreign corporation doing business within this state, for violation of their official duties in making unwarranted "distributions of assets," as provided by Section 412 of the Civil Code. That personal liability of directors for the acts or omissions referred to in that section does not necessarily depend upon proof of fraud, in spite of the fact that their conduct may constitute constructive or even actual fraud. The complaint in this case does charge the directors with fraud, but the court did not find that they were guilty of fraud. We think such findings are not necessary in order to support the judgment. If the acts and conduct of the appellant, which are specifically found by the court to have transpired, do constitute constructive fraud, the omission of the court to have so concluded is harmless because it is apparent that more particular findings in that regard would have necessarily been adverse to the appellant. Kramer v. Sanguinetti, 33 Cal.App.2d 303, 312, 91 P.2d 604; 24 Cal.Jur. 944, sec. 188.

[3] The evidence satisfactorily shows that while the appellant was acting as secretary and as a director of the Nevada corporation, with full knowledge of plaintiff's unpaid claim and of other indebtedness in the aggregate sum of $9,000, he organized a new corporation and participated in the transfer of all property and assets of the foreign corporation to the new Contact Mining Company, leaving the former corporation defunct and insolvent. He then received and distributed assets of the former corporation in the form of cash in the sum of $5,000, to certain preferred creditors, without notice to this plaintiff.

Section 412 of the Civil Code provides in part: "The directors of a foreign corporation transacting business in this State shall be liable to * * * creditors, * * * for the making of unauthorized dividends, purchases of its shares, or distributions of assets, * * * whether committed or done in this State or elsewhere. Such liabilities may be enforced in the courts of this State."

Section 45 of the Nevada Corporation Law, Comp.Laws Nev. § 1644, likewise provides that the transfer of any property of a corporation whose insolvency is imminent, "with the intent of giving a preference to any particular creditor over other creditors of the corporation, shall be valid." That section concludes by declaring that: "Every director or officer of a corporation who shall violate or be concerned in violating any provision of this section shall be personally liable to the creditors and stockholders of the corporation of which he shall be director or an officer to the full extent of any loss they may respectively sustain by such violation."

In Restatement of the Law on Conflict of Laws, page 276, section 188, it is said with respect to the liability of directors:

"So far as the directors or agents are participants in acts done within the state, a state can impose liability upon the directors or agents of a foreign corporation doing business in the state for acts done within the state or for failure to do acts required by the law of the state as a condition of doing business within the state."

[4-6] Section 412 of the Civil Code, which creates a statutory liability against directors of a foreign corporation for violation of specified duties, is penal in its nature (Western Mortgage & Guaranty Co. v. Gray, 215 Cal. 191, 200, 8 P.2d 1016, 80 A.L.R. 866; 19 C.J.S., Corporations, p. 303, § 876) and should receive a strict construction in that regard. That section is intended to provide an independent remedy for creditors against directors for their unauthorized payment of dividends or distribution of assets and for other prohibited acts. It has been held the directors of corporations are trustees for the benefit of stockholders and creditors. Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 442, 64 P. 692, 69 P. 77, 89 St.Rep. 153; 6A Cal.Jur. 1100, sec. 620. In the Winchester case, supra, it is said: "Directors are also trustees for the stockholders and indirectly for the creditors. They have always been held responsible as trustees in their management of the property and affairs of the corporation."

[7] When a corporation becomes insolvent its assets are held in trust for the benefit of the stockholders and creditors. In 15A Fletcher's Cyc. of Corp., Perm.Ed. (1938) sec. 7369, at page 59, it is said: "The theory of the trust fund doctrine is that all of the assets of a corporation, immediately on its becoming insolvent, become a trust fund for the benefit of all of its creditors."

Section 311 of the Civil Code provides that "Directors and officers shall exercise their powers in good faith."

Section 363 of the Civil Code declares that: "Except as provided in this title, the directors of a corporation shall not authorize or ratify the purchase by it of its shares or declare or pay dividends or authorize or ratify the withdrawal or distribution of any part of its assets among its shareholders."

The preceding section specifically provides that in case of any "wilful or negligent violation of the provisions of this section" the directors "shall be jointly and severally liable to the corporation * * * for the benefit of the creditors." That section also provides that any judgment creditor of the corporation may sue either the corporation or any or all of the directors for the detriment caused by such violation of the statute. Section 412 of the Civil Code creates a statutory liability against the directors of a foreign corporation for other violations of specified acts and omissions among which are the making of "unauthorized dividends" and the unauthorized "distributions of assets."

[8] In the present case the directors violated both of the last-mentioned prohibitions of the statute. While the Nevada corporation was indebted to creditors in the aggregate sum of $9,000, the directors of the foreign corporation conveyed to the new California company all of its assets, leaving the original company insolvent, and directed payment of all the money available to satisfy only a portion of its debts to the exclusion of the plaintiff's claim, without giving it notice of the transfer, and with full knowledge on the part of the directors of the existence of the debt. They also procured the issuance of shares of stock in the new company for their individual benefit. The transfer was made without notice to the plaintiff. That transaction was a clear breach of trust and rendered the directors liable for the loss thereby sustained to plaintiff. The original corporation never thereafter transacted business. The transfer amounted to a voluntary dissolution of the Nevada corporation, without providing for the payment of all of its debts. It resulted in a preference of existing creditors. Section 401a of the Civil Code provides that a distribution of assets to the stockholders on dissolution of the corporation may be made only "after determining that all the known debts and liabilities * * * have been paid or adequately provided for." This was not done. The directors are therefore liable for plaintiff's claim.

Numerous authorities hold that directors of corporations are liable to creditors under such circumstances. Darcy v. Brooklyn & N. Y. Ferry Co., 196 N.Y. 99, 89 N.E. 461, 26 L.R.A., N.S., 267, 134 Am.St.Rep. 827; McIver v. Young Hardware Co., 144 N.C. 478, 57 S.E. 169, 119 Am.St.Rep. 970. The same principle imposing liability in favor of stockholders and creditors against directors and officers of corporations for violation of their trust is uniformly upheld by the great weight of authority. Lowe v. Copeland, 125 Cal.App. 315, 13 P.2d 522; Southern Cal. Home Builders v. Young, 45 Cal.App. 679, 188 P. 586; Nelson v. Jones, 38 Idaho 664, 224 P. 435, 38 A.L.R. 85; Associated Fruit Co. v. Idaho-Oregon Fruit Growers' Ass'n, 44 Idaho 200, 256 P. 99; Whitfield v. Kern, 120 N.J.Eq. 115, 184 A. 333.

In the Darcy case, supra, under circumstances strikingly similar to those of the present case, the court said:

"The consideration for the transfer did not pass from the purchasing corporation to the Brooklyn & New York Ferry Company or its directors, but was turned over directly to the stockholders of the selling corporation and distributed among them. * * * No proceedings were ever taken to effect a dissolution of the corporation according to law. No notice of the transfer was given to creditors nor was any property retained by the directors with which to meet the plaintiff's claim. * * *

"The liability of the directors is predicated, not on the ground that their action in making the transfer was fraudulent, but upon the proposition that it is a violation of duty on the part of the directors of a corporation to divest it of all its property without affording a reasonable opportunity to its creditors to present and enforce their claims before the transfer shall become effective. * * * We think it is sound in law, and should be upheld. * * * The motives which induced the omission are immaterial. The entire assets could not lawfully be set over by the selling corporation to the purchasing corporation until some sort of opportunity had been given to the creditors of the latter to present and enforce their claims. * * * Their omission to make adequate provision for the protection of the creditors was proof of their dereliction and good faith constitutes no defense."

In the McIver case, supra, under circumstances also similar to those of the present case, the court held, for the same reasons expressed in the Darcy case, supra, that it is "settled that the stockholders and officers of the corporation are liable to it and to its creditors for any acts of malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance by which their rights are injuriously affected, and, as a consequence, for any loss arising out of their fraud or negligence." [144 N.C. 478, 57 S.E. 171, 119 Am.St.Rep. 970.] Numerous authorities are cited in that opinion in support of that doctrine.

[9] The court did not err in denying appellant's motion to join the judgment debtor, Contact Mercury Mines Company, as a party defendant in this case. The plaintiff had previously obtained judgment against that company for its claim in a suit brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, which remains wholly unsatisfied. That company was rendered defunct and insolvent by transfer of all of its assets to the new California corporation. It is possessed of no property or assets which would be affected by this judgment or from which the judgment could be satisfied. The stock of the new company, which is involved in this judgment, was issued to the individuals heretofore mentioned for their personal benefit. All of the directors and parties interested in this suit are parties defendant.

[10] It has been held that where an action is brought by a creditor against a grantee of property alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed, the fraudulent grantor who has reserved no interest, legal or equitable, in the property, although he may be a proper party to the action to set it aside, is not a necessary party. Liuzza v. Bell, 40 Cal.App.2d 417, 424, 104 P.2d 1095; Blanc v. Paymaster Mining Co., 95 Cal. 524, 30 P. 765, 29 Am.St.Rep. 149. The appellant is not prejudiced because the Nevada corporation was not a party to this action.

[11] The appellant contends that the evidence shows that plaintiff's debt of $3,718.99 was incurred by H. G. Walker, individually, and not by the Nevada corporation, and that the court therefore erred in holding appellant liable as a director of the company for unauthorized distribution of the funds. The court found that on August 3, 1938, the Nevada company became indebted to plaintiff for goods sold and delivered, and that plaintiff had previously recovered judgment in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, on September 6, 1940, in a suit against the corporation and Walker, for the sum of $3,639.59 and $79.40 costs, aggregating the exact sum for which this suit was brought. It was stipulated at this trial that said judgment was procured by the plaintiff against the Nevada corporation and Walker. The execution was returned, unsatisfied. It is not contended any part of that judgment has been satisfied. We are convinced the evidence adequately supports the court's findings that the indebtedness was incurred by the Nevada company, and that Walker was acting in behalf of that company in purchasing the machinery and equipment.

In several assignments of alleged insufficiency of evidence to support the findings the appellant asserts that the Nevada corporation issued no stock and that it was in default of payments of certain installments of the agreed purchase price of the mine; that Mr. Walker personally paid the delinquent installments and that one Kassabaum subsequently operated the mine pursuant to an agreement based on a division of royalties secured from the mine, but he thereafter defaulted and abandoned his contract, and that Walker then procured the funds, including said sum of $5,000 which was paid to appellant for creditors, with which the enterprise was financed, that said money did not belong to the Nevada company and the directors therefore did not make "unauthorized distributions" of the funds belonging to the corporation.

[12] That is legitimate argument in view of the fact that Section 412 of the Civil Code is penal in character and should therefore receive a strict construction against judgment creditors. The court, however, adopted findings against the directors on all of those issues. We are of the opinion those findings are adequately supported by the evidence. We must therefore assume those transactions were carried on by Mr. Walker as agent for the Nevada corporation, and that said sum of $5,000 belonged to that company. It was distributed to preferred creditors to the exclusion of the plaintiff.

[13] There is also sufficient evidence to support the finding that plaintiff was entitled to a lien on the 137,640 shares of the new company held by the appellant to secure his attorney's fees. Those shares were a part of the consideration for which the transfer was made. Neither the new company nor the other individual defendants deny that lien. All of them were parties to this action, and none of them, except the appellant, has appealed. The title to neither the shares of the new company which were issued to other defendants, nor those which were issued to the appellant to be held in trust to secure his attorney's fees, was paramount to the prior right of an unpaid judgment creditor to enforce payment of his valid claim against the property of the Nevada corporation, under the circumstances of this case.

For the reasons previously stated, we find no substantial merit in the other assignments of lack of evidence to support the findings and judgment.

[14] It is true that a party to an action is entitled to findings on every essential issue of the pleadings, and that a failure to adopt findings on a material issue may entitle an appellant to a reversal of the judgment. Taylor v. Taylor, 192 Cal. 71, 80, 218 P. 756, 51 A.L.R. 1074. But it is the established rule, supported by a multitude of authorities, that if findings are adopted upon all essential issues necessary to a determination of the cause, or it is apparent that the adoption of more specific findings would necessarily be adverse to the appellant, the omitted findings are not prejudicial, and the judgment should be affirmed. (24 Cal.Jur. 947, sec. 190.)

[15] The appellant asserts that the court erred in failing to adopt findings upon the issue as to whether he had a valid claim for attorney's fees against the Nevada corporation which entitled him to a paramount lien upon the shares of the new company held by him to secure payment of his claim. The court did find as its conclusion: "That 137,640 shares of Contact Mining Company stock represented by certificate numbers 3, 21 and 22, held by Bryce Swartfager as trustee are assets of the Contact Mercury Mine Co., Inc., subject to the payment of plaintiff's claim as creditor of the old company."

We think that is a sufficient finding that the stock of the new company which is held by the appellant is "subject to the payment of plaintiff's claim as creditor of the old company." The appellant did testify that the old company owed him $5,000 as attorney's fees and that said sum was agreed to by Mr. Walker as manager of the company. But he also testified, "I was to be paid out of the dividends on the stock coming from the new company."

[16] We do not question the validity of appellant's claim for attorney's fees against the Nevada corporation, nor the fact that he is a creditor of that company. But it is apparent that it was a breach of his trust as a director of that company to participate in the transfer of all the assets of the Nevada corporation by means of which he might secure stock in the new company to hold as security for payment of his debt in preference to other valid claims of creditors. For the reasons previously stated, that alleged lien would be void. The court therefore properly found that appellant held the stock of the new corporation subject to the payment of plaintiff's established claim as a creditor. More specific findings on that subject would necessarily have been adverse to the appellant. The findings are therefore adequate in that respect.

[17] The appellant has challenged several of the findings as irreconcilably conflicting. We have critically examined those findings and find no substantial merit in that charge. The transactions which are involved in this suit are exceedingly complicated. The findings do include numerous statements of facts which appear to be unessential to the determination of this action. But we are of the opinion the material findings are not irreconcilably conflicting.

[18, 19] Finally, the appellant declares that this suit against the directors for breach of trust in making unauthorized distribution of funds of a foreign corporation will not lie until plaintiff's remedy for collection of his claim against the corporation has first been exhausted. In support of that contention he relies on the cases of Bond v. Bulgheroni, 215 Cal. 7, 8 P.2d 133, and Farmers' and Merchants' Bank of Los Angeles v. Bank of Italy, 216 Cal. 452, 14 P.2d 527. It is asserted that supplemental proceedings against the judgment debtor as provided by Section 714 of the Code of Civil Procedure was a prerequisite to the maintenance of this suit. That procedure was not necessary under the circumstances of this case. The plaintiff held a judgment against the Nevada corporation and H. G. Walker. An execution was returned in that case wholly unsatisfied. The judgment debtor possessed no assets from which the debt could be satisfied. The new corporation held the assets, including the option to purchase the mine and the machinery and equipment, claiming title thereto. The $5,000 had been expended by the appellant in payment of other creditors. The stock of the new corporation was held by individuals who claimed title thereto. It would be futile and useless to prosecute supplemental proceedings under Section 714 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under such circumstances supplementary proceedings are wholly inadequate and a suit in the nature of a creditor's bill is therefore authorized. Bond v. Bulgheroni, supra; 7 Cal.Jur. 800, sec. 10. When the property which may be subjected to the payment of a judgment creditor has been transferred to and is held by a third party who claims title thereto a creditor's suit may be maintained without first resorting to supplemental proceedings. Sec. 720, Code Civ.Proc.; Brunvold v. Victor Johnson & Co., Inc., 59 Cal.App.2d 75, 81, 138 P.2d 32; Booge v. First Trust and Savings Bank of Pasadena, 46 Cal.App.2d Supp. 879, 116 P.2d 503.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PLANAGAN.

Cr. 3770.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Aug. 2, 1944.

Hearing Denied Sept. 1, 1944.

1. Criminal law ⇨568

The absence of evidence suggesting a motive for the commission of the crime charged is a circumstance in favor of accused to be given such weight as the jury deems proper, but proof of motive is never indispensable to conviction.

2. Homicide ⇨166(1)

Considerable latitude is allowed in the reception of evidence on question of motive, and evidence having a direct tendency to prove motive on the part of a person who commits the homicide, and thus to solve a doubt either as to identity of the slayer, the degree of the offense, the insanity of accused, or to the justification of his act, is admissible.

3. Homicide ⇨233

A failure to prove motive is not fatal in a prosecution for murder where the conviction is based upon circumstantial evidence.

4. Homicide ⇨166(3)

In murder prosecution, the admission of testimony with respect to a childhood episode in which the mother of the slain child warned defendant to leave the child alone and not to come on her premises again, as an attempt to prove a motive for the crime, was not erroneous.

5. Criminal law ⇨703

In a criminal prosecution it is the duty of counsel making a statement to jury to state the facts fairly and to refrain from stating facts which he cannot or will not be permitted to prove.

6. Criminal law ⇨1171(2)

The district attorney's opening statement is supposed to be an outline of what the people intend to prove, and the failure to make such proof does not necessarily indicate prejudice, but it is the substance and implication of a statement, or the effect of an act, which determines what the law recognizes as prejudicial conduct.

7. Criminal law ⇨1171(2)

In murder prosecution, where prosecuting attorney's opening statement to jury referred to specific details of a childhood episode which the state would attempt to prove as a motive, but which details, imputing improper conduct on part of defendant, the state was not permitted to prove other than to show that defendant had been warned to stay away, opening statement did not constitute prejudicial misconduct.

8. Criminal law ⇨720(1)

The scope of comment by the prosecuting attorney extends to facts that have been established by cross-examination as well as those that have been proved by direct examination, and the permissible range of discussion of the merits of the case, both as to the law and the facts, is comprehensive.

9. Criminal law ⇨1171(1, 3, 6)

It is only where the district attorney refers to matters not in evidence or expresses his own conclusions which are not founded upon evidence, or where he indulges in unwarranted attacks upon defendants or interferes with the orderly processes of the court, that his alleged misconduct in argument to the jury may be construed to be reversible error.

10. Criminal law ⇨730(2)

In murder prosecution, refusing defendant's requested instruction that all the circumstances related by prosecuting attorney in his opening statement in connection with a prior episode, which would show motive, should be disregarded as unsupported by evidence, was properly refused, where the court adequately instructed that statements of counsel were not to be regarded as evidence and there was evidence supporting some of the facts which prosecuting attorney stated he would prove.

11. Criminal law ⇨562

Evidence showing an opportunity to commit the crime charged does not justify a conviction apart from other circumstances, unless it excludes all reasonable opportunity for its commission by another.

12. Criminal law ⇨552(3)

The rule that the circumstances relied upon to establish the guilt of one accused of crime must be consistent with that hypothesis and inconsistent with any other rational conclusion is a rule of instruction to the jury and not a rule for the guidance of the court on review.

13. Criminal law §1159(6)

Where the circumstances are such as to reasonably justify an inference of guilt, as found by the jury, the fact that an inference of innocence might likewise be reasonably drawn therefrom does not present a question of law for review, and the verdict will not be disturbed.

14. Criminal law §404(3)

Tools and instruments of crime found in the possession or under the control of defendant soon after the commission of the offense may be offered in evidence whenever they constitute a link in the chain of circumstances which tend to connect him with the commission of the offense charged.

15. Criminal law §404(3)

Before tools and instruments of crime can be received in evidence, it must be shown that the crime charged was in fact committed and that it was committed with the aid of instruments like those proposed to be shown in evidence and that defendant was in the vicinity at or about the time the offense was committed.

16. Criminal law §404(1)

In prosecution for murder committed with the aid of knives, admission in evidence of a hunting knife, belonging to defendant and found at his home shortly after the homicide, as the type of knife used, was not an abuse of discretion.

17. Criminal law §404(4)

Physical objects which form a part of or serve to illustrate the transaction or occurrence which is the subject of investigation may be formally introduced in evidence.

18. Criminal law §404(1)

Demonstrative evidence to be competent must be relevant to the issue, and where it tends to throw light on, and has a direct bearing upon, a material issue, it is admissible and is not to be excluded because of its other effects on the jury.

19. Criminal law §1160

After the finding of the jury has been approved by the trial court on a motion for a new trial, an appellate court may disturb it only when it can be said as a matter of law that there was no sufficient and substantial evidence to support it.

20. Criminal law §1144(13)

The appellate court must assume in favor of the decision of the jury the existence of every fact which the jury could reasonably have deduced from the evidence and then determine whether guilt is deducible therefrom.

21. Criminal law §1159(2)

The court on appeal will not attempt to determine the weight of the evidence, but will decide only whether upon the face of the evidence it can be held that sufficient facts could not have been found by the jury to warrant the inference of guilt.

22. Homicide §254

Evidence, although circumstantial except for evidence definitely placing defendant at the scene of the homicide, was sufficient to support verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree.

23. Criminal law §663

The practice of placing pieces of red cellophane upon clothing introduced in evidence to mark blood stains, which were not visible to the naked eye is condemned.

24. Criminal law §569

Evidence did not establish that the rights of youth of 16 charged with murder were violated by any unkind treatment or improper questioning on the part of police officers.

WHITE, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Crum, Judge.

John M. Planagan was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Joseph Scott, J. Howard Ziemann, and G. L. McFarland, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

By an indictment presented by the Grand Jury of Los Angeles County, defendant was accused of the murder of Dorothy Marie Courtemanche on or about April 21, 1943.

Upon arraignment of defendant the cause was transferred for further proceedings to the Juvenile Court, which court found him to be under the age of sixteen years and ordered him committed to the care and custody of the sheriff for suitable detention, pursuant to section 731 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, St.1937, p. 1036. Thereafter, said Juvenile Court found defendant was not a fit and proper subject to be dealt with under the Juvenile Court Law, and the cause was "transferred to Department 43 for prosecution under the general law." In said Department 43 of the Superior Court, defendant entered his plea of "not guilty as charged in the indictment," and further pleaded that he was "not guilty of the offense charged because he was insane at the time that he is alleged to have committed said unlawful act." Three doctors were "appointed under section 1027 Penal Code to examine the defendant as to his sanity and report to the Court as to his mental condition." When the cause was called for trial, defendant, by leave of court, withdrew his plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity," for the reason, as stated by his counsel, that the three doctors appointed to examine defendant "have found the boy sane."

At the conclusion of the trial, the jury returned a verdict of guilty of murder, a felony, as charged in the indictment, and found it to be murder of the second degree. From the judgment of conviction which was thereafter entered, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant prosecutes this appeal.

Appellant here urges that the judgment of conviction be reversed for the following reasons:

"1) The absence of any proof of motive is fatal in this case where all of the evidence is purely circumstantial; and

"2) Opportunity alone is insufficient to sustain the verdict of guilty; and

"3) The circumstantial evidence relied upon herein is inconsistent with guilt and is only consistent with innocence; and

"4) Reversible error was committed when Exhibit 21, a spring blade knife, in no way connected with the crime herein, was admitted as evidence; and

"5) The evidence is wholly insufficient to support the verdict of guilty; and

"6) Grievous error was committed in admitting evidence of a childhood incident occurring six years before the date of the crime charged herein, and wholly unconnected with the crime herein; and

"7) The district attorney was guilty of gross misconduct prejudicial to the defendant; and

"8) The motion for a new trial should have been granted."

The case is one of circumstantial evidence, and because appellant's statement of facts is somewhat abridged and therefore inadequate for a proper understanding of the circumstances attending the homicide, this court has reviewed the evidence set forth in over 1200 pages of the Reporter's Transcript, and finds that respondent's brief summary of the evidence produced is a fair statement of the facts as disclosed by the record:

Mrs. Courtemanche and her three children, Marilyn, Pete, and the deceased child, Dorothy Marie, who was commonly called Doris, for eight years had lived in the downstairs portion of the old Sepulveda home at 751 North Palos Verdes in the city of San Pedro, located on a mesa above the Wilmington-San Pedro Road, directly across from the Los Angeles Shipbuilding Corporation. The father died in November, 1942. Mrs. Eva Worden with her husband and children occupied the upstairs portion of the house and had lived there five years previous to the homicide, the property being owned jointly by the two families. Since the death of Mr. Courtemanche, Mrs. Courtemanche had been working in Torrance, leaving home at 7:15 o'clock in the morning and returning about 5:00 o'clock in the evening. Marilyn Courtemanche was also employed, and usually left home at 12:00 or 12:30 o'clock in the afternoon returning about 4:30. Doris, the deceased child, was twelve years of age, and Pete, her brother, was fourteen.

The Planagan family consisted of the father, who was acting Captain of Fire Boat No. 3 of the Los Angeles Fire Department at San Pedro; the mother; appellant, who was fifteen years of age, 6 feet 3 inches tall and weighed 175 pounds; and William, thirteen years of age. They lived at 450 Donald Street, San Pedro, which was about four-tenths of a mile from the Courtemanche home. The Planagans had lived there since 1923 and the children of the two families played together and visited each other's homes. Pete Courtemanche and appellant were pretty good friends until about a year before the homicide. Appellant "was always horsing around," would get Pete down, get his "arm and twist it, or something like that," which Pete did not like, therefore he stayed away from appellant. One time while Pete was standing out in front of his house, appellant was playing around with a knife and put it to Pete's back and started fooling around with it, pushing it hard against Pete's back, but did not cut him. Pete had not seen appellant at his (Pete's) house for three months prior to April 21, 1943, the date of the homicide, which occurred during the Easter vacation week. At school Pete had seen appellant with a push-button knife and later with a hunting knife, which appellant carried in the zipper pocket of his black leather coat. This was about three months before the homicide. The blade of the hunting knife was about five inches in length with a dark red handle and a cross bar or guard. The blade was about an inch wide and appellant carried it in a scabbard.

Frank Cordero, fifteen years of age, who lived at 319 North Mesa, went to the Courtemanche home nearly every day after school. He and Pete played together. Appellant used to come to his home and they would go to Pete's house. This was about three months before the murder. Appellant went around with bigger boys. Frank had seen appellant with a hunting knife with a blade about $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches long; which was sharp on one side and had sort of a red and black handle with an aluminum tip, and was carried by appellant in the side zipper pocket of his jacket in a leather case. Sometimes Pete tried to avoid appellant. When Frank and appellant went to Pete's on their bicycles, they would go across the lot on the path, and appellant would go to the front door and whistle for Pete.

On Monday night, April 19, 1943, Mrs. Courtemanche heard appellant call Doris several times. Mrs. Courtemanche went to an open window, looked out and saw appellant underneath the window of Doris' bedroom. She asked him why he was calling Doris and appellant said he was not calling Doris but was calling Pete. She told him that Pete was going to bed and for him to go home, and appellant replied "All right," very snarly and surly. After the first two or three months that the Courtemanche family lived there, appellant came to their home regularly and played with the children. This continued for a year and a half. At that time, or approximately six years before April 21, 1943, the date of the homicide, Mrs. Courtemanche talked with appellant at her home and told him not to return. He remained away for at least two years, and when he returned she noticed that he had grown quite a bit. On seven or eight other occasions she had sent appellant home and believed she had not seen him for a year prior to the time in question.

On April 20, 1943, around 11:00 o'clock in the morning Mrs. Worden's daughter Betty, thirteen years of age, went downstairs to the Courtemanches where she stayed about an hour and a half. Appellant was sitting on the couch and Doris was knitting. Only the three were there. Doris, the murdered girl, received a telephone call from a boy friend and she asked appellant if he thought she should go with this boy to the park. Appellant said: "Oh, I don't think so. Why don't you wait a few more years before you go out with the boys?" Appellant ruffled Doris' hair and when she combed it, he ruffled it again, all in a friendly mood; Doris not being angry at him for doing it. Appellant did not look wild-eyed or crazy or all "worked up," but as a playful schoolboy with a schoolgirl.

On this same day, April 20th, Marilyn Courtemanche arrived home from work at about 4:30 o'clock, and Mrs. Courtemanche and Pete came home about 5:45 o'clock in the afternoon. When Marilyn came into the house she saw appellant in the front room. Doris was there, and in the presence of appellant, Marilyn told Doris that she had to go to work the next day in the morning instead of the afternoon and did not know how long she would have to work, probably late. She told Doris she wanted her to get some things downtown, some darning cotton, and Doris said O.K. The next morning Marilyn left home at 8:00 o'clock and returned at about 1:00 o'clock in the afternoon. As hereinbefore mentioned, it was Easter vacation week.

On April 21, 1943, the day of the homicide, at about 9:00 o'clock in the morning, Pete Courtemanche and Frank Cordero went to Cabrillo Beach at San Pedro and stayed until around three o'clock that afternoon. On that same morning at 9:00 o'clock, Doris asked Mrs. Blevins, who lived in a court at 266 Settle Street, San Pedro, if her son Richard could go to town with her. Richard got ready to go with Doris. In the meantime Doris went home, then returned to the Blevins house and they left there at 9:15. Around 9:30 or 9:45 that morning, appellant came to the house of Mrs. Cordero, mother of Frank, in an automobile and called for Frank. She went out and told appellant that Frank was not at home, that he had gone to the beach with Pete. Appellant asked her if they had gone on the bus and she said yes, to which appellant replied; "Well, that's what I thought." She told appellant they had gone only a few minutes before and appellant said, "O.K., thanks," and left. At 10:20 that morning Mrs. Blevins and Mrs. Stiff, who lived in the same court, left home to go to town on the bus. As the bus stopped, Doris and Richard got off, this being the end of the bus line. At 11:00 o'clock, Mrs. Worden's daughter, Betty, saw Doris by the white fence in front of the house; and at 11:25, that morning, Mrs. Olson, who lived on the corner of Driefus and Settle Streets, saw Doris with her dog going through two courts to Driefus Street, about a block from Doris' house. Mrs. Olson was going up Settle Street on her way to town to meet her husband, and paid no attention as to which way Doris was going, whether away from or toward her home.

Mrs. Stiff's children, James, 8 years of age, and Melanee, 8 years of age, and some other children, were playing on the steps of the back porch of their home at 266 Settle Street while their mother and Mrs. Blevins had gone to town. James and Melanee knew appellant and saw him riding his bicycle on the sidewalk through the court to the path which leads across the vacant lots to Doris' home. Melanee stated she saw appellant shortly before lunch time and thought it was about 11:00 o'clock; that she had not had her lunch and didn't get it until her mother came home. Mrs. Stiff testified she arrived home around noon. At about 11:30 o'clock on this same day, Mrs. Worden came downstairs to hang up some clothes which she had washed that morning, and while going to the rear of the house she saw appellant coming through a vacant lot toward her house on his bicycle. She paid no further attention to him. After hanging up the clothes, which took 15 or 20 minutes, she went back upstairs. At the time she came downstairs she did not notice the playing of the radio in the Courtemanche home, but as she returned upstairs the radio was playing music very loud.

The entrance to the upstairs is on the south side of the house.

Between 11:35 and 12:10 o'clock on this day, April 21, 1943, Mrs. Nolton, who lived at 266 Seventh Street, about one block from the Courtemanche house, was pulling weeds in her yard, but she did not notice appellant and could not say whether he passed her premises or not. Between 11:30 and 12:00 o'clock, Mrs. McKenzie, who lived at 229 Settle Street, while looking for gardening tools in her yard, heard an unusual laugh of a feminine voice and she looked toward the Courtemanche house but saw no one. Mrs. McKenzie was interested in the Courtemanche family, because she knew the mother worked. About 20 or 30 minutes later, she saw Robert Courtemanche standing on the porch looking toward the Courtemanche house. She did not see appellant.

Robert Courtemanche, the 27 year old brother of Doris, who lived at 722 Gulf Avenue, Wilmington, arrived at the Courtemanche home with his wife and two children at 12:28 o'clock, for the purpose of getting some wire to make rabbit hutches. He stepped up onto the front porch, looked through the main window in the front of the house and saw a body lying in front of the divan in the living room. He immediately entered the house, the door being unlocked, and telephoned for an ambulance and the police. Before the police arrived, his wife and oldest son came into the room, and his wife went on upstairs to Mrs. Worden's. He did not think he lifted or removed any part of the covering over the body. The police came in about ten minutes and examined the purse lying beside the body. When the officers went through the purse, Robert Courtemanche was then sure it was his sister Doris; up to that time he was not sure who it was. Nothing in the room was disarranged; the radio was on but inaudible, and the gas heater was burning.

Officer Gannon of the San Pedro Detective Bureau, with Lieutenant Elliott, arrived at the Courtemanche home between 12:35 and 12:40 o'clock, on the day of the homicide, at which time two uniformed police officers were there. Officer Gannon saw a body under a blanket near the divan about 10 feet from the front door. There was a wrench lying to the left of the body near the left heel. This wrench was identified by Pete Courtemanche as one of the wrenches he had used in repairing his bicycle in his bedroom the previous day and which he had left on the dresser in his room which is next to the front room. Officer Gannon noticed a spot of blood about 12 inches in diameter on the cushion on the south side of the divan extending over to the second cushion. There was a smaller spot on the back of the divan near the cushion which was about four inches long and two and a half inches wide. There was a puddle of blood between the two right-hand cushions, one directly on the arm, and considerable blood on the breasts of the victim. A loose leaf of the telephone book with numbers on it and a brown leather pocketbook were partially under the body.

Dr. Wilmoth, Receiving Hospital Surgeon at San Pedro, arrived at the Courtemanche home at approximately 1:00 o'clock. He made a cursory examination of the body, which was covered, and discovered that death had occurred before his arrival. There was blood on the neck of the girl and on other parts of the body, as well as on the divan. The blood was more or less liquid, not having completely coagulated. In his opinion the girl had died within an hour before he examined the body, which was beginning to get a little bit stiff with rigor mortis. He did not take the cover off the body and made no further examination of it. Upon cross-examination, Dr. Wilmoth admitted he was not prepared to say that death had not occurred an hour and a half before his arrival.

On the day of the homicide, Ray Pinker, forensic chemist for the Los Angeles Police Department, went to the Courtemanche home and removed the couch cover from the body in the presence of several detectives. He found there was a large blood stain in the center of the cover where it was in contact with the body which stain had soaked through the cover; that the stains were still wet, the blood not having thoroughly dried. This witness also saw the wrench which was lying on the floor to the left of the body. Due to its soiled and rough surface, the wrench did not retain finger prints of any kind. Mr. Pinker examined the walls and ceiling of the room to determine whether or not there was any blood contamination and found none, at least none that could be seen with the naked eye.

Dr. Clinton Thienes, called by the defense as a witness, found human blood on a shade of a floor lamp, on a door post about five or six feet above the floor and on wood casing of an archway five or six feet above the floor.

The autopsy performed on the body of Doris showed four penetrating stab wounds and two superficial stab wounds on the front of her body and four stab wounds in the back. On the left side of her head were seven wounds, three of which resulted not only in lacerations to the scalp, but depressed fractures of the skull. The brain tissue was contused and there was subdural hemorrhage. The cause of death was stab wound of the heart and compound depressed fractures of the skull. The wrench found at the scene of the crime fitted into the depressed fracture areas of the skull. The stab wounds could have been caused by a hunting knife about the size of seven-eighths of an inch to an inch at its maximum, near the handle, sharp on one side and rounded on the other. The hymen was of small type and was intact. There was no evidence of any sexual attack upon this girl.

Ray Pinker, forensic chemist, was present at the time the autopsy was performed by Dr. Webb. Tests were made by him and Dr. Webb by having various portions of the wrench in close juxtaposition to the penetrations of the skull in an effort to discover whether or not the instrument could have been responsible for the injuries sustained by the victim. They discovered that the peculiarity of the penetrations in the skull and the wounds in the scalp matched the curved portions of this wrench, namely, the upper end jaw of the wrench. They found that the curved portion was the portion that fitted exactly into the skull fracture in two places. Mr. Pinker observed that the wounds on the body had been caused by a sharp instrument, approximately one inch wide, similar to a knife blade.

On April 22, 1943, the day after the homicide occurred, appellant's father, John Planagan, Sr., called at the office of Chief Alderson of the Los Angeles Fire Department at 217 So. Hill St., Los Angeles, to seek his advice because of certain things his son had told him. Mr. Planagan, after introducing his son, who accompanied him, asked Chief Alderson if he had read about the murder in San Pedro. The Chief recalled having seen newspaper headlines to that effect and told the boy that there was no way he could help him or advise his father unless he spoke the truth and told him just what it was all about. Mr.

Planagan stated that he was on vacation, it being Easter week, and that he had been painting his house; that his son had been helping; that on the day of the murder his son had either not painted at all or had stopped painting sometime in the middle portion of the morning; that he had released the boy from working and that he was then free to play or do what he saw fit. The boy (appellant) then picked up the story and stated that two of his playmates, a boy named Frankie and a boy named Pete, the latter being the brother of the deceased child, had planned to go swimming down on the waterfront, and that he wanted to go with them but due to the work at home, it had not been possible for him to go; that this particular morning when there was no more work to be done, he thought he would try to catch them to go swimming with them; that he got on his bicycle and as he left the house his mother gave him a utility bill to pay, either the gas bill, the light bill or the water bill, and told him to pay it before he came home; that he went to the home of Frankie and learned from Frankie's mother (Mrs. Cordero) that Frankie had gone swimming with Pete (Courtemanche); that he (appellant) stated that possibly he could catch the boys at Pete's house and go with them; that he rode his bicycle from Frankie's house to Pete's house across vacant lots; that he put his bicycle up against the side of the (Courtemanche) house and called for Pete; that there was a lady who lived upstairs (Mrs. Worden); that she came down with a basket of clothing to hang out on the line in the backyard; that he did not speak to her and she did not speak to him; that he called for Pete a couple of times and no one appeared; that he then looked through the window on the side of the house and saw an object on a divan which appeared to be covered; that protruding from it he saw a foot in an odd position which aroused his curiosity and made him feel that there was something wrong; that he went to the front and rang the doorbell but no one answered; that he tried the door which was unfastened, and then opened the door and entered the room. Chief Alderson asked appellant if that was not an unusual thing to do, and his father volunteered the information that they had known one another for possibly eight or ten years; that the children visited back and forth in one another's homes; that the people from Pete's home ran through his house and had since they were little tots, and that the Planagan children ran through Pete's house. Appellant told Chief Alderson that it was not unusual for him to walk into the Courtemanche house, and picking up the story from that point, he said that he went to the divan; that the body or object was covered with a blanket or a throw of some kind; that he raised the coverlet and it was very bloody; that blood was dripping or running from it and the child's body was exposed there in front of him. Chief Alderson asked the boy to tell him just what he saw and the boy held his hands close together and held his head down and shook it from side to side, closing his eyes, giving the impression that he wanted to erase from his memory what he had seen. Chief Alderson let the boy compose himself for a moment and then asked him to state what had happened. Appellant stated: "Well, I don't know. I must have gone screwy. I don't know what I did. * * * I recall that the radio was playing, and I intended to shut the radio off, and I went over to the radio, but whether I shut it off or not, I don't know. * * * I don't know what made me do it, but I wanted to get out. I wanted to get away from there." The boy said he went outside, got on his bicycle and started to ride away. Chief Alderson asked him whether anyone saw him leave the house and the boy said that there was a lady (Mrs. Nolton) across the street, possibly two-thirds of a block or a block down the street whom he was sure saw him as he left on his bicycle; that he knew her and she knew him, but she didn't get along particularly well with the kids and so he just rode on by; that he was positive that she looked at him and saw him; that he rode his bicycle for several blocks toward San Pedro; that he felt sick and upset and wanted to go home; that he turned and went home, went in the house and to his own room, sat down, and felt sick to his stomach and nervous and upset; that he did not know what he was doing; that his mother came in and asked him what was the matter and he gave her no answer; that she told him, "You are ill or there is something wrong with you. You better lie down on the bed. You are sick"; that he lay down on the bed for awhile and still felt bad; that he felt that if he got out of there and went somewhere and did something he would feel better, so he went to one of the schools and played a game or two or three of handball; that he came back home again; that his mother served dinner; that his father was not home; that he couldn't eat his dinner; that his mother attempted to make him eat but he had no appetite; that this thing was in front of him there, and everytime he thought about it, why it made him sick, so he decided that if he went to a moving picture show, sat through a movie, maybe that would get his mind off it and he would feel better, so he went to a movie, came home and went to bed. Mr. Planagan picked up the story from there and told Chief Alderson that he came home about eight o'clock, at which time his wife told him there was something wrong with Jack. "He came rushing in the house today and went in his room. He was sick and upset and I made him lie down and then he went on and came back and wouldn't eat any dinner and he has gone to a movie. He won't talk. He won't tell me what is the matter with him." So Mr. Planagan decided that when the boy came home he would question him; that Mr. Planagan stated that when the boy came home he went to his room and to bed; that Mr. Planagan was puzzled how to approach his son; that there had been a murder in the neighborhood; that the boy had acted in an odd manner, had refused to tell his mother what was wrong with him, and he was therefore a little reluctant to approach the boy and question him; that the boy had been a good boy and had never given him any trouble; that it was a terrible thing for a father to walk up to his son and begin to question him as to whether or not he had been involved in a murder; that he postponed talking to the boy and lay down himself but was unable to sleep, became nervous, the mother was crying and they put in a rather bad night without getting much, if any, sleep; that he went to the boy's room once or twice with the intention of waking him but did not do so because he just lacked the approach as to how to bring this thing up for discussion, but he did examine the boy's clothing. Chief Alderson asked Mr. Planagan if the boy had worn the same clothing all of this time, if he had made any effort to change his clothing or hide it, and Mr. Planagan said no, that the boy wore the same clothing that he had, some old trousers and shirt and a leather jacket in which he had been painting and on which there were a considerable number of paint stains, that he had worn the same to the handball court, the movies and home again; that he (the father) had examined the clothing and was not positive whether there were any blood stains on it because of the paint and one thing and another, but rather imagined that he could detect in one or two places some indication of blood which rather upset him and the mother; that when morning came the boy arose and he (the father) approached the boy and told him he wanted to know what was the matter with him and wanted him to explain his actions on the previous day; that the boy was a bit hesitant to talk, but upon insistence the boy related the same story to him (the father) which he had just related to Chief Alderson in his presence.

Chief Alderson asked the boy if he ever had any difficulty in school and both he and his father said he had not; that the boy had always gotten along well with his lessons and never had any trouble with the other children or anything of that kind at all. The father then asked Chief Alderson for his advice and was told by the Chief that there was only one thing to do and that was to talk to the police officers and have the boy tell the story to them; that if the boy's story was the truth, he could be of material assistance to the police officers; that his presence at the scene of the crime would eventually be discovered, and that if the boy's story was not true, why then it was the father's duty to report it to the police anyway. The boy stated that was exactly what he wanted; that he wanted to get this off his mind and get the thing cleared up. The father was entirely agreeable and the Chief told him that he would call the police department and ask them to send someone over. Chief Horrall of the police department was at lunch and Chief Alderson talked to Captain Harrison, who referred him to Inspector Bruce Clark. Chief Alderson told the latter that he would like him to come to his office personally; that he had some information in connection with this case which he did not wish to disclose over the telephone. In a very few minutes Inspector Clark came to Chief Alderson's office and he introduced the inspector to both Mr. Planagan and his son, outlining briefly what the boy had told him. Inspector Clark, after questioning the boy and making some notes, said that there was only one thing to do: go to the police department and get in touch with the officers making the investigation and tell his story to them, let the boy go with the officers to the house where the murder had occurred and reconstruct what he had done. The inspector inquired if the boy's clothes were available. He was not wearing the clothes he had worn the previous day, and Mr. Planagan told the inspector that the clothes were available; had not been disturbed; were at home and he could have them. With that they left Chief Alderson's office.

Inspector Clark asked appellant if he had a hunting knife and the boy said he had. His father stated: "Yes, I spoke to him about the knife this morning, and the boy told me this morning that the knife had been stolen from him about a week previously." Inspector Clark asked the father if that was the first time he had heard of it, and he said: "Yes, this morning was the first time I knew the knife was missing." Inspector Clark asked the boy if he was wearing the same clothes that he was wearing on the day before, and the father said that he was not, that on the previous day he had worn the leather jacket. Inspector Clark asked the father if he had observed any blood on the jacket and the father said: "Yes, there was a smear of blood on his sleeve, the sleeve of the leather jacket." The three of them walked to the City Hall and Inspector Clark called in the investigators of the homicide squad to talk to the father and son.

Officer Hurst, one of the investigating officers, was told by Inspector Clark that Mr. Planagan had brought his son to Chief Alderson's office and he (Clark) had brought the boy and his father to the City Hall, and that the boy had visited the Courtemanche home on the day before and found the body of the murdered girl. Officer Hurst questioned appellant in the presence of Captain Rasmussen and the forensic chemist, Ray Pinker. Officer Hurst said to the father, Mr. Planagan, Sr.: "We would like to talk to the boy now, Mr. Planagan, you can stay if you like." Mr. Planagan replied: "No, I would rather go out in the hall, I feel a bit nervous." Officer Hurst asked appellant to tell him of the occasion of his going to the Courtemanche home on the previous day. Appellant stated that he rode there on his bicycle about noon, parked his bicycle at the rear of the house and went to the front door and called for Pete; that he got no response so he looked in the window and saw something on the floor; that he went into the house by the front door and noticed a body on the floor covered with a blanket, with one foot protruding from under the blanket and a white sandal on the foot; that he heard the radio playing when he went in; that he lifted the corner of the blanket and saw the body of Doris Courtemanche and that he "blackened out"; that he then got on his bicycle and rode toward town and eventually reached home and took a nap; that later that day he went to town, paid some bills, came back, played three or four games of handball with his brother and went to a show that night. Officer Hurst asked him how he was dressed when he went to the Courtemanche home, and appellant stated in a black leather jacket, a pair of cords and some sandals. Officer Hurst asked him where the clothing was and appellant stated it was at his home. Officer Hurst then asked appellant if he notified his parents of what he had seen and he stated that he did not notify them until the morning of the 22nd. Officer Hurst asked, appellant if, after he had found the body on the floor, he thought to call a doctor or call for help, and appellant stated that he did not. Officer Hurst asked appellant if he was the owner of any knives and he stated that he owned three but had lost one, and described these knives as, one, a pocket knife with a spring back and one a hunting knife. Appellant stated he owned the hunting knife for about two months and carried it to school in his coat pocket, and that the reason he carried the hunting knife to school was because he had to have a spring-back knife. Officer Hurst asked appellant if he had notified his folks or told anybody else that he had lost his knife and appellant stated that he had not.

Immediately following this conversation on April 22, 1943 (the day following the homicide), Officer Hurst and Ray Pinker took appellant by automobile to the San Pedro Police Station, Officer Hurst having previously telephoned that he was leaving for San Pedro and that he had appellant with him. They were met at the San Pedro Station by Captain Rasmussen, Lieutenant Elliott, Sergeant Gannon and Officer Hargett of the San Pedro Detective Bureau. Ray Pinker, Captain Rasmussen and two detectives from the said bureau went to appellant's residence, where they were met by Mr. and Mrs. Planagan, appellant's parents. The black leather jacket worn by appellant was hanging on the back of a chair in the living room and this was turned over to Mr. Pinker. He also received from Mrs. Planagan a pair of corduroy trousers, a pair of shoes, and also a white shirt and a pair of white shorts, both of which latter garments Mrs. Planagan said she had washed the evening before. No blood was found on the shoes. Mr. Pinker took the leather jacket to the crime investigation laboratory and examined and analyzed certain stains appearing on it. On the left front portion of the garment, an area near the zipper and down near the bottom of the garment, Mr. Pinker found sixteen small spatter stains, not smears, which he analyzed to be blood stains. These stains were on the exterior of the garment. Because the jacket was black in color and the blood red, it is very difficult to see these stains with the naked eye, and for that reason Mr. Pinker marked the location of these stains with particular bits of red cellophane paper. On the left sleeve there was a red streak. Inside of this streak he found in excess of forty tiny microscopical dried blood spatters. On the outside of the left sleeve there were smears which came as a result of contact with a bloody object and the brushing over of spatters before the spatters had an opportunity to thoroughly dry. One smear was so heavy and pronounced that in bright light, such as daylight, it could be seen as a reddish haze over the black background. There were five or six spatters somewhat larger than the other tiny spatters. On the cuff of the right sleeve of the jacket, Mr. Pinker found smears of blood covering the surface of the leather jacket which had soaked into the thread stitching of the coat at the sleeve. Inside of this particular sleeve and extending up as high as three inches on the inside of the sleeve and soaked into the lining he found stains of blood. These stains were of human blood. There was a zipper pocket appearing on the lefthand side of the front portion of the jacket. On the inside of this pocket, on the blue lining, Mr. Pinker found eight spots of human blood. One spot was quite large and could be seen easily with the naked eye. He could not say whether these spots were smears or spatters or simply contact spots because of the fact that the fabric was absorbent in character and consequently the original shape of the stain had disappeared, and had been absorbed into the fabric. Spatters mean a fine spray of microscopical tiny drops of blood flying through the air and contacting a nonabsorbent surface. Mr. Pinker found human blood on the trousers over the right side pocket and over the right rear pocket. Mrs. Planagan indicated that the trousers she gave Mr. Pinker were the ones she thought Jack (appellant) had been wearing. Appellant had described to Mr. Pinker a pair of corduroy trousers with a tear in the vicinity of the left knee which tear was present. There was contamination of blood inside that tear, which blood Mr. Pinker did not analyze to determine whether or not it was human blood.

In the late afternoon of April 22nd (the day after the homicide occurred), Officer Gannon had a conversation with appellant in the presence of Officer Hargett. Appellant was asked by Officer Gannon how he figured in the Courtemanche case, to which appellant replied that he had been working on the roof, helping around the house during the Easter vacation with his brother; that sometime around 11:30 o'clock on April 21st, he had a very queer feeling in his stomach; that he crawled down off the roof, went in the house and took a bath, got on his bicycle and went over to the Courtemanche house. Officer Gannon asked appellant the route he took and appellant said he took a short cut; that he left his bicycle against the Courtemanche garage and in passing from the garage to the house on the south side he saw Mrs. Worden out in the back hanging up clothing; that he went around the side, up on the porch and called for Pete; that he thought he called two or three times while he was walking toward the front door, and when he reached the front door he called again; receiving no answer, he looked into the small side window adjoining the door and saw somebody under a blanket; that he saw a white foot sticking out and so, instead of calling again, he opened the door and went in; that he did not remember whether the dog was there or not; that he picked up the corner of the blanket, looked under it, saw some blood and knew it was Doris; that he picked up the blanket 18 inches or so and dropped it; that his stomach turned a flip-flop; that he went out the front door closing it; that the radio was playing; that he did not remember whether the gas heater was on or off; that he got on his bicycle and instead of going back over the path by which he had come, he went to Settle Street; that he saw a woman standing on her porch on Settle Street; that he did not stop to tell her what he had seen; that he did not tell Mrs. Worden; that he took this different route because he was all "balled up," and gestured like he was sick to his stomach; that when he got home his mother and brother were there; that his mother asked him what was wrong and he told her that in going down a small grade at First and Mesa he struck a woman while riding his bicycle; that he did not give the woman his name; that he was upset; that there might have been some blood on his clothing; that he removed his trousers and went to bed, leaving his jacket on the chair, and took a nap for about ten or fifteen minutes; that he got up and walked around the house; that his brother was still working about the place; that shortly thereafter his mother asked him to take the car and go to the creamery and get some milk; that he and his brother drove down there; that he did not tell his mother what he had seen at the Courtemanche house because he didn't feel very good; that after returning home with the milk, he and his brother went to the Barton High School and played four games of handball and then returned home and had dinner; that they took the local newspaper of San Pedro; that after dinner his mother mentioned about what she had read in the newspaper and stated she had known Doris and remarked what a terrible thing it was; that he didn't tell his mother that he had been to the Courtemanche home that noon because he didn't feel very good; that after dinner he and his brother Bill went to the Barton Hills Theatre and saw Joe E. Brown in a comic; that neither on the way to or from the theatre did he tell his brother anything about it; that he liked the comedy; that after the show he and his brother went home and went to bed; that the next morning his father asked him if he had seen anything of what happened to Doris Courtemanche, and he said yes; that his father asked him if he was over there at noon, and he said yes, and that was when he told his father what he knew about it; that his father decided to take him to see Chief Alderson. Officer Gannon asked appellant if he had a knife, and appellant said yes he had had three or four knives; that he had had a hunting knife but had lost it either Thursday or Friday before Easter week; that he had been playing basketball at school and had left it in his leather jacket with his fur lined gloves and lost them; that the knife and gloves were not in his jacket when he got back; that he had a spring-blade knife with about three and one-quarter inch blade that he used around the house for different work; that the hunting knife had about a three and one-half inch blade with a vari-colored handle and a leather scabbard with a half inch strap around the top; that he carried the knife just to have it; that he had never had any trouble with it; that he carried the knife in the zipper pocket of his leather jacket and it just fitted in there nicely, snugly; that he bought the knife about three months previously from Roy Hook on Seventh and Pacific Avenue in San Pedro (a merchant). Appellant stated that no other person had worn his leather jacket except on one occasion when he let his brother wear it from school.

At the police station on April 22nd, Mrs. Planagan in the presence of appellant stated that when Jack came home from the Courtemanche house he was suffering from shock. Officer Gannon asked her just what she meant by shock and she said it must have been the shock of what he had seen over there. Officer Gannon said to her: "Well, playing handball and going to shows and enjoying the comics, that is not an indication of shock is it?" She said: "I don't know, but the boy was very badly shocked." Mrs. Planagan also told Officer Gannon that she had given Jack some bills that morning to pay and that he didn't pay them; that he was supposed to go down later in the afternoon; that he didn't pay them in the morning.

Officer Hargett's testimony relative to this conversation with appellant was in substance the same as testified to by Officer Gannon, except that Officer Hargett testified that appellant stated that the story he told his mother of hitting a woman with his bicycle was a falsehood, and that he had told his mother that story so she would not worry about his condition. Officer Hargett asked appellant who his friends were, and appellant stated that he usually ran around with Pete Courtemanche and Frank Cordero. He asked appellant if he knew where they were on the day of the homicide and appellant said that early in the morning he had gone to Mrs. Cordero's home and was told by her that Pete and Frank had gone to the beach at about 9 o'clock; that at this time he was on his way to the ferry landing where he was to meet his father to give him the key to their automobile. Officer Hargett asked appellant if he thought that picking up the blanket in the manner stated by him had splashed blood on his jacket, and appellant said that stranger things had happened.

On April 23, 1943, forensic chemist Ray Pinker had a conversation with appellant in the San Pedro jail, at which detective Gannon was present and a jailer was present part of the time. Mr. Pinker had with him appellant's leather jacket which was identified by appellant. Mr. Pinker asked appellant whether or not, in view of the fact that there was contamination of blood on the jacket, he would like to look at a couple of photographs of the scene of this crime as they found it, with the blanket covering the body, to see whether or not he could pick out for him the particular corner of the blanket which he had lifted in order to view the sandals of the victim. Appellant said he would like to see the photographs. Mr. Pinker had copies of some photographs, People's Exhibits 13a and 13b, which he showed to appellant. Appellant looked at the photographs and then pointed to a spot on one photograph and said, "This is the corner that I picked up." It was the corner of the blanket lying on the floor approximately one foot from the right hand of the victim. There was a small space between the right hand and the blanket. Mr. Pinker told appellant that that particular corner of the blanket had no blood contamination on it; in fact, none of the four corners of the blanket was contaminated with blood; that detective lieutenant Hurst and himself, and all of them there, not only lifted that corner of the blanket but removed the blanket from the body and turned the body over without any of them becoming contaminated with blood. Mr. Pinker said to appellant, "Now, is it your explanation that any blood appearing on that jacket came as the result of contamination from lifting the blanket?", and appellant said that it was. He said to appellant: "Jack, there is something peculiar about the stains on this jacket, not only can the blood be identified from the stains by an examination of the stain but also in identifying the means or manner in which the contamination took place. In other words, Jack, there is a difference in the appearance from a smear stain and a spattered stain. Now, there is a bottle of ink." A bottle of ink and a pen were set before them. Mr. Pinker poured some of the ink onto a piece of paper and made a small pool, then he dipped his finger into the pool and smeared and wiped his finger on another piece of paper and designated that to appellant as being a smear type of stain. Then he took the pen and dipped it in the ink, held the pen up above a piece of paper and flicked a drop of ink from the pen point on the paper and showed him the type of splatter it would make. It left a crown shaped spatter which he pointed out to appellant. He then threw another drop of ink from the pen against the wall and partly at an angle, showing appellant how blood acted. He stated to appellant that from examination of these three types of stains it is possible to determine how each was made and from what particular angle the ink came; that blood acted in the same fashion, and he showed appellant the jacket and the areas where he found numerous blood spatters. He showed appellant the left portion of the jacket and said: "Jack, this area has a number of spatters, not smears, but spatters on it." He showed appellant the left sleeve and said: "Jack, on this at the time we found it there are numerous spatters. * * * There are numerous spatters and in addition we found smears. I want to know what is your explanation for these blood stains, the spatter stains on this jacket." Appellant said: "I have no explanation to make." Mr. Pinker said to appellant: "This jacket was an eye-witness to that crime. This jacket is going to testify to the facts that I have told you about. I will have to interpret its testimony, true. You are playing a sucker game if you think your phony story can compete with the microscope and test tubes." Appellant said: "Well, you know strange things happen, sometimes. I read of a story where a person committed suicide with a gun. A bullet had previously become lodged in the barrel of this gun and when they shot themselves the gun kicked back behind a davenport and an innocent person was prosecuted for murdering that person because of that bullet having stuck in the barrel." Mr. Pinker said to appellant: "Jack, you read that in a story. Ofttimes the simple facts of one paragraph or two is enlarged to 10 or 12 pages in a story, and sensational angles are purposely injected in a story in order to make the reading interesting; that probably the true facts of that particular case that he read about are quite simple, and no doubt there have been extortions in the story. * * * A common example of that are these horror moving picture plays in which a murder is committed, and each of us attempt to pick out the criminal during the course of the filming of the picture, and we are always mistaken. The least suspected person, the person who appears to be the most innocent usually turns out to be the guilty person." Appellant said: "Well, I have not had that happen to me. I only saw three chapters of the Grand Central murder case, and I was able to pick out the criminal without any difficulty." Appellant then asked Mr. Pinker: "Is it possible for these stains to have got on my jacket from a pool of blood?" Mr. Pinker replied: "No, Jack, the only pool of blood was underneath the body, and it was on the floor and protected by the body. The only additional large stain was a large stain on the blanket covering the body, this being an absorbent type of material it had absorbed the blood, and the blood could not be there. * * * Furthermore, this particular blood when it contaminated this jacket was fresh blood. It had not yet coagulated. Perhaps you are familiar, Jack, with the rate or the speed with which blood coagulates and dries. Perhaps sometimes you have injured yourself, you have cut your finger or you have observed someone else do it, and you perhaps have noticed that the blood coagulates anywhere from a minute to five minutes." Appellant said: "That is right." Mr. Pinker repeated: "The blood at the time it had contaminated this black jacket had not yet coagulated." Appellant made no reply. Mr. Pinker then asked him if he had anything to add to what he had told them and appellant said he had not. Whereupon Mr. Pinker said: "Well, think it over, Jack, you are in as deep as you can get in at the time. I may come back and talk to you a little bit later, if there is anything that you can say that might help us clear it up, now is the time to say it. If there are any extenuating circumstances, maybe there might have been some self-defense involved here, it is up to you to tell us what happened in order that you can answer and help, and now is the time to tell your story and clear your conscience." Appellant made no reply; he whistled. Mr. Pinker asked appellant if he had in mind that it was necessary for him to dispose of, how would he dispose of, that knife.

Appellant said he would throw it in the weeds. Mr. Pinker said: "Well, now, suppose there were not any weeds convenient or handy for such disposal, what is the next thing you would do with a knife?" Appellant replied: "I would throw it in the ocean." Mr. Pinker said: "Well, now, supposing you were not near the ocean and you were not near weeds, how would you dispose of the knife?" Appellant said: "Well, I would hide it in the most obvious place where you would look at it and would not be able to see it." At that time Officer Gannon said, "Like on the City Hall steps, eh, Jack?", and appellant replied, "Something like that." Appellant then said: "I recall a public enemy once hiding from the FBI and working in a garage next door to the FBI." Mr. Pinker said to appellant: "Now, Jack, name me an obvious place, some place that I might look and not see it or anyone might look and not see it." Appellant said: "That would depend on the circumstances and upon different things." Mr. Pinker said: "Well, give me an obvious place, name an obvious place." Appellant said: "On the roof." Mr. Pinker asked appellant to lift his trousers on his left leg in order that he might see whether or not he had a wound there. Mr. Pinker found such a wound which corresponded to the general locality of the tear in the trousers given to him by Mrs. Planagan. The wound was scabbed at the time, deep enough to indicate that it had bled at the time of the injury.

On April 24, 1943, the officers took appellant in an automobile to the Courtemanche house and they asked appellant to direct them over the route he had taken on the day of the homicide. The officers had searched that route before, also the general vicinity, empty lots and whatever could be hiding places for knives. When a place come to their attention and they thought there might be something hidden there, they would get out of the machine and search for the knife, but none was found. They returned to the San Pedro police station and later took a ride to measure the distance by the automobile speedometer. They drove from the corner of the Planagan home on the route appellant stated he had taken after he viewed the body of Doris on April 21, 1943, and the distance was 1.2 miles. The route appellant took from his home to the Courtemanche home was 0.4 of a mile.

On April 27, 1943, forensic chemist Pinker had a talk with appellant at the crime investigation laboratory of the Los Angeles Police Department. He said to appellant: "Jack, in an effort to explain the picture of these blood stains on this jacket consistent with your theory of innocence, think hard now. It is possible that at the time you arrived at the scene this body was still moving around; it was still in motion, and the result of that movement blood could have been splattered or splashed on you?" Appellant said: "Yes, that is possible." He said to appellant: "All right now, Jack, let's go one step further. Is it possible that the body may have been in a different position than it was shown in the photograph that I showed you several days ago, the position in which we found the body? Is it possible that the body, as an example, was lying on the davenport and that it rolled or fell to the floor?" Appellant said: "No, it was on the floor." Mr. Pinker said: "Well, let's begin over again. To that first question what is your answer? At the time you arrived on the scene was the body moving or was the body still?" Appellant said: "The body was still." He said to appellant: "To the second question, what is your answer, Jack, was the body lying on the floor or was it lying on the davenport or elsewhere when you came to that scene?" Appellant said: "It was lying on the floor." Mr. Pinker said: "How come you let me find that jacket with all the blood stains on it, Jack?" Appellant said: "Oh, I knew there were blood stains on that jacket." He said to appellant: "When did you first know that there were blood stains on that jacket?" Appellant said: "Oh, it was that day or the next day." He said to appellant: "Why didn't you wash the blood stains off of that jacket?" Appellant said: "Well, you can't wash blood off. Blood is blood." Mr. Pinker had no further conversation with appellant.

On April 27, 1943, between five and six o'clock p.m., in the San Pedro jail, Officer Hargett talked with appellant. He asked appellant: "Do you realize that you are involved in a serious offense?" Appellant said, "Yes." He said to appellant: "You realize that the evidence against you is strong to connect you with the crime, and in view of those circumstances, and in view of the fact whether you win or lose this case in court that it is going to be a great burden on your parents, it is going to cost them a lot of money and attorney's fees, and probably cost them their home and all of your father's savings, and in view of that fact why don't you tell me where I can find this knife, clear up this case and make a breast of things and get it off of your conscience?" Appellant meditated awhile and stated: "If I did that I would be cutting my own throat. I feel very confident in this case, and I think in a few days I will be out of here." Officer Hargett rejoined, that "I didn't think I would take it too lightly." Appellant stated that he could get a job later and pay back his father, and said, "I couldn't produce this knife without producing two other articles of evidence". Officer Hargett said to appellant: "Well, why don't you show me where I can find them, or come and take a ride with me and show me where I can find them and clean this case up?" Appellant waited awhile and Officer Hargett said: "Will you tell me where I can find them?" Appellant said: "They will be found in the simplest place. You could be looking at the place and never suspect them being there." Appellant said: "You know all the kids in school are for me, and I go with a nice girl, Mary Ruby. She can prove to you that I am a gentleman, and I have a lot of confidence, and I am sure I will come out of this case O.K." Appellant also said: "You know I pulled a fast one on my brother. He doesn't know anything. Although he and I fight quite a bit I wouldn't tolerate anyone picking on him." Officer Hargett said to appellant: "Jack, I would think that over and give this thing some serious thought. You can save your folks a lot of trouble." Appellant said: "You know I could put a feather in your cap. I could make you a lieutenant if I dared." The officer asked appellant to give him some information as to where the knife could be found, and appellant just sat silent. He told appellant to give the matter some serious thought and if he decided on anything to get in touch with him. At that or at a previous conversation, appellant asked him if he were tried on this charge and acquitted, could he be tried again, and the officer told appellant no, that he would be once in jeopardy. At this point appellant stated: "When this is all over I will look you up and show you a brain twister."

Mrs. Planagan, mother of appellant called as a witness by the defense, testified that appellant had a pair of fur-lined gloves which she believed were given to him the Christmas before. She also testified that she knew appellant did not have his knife on the Sunday prior to the homicide, that: "His brother Bill wanted to wear his coat to the show and sometimes they traded coats. He wore Bill's sport coat and when he did Bill wore the leather jacket if he wanted to, and he was going to wear it, and he knew that Jack carried his knife in there and he didn't want to wear it with it, so he was going to take it out but it wasn't in the coat." She also testified that on the day of the homicide "It was about 11:30 when he came down off the roof and he took a bath and talked to Bill on the roof a while, but he didn't paint. Then he came in and was going to one of the places. I don't remember, because when he went to one he usually went to both, so I told him as long as he was going down there I wanted him to go on downtown and get his boots. He left them downtown to get them half-soled, and I wanted him to pay the telephone bill and the gas bill and he said he would and I got the bills. They were up on the mantel where I always keep bills that are unpaid. He wanted to put them in his billfold which he carried in his right hand hip pocket, and riding his bicycle I was afraid he would lose his wallet and all, so I reached over and said I would put them in the zipper pocket. He was combing his hair in front of the mirror, and I reached over and unzipped the zipper of the pocket and put the bills in there * * * and I put the money in with them. * * * there was no knife in the pocket. * * * If there had been a knife in that pocket I could not have gotten the bills in there. * * * He had had a knife, but just recently I hadn't noticed it." Mrs. Planagan testified that it was five minutes to twelve when appellant left the house. Appellant's brother Bill testified that: "When he (appellant) got down to the telephone company I saw him take the bills out of his zipper pocket, where he usually carried his knife, but his knife wasn't there then. The bills were in an envelope and he took the bills out of the envelope and crumpled up the envelope and put it in his front pants pocket and went in and paid the bill." According to the testimony of Bill Planagan, he and appellant rode their bicycles to town to pay the utility bills sometime after lunch in the afternoon of April 21, 1943; visited Kinney's clothing store; went back home and from there to the Barton Hill school grounds where they played handball for an hour or so.

Appellant took the stand and testified that his folks had given him black gloves for a Christmas present; that he bought a hunting knife at Roy Hook's on Seventh Street in the December previous to the homicide, which knife had a purple and blue mixture handle, a couple of lines around it, and he believed it must have been around five inches long but he didn't know how wide it was; that he used it to cut bales of paper at the Examiner paper office in San Pedro, which place he kind of looked out for; that on Thursday or Friday before April 21st he missed his gloves and knife while walking home from school; that he carried the knife in the zipper pocket of his black jacket; that he got the tear in the left knee of his pants while playing basketball the week before Easter; that he fell down and skinned his knee; that what Chief Alderson testified to was what he (appellant) told him; that he did not kill Doris Courtemanche, nor use a knife or wrench on her; that when he saw her that morning she was dead; that he recalled Sergeant Hargett's testimony regarding the knife and that when the Sergeant asked him where the knife was and he replied, "If I told you that I would be cutting my own throat"; he thought the officer was kidding and "I thought I would kid with him"; that they were both kind of joking. Appellant also testified that he was not in the Courtemanche home about 4:30 in the afternoon of the day before Doris' death, as testified by Marilyn Courtemanche, and did not see her on that day. On cross-examination he admitted that Sergeant Hargett said to him, "Do you realize that you are involved in a serious offense?" Also that Sergeant Hargett said to him, "In view of these circumstances and in view of the fact whether you win or lose this case in court, it is going to be a great burden on your parents, it is going to cost them a lot of money and attorney's fees, and probably cost them their home and your father's savings, and in view of the fact why don't you tell me where I can find this knife and clear up this case and make the best of it and get it off your conscience?"; that appellant said it might cost a lot of money; that in a few days he would be out and could get a job later and pay back his father. Appellant denied that he said that he could not produce this knife without producing other articles, but that he did say: "You would want the other things with it, too"; and that Sergeant Hargett said "Yes." Appellant further testified that at that time Hargett hadn't mentioned anything but the knife; that he (appellant) "was just making up a big story of it. I was kidding"; that he didn't take the fact that he was in jail accused of murder very seriously; that at that time he did not have the knife and told Sergeant Hargett that he could not produce the knife without producing other things; that he could not even produce the knife; that he didn't know where the black fur gloves were; that he missed them on Thursday or Friday before the death of Doris, which occurred on a Wednesday; that he told Hargett, "They will be found in the simplest place, you could be looking at the place and not suspect them being there." That he was just kidding Hargett; just made that up; that Mr. Pinker asked him where he would hide a knife if he had one, and he had said, "Well, I would throw it away or throw it in the ocean or hide it in the simplest spot," and Gannon said, "Like on the jail house stairs?" and he (appellant) said, "Yes." Appellant admitted he was in the Courtemanche home the day before Doris died; that he had just come from Frankie's home and it was after 3:00 o'clock, then said he did not know what time it was but guessed it was about the middle of the afternoon; that he was not there around noon time; that he knew Betty Jane Worden; that Doris mentioned that she received a call from somebody while Betty Jane was there; that he had two spring knives; that he had thrown one of them away and guessed the other was at his home; that Chief Alderson's testimony was a fair statement of all that he (appellant) saw and all he knew about the circumstances, except that he did not tell Chief Alderson that after he left Frankie's house he went over to Pete's house; that he did not tell the officers he went directly from his home to his father's place to give him the keys to his automobile; that at the time he went to the Courtemanche house, he put his bicycle against the side of the garage; that Mrs. Worden came down with a basket of clothing when he was coming toward the Courtemanche house; that he called for Pete while he was on the front porch; that he looked through the window and saw an object which appeared to be covered; that he thought something was wrong, the radio was going and nobody answered; that he didn't ring the doorbell; that a blanket was all over the body; that he lifted the blanket; that he didn't remember whether blood was dripping or running from the coverlet; that he wasn't sure whether the body he saw was that of Doris Courtemanche; that he guessed a murder had been committed; that he did not remember how long a time elapsed from the time he saw Mrs. Worden until he walked out the front door, whether it was as much as half an hour or not; that he did not tell Mrs. Worden what he had seen; that he saw Mrs. Nolton when he was going away from the Courtemanche house; that he did not make an outcry after he left the house; that he felt very sick at his stomach; that he did not know whether he was trembling all over; that he didn't remember what his mother said when she met him in his house; that he wanted to go home because he felt kind of weak; that he had not a clear recollection of all that took place while he was inside the Courtemanche house on that day, and not certain of all the things that he has stated; that he was not certain about what part of the "rug" he picked up off the body; that he met his mother in the house when he came back from the Courtemanche house, but did not remember what his mother said to him, and thought that his mother told him he was sick or ill when he talked to Chief Alderson; that he was not sick or ill to his knowledge when he talked to the police officers; that he remembered going to the school yard and playing a game or two of handball; that he wanted to go to the picture show to get away from what he had seen at the Courtemanche house; that up to that time he had not told anybody what he had seen at the Courtemanche house; that he was afraid he might be accused of murder; that he had a faint recollection of his mother asking him about an accident with his bicycle, hitting a woman down on First and Mesa; that it never occurred to him to tell Mrs. Worden about the awful thing that had happened downstairs; that it did not occur to him to use the telephone then and call the police; that he had known Doris for many years, since she was five or six years of age, and liked her, but did not remember whether he examined the body enough to see if it was Doris; that he knew that Mrs.

Courtemanche worked; that he saw it was a girl's body; that he did not tell anybody and didn't know why he did not tell his mother; that he and his father were pals and he didn't tell his father; that he wasn't afraid of his father's accusing him of murder; that he didn't want to bother or worry his father with something like that.

• On redirect examination, appellant testified that he thought Officer Hurst was a pretty funny guy, "He tried to pin it on me right away"; that he thought Officer Hurst was crazy and he would not trust him as far as he could throw a bull; that he never had any sickness and prior to April 21st his appetite was enormous, he ate three meals a day and meals in between meals.

On recross-examination, appellant was asked if he had told the officers that he had no explanation when they asked him about blood on his clothes, to which he replied: "No; why should I tell them anything? I don't trust them anyway."

In connection with the first point raised upon this appeal, appellant urges that since his identification as the person who committed the crime was based solely upon circumstantial evidence, the question of motive "becomes particularly and cogently material"; and that the only evidence of any motive on his part to commit the alleged crime was a childhood incident happening six years before the date of the homicide, which evidence was erroneously admitted over his objection.

[1, 2] On this question of motive, it is stated in Vol. 1 of Wigmore on Evidence, 3rd Ed., p. 559, as follows: "It is sometimes popularly supposed that in order to establish a charge of crime, the prosecution must show a possible motive. But this notion is without foundation. Assuming for purposes of argument that 'every act must have a motive', i. e. a prior impelling emotion (which is not strictly correct), yet it is always possible that this necessary emotion may be undiscoverable, and thus the failure to discover it does not signify its nonexistence. The kinds of evidence to prove an act vary in probative strength, and the absence of one kind may be more significant than the absence of another; but the mere absence of one kind cannot be fatal. There must have been a plan to do the act (we may assume); the accused must have been present (assuming it was done by manual action); but there may be no evidence of preparation; or there may be no evidence of presence; yet the remaining facts may furnish ample proof. The failure to produce evidence of some appropriate motive may be a great weakness in the whole body of proof; but it is not a fatal one, as a matter of law. In other words, there is no more necessity, in the law of Evidence, to discover and establish the particular exciting emotion, or some possible one, than to use any other particular kind of evidential fact." Citing, People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 P. 75, and Pointer v. United States, 151 U.S. 396, 413, 14 S.Ct. 410, 416, 38 L.Ed. 208, the latter case holding: "The law does not require impossibilities. The law recognizes that the cause of the killing is something so hidden in the mind and breast of the party who killed that it cannot be fathomed; and as it does not require impossibilities, it does not require the jury to find it. Yet, if they do find it, it simply becomes an item of evidence in the case, which is only evidentiary at best; that is, it is only an item of evidence going to show whether a particular party may have committed an act, and sometimes going to show the characteristics of that act. * * * it is not indispensable to conviction that the particular motive for taking the life of a human being shall be established by proof to the satisfaction of the jury. The absence of evidence suggesting a motive for the commission of the crime charged is a circumstance in favor of the accused, to be given such weight as the jury deems proper; but proof of motive is never indispensable to conviction." When the perpetration of the crime has been brought home to the defendant, the motive for its commission becomes unimportant. People v. Durrant, supra.

"The establishment of a motive for the commission of a homicide is not essential to support a conviction, but the presence or absence of motive, whether weak or strong, is a circumstance bearing upon the guilt or innocence of the accused. Thus, while proof of motive is never indispensable, it is always permissible and often valuable. The prosecution may advance any theory within the range of human experience and reasonable probability, as to motive, and support it by appropriate evidence.

"Considerable latitude is allowed in the reception of evidence on the question of motive. It is settled that evidence having a direct tendency, in view of the surrounding circumstances, to prove motive on the part of a person to commit the homicide, and thus to solve a doubt either as to identity of the slayer, the degree of the offense, the insanity of the accused, or to the justification or excusability of his act, is admissible, however discredibly it may reflect upon the defendant, and even where it may show him guilty of other crimes." 13 Cal.Jur. 685, sec. 74, and cases there cited, including People v. Greig, 14 Cal.2d 548, 561, 95 P.2d 936; People v. Larrios, 220 Cal. 236, 251, 30 P.2d 404; People v. Aranda, 12 Cal.2d 307, 83 P.2d 928; People v. Hall, 27 Cal.App.2d 440, 81 P.2d 248; People v. Perkins, 8 Cal.2d 502, 66 P.2d 631.

[3, 4] From this it would appear that failure to prove motive is not fatal in a prosecution for murder where the conviction is based upon circumstantial evidence. Moreover, since the testimony elicited from the mother of the deceased child with respect to the so-called childhood episode was apparently permitted to be introduced in an attempt by the prosecution to prove a motive for the crime, its admission under the foregoing rules of law was not erroneous.

When appellant objected to the introduction of this evidence, a discussion was had between counsel and the trial court outside the hearing of the jury, at which time the court stated: "If your object is to show that the defendant was put on notice by the mother not to bother her children, if that is what your intention is, and that you can argue an inference that the boy knew that he was not wanted around there, and that sort of thing, I think that probably would be proper to do, but not directly or indirectly to attempt to get from this witness any details of why the mother made that sort of order, unless it is opened up on cross-examination in the guise of showing bias, motive and prejudice, and then, of course, if it is, I would let you go into it on your redirect examination." It was then brought out from the mother of the victim that six years before the homicide, she had told appellant not to return to her home; that he remained away about two years; that he then came to the Courtemanche home three or four times a week up to about a year before the homicide and that there were times when she (Mrs. Courtemanche) sent appellant home; that sometimes she would permit him to play there with the children when she could watch them; that she had not seen him very often in the last year until quite recently; that she never found him there with Doris when she came home from work, but that he undoubtedly was there when she (Mrs. Courtemanche) was not at home; that on one occasion only during the period of six years did she consent to appellant's coming to her home and that was when he had some ice cream and her children begged her to let him come in so they could eat the ice cream, and that she said he could. The only inference the jury could have drawn from this direct evidence was that appellant knew Mrs. Courtemanche did not want him coming to her house and that she watched him when he was there. Therefore, its admission, as heretofore stated, did not constitute error, as urged by appellant under point numbered six.

Appellant also makes the point (numbered seven) that the district attorney's reference to the said childhood episode in his opening and closing arguments to the jury constituted "gross misconduct prejudicial to" appellant, in that "said prosecuting attorney constantly emphasized and reiterated prior but nonexistent inimical conduct on the part of the defendant of an unexplained nature."

The phraseology particularly objected to follows: "We will show you by the evidence in this case as we go backward—we are now speaking as to the motive, which the Court will tell you is not necessary in the proof of a case but is often helpful to those who can prove motive, the motive being to show why a thing is done and existing in the mind only of the person concerning whom the inquiry is made and capable of performing it by his own declarations and circumstantial evidence. We will prove to you that for six years or more this defendant had been unwanted at the * * * Courtemanche home; that when he did come, that if Mrs. Courtemanche was there he remained very briefly because we will prove to you that Mrs. Courtemanche had ordered him to go on home and stay and to never come back upon those premises and had threatened him with punishment if he ever did return. * * * Thereby we will establish to you that this defendant knew at the time of which we speak that Mrs. Courtemanche entertained toward him feelings of hostility of the character of which I have spoken to you, and we will further establish in connection with and as a fact affecting the motive in this case, which we will ask you to consolidate with all other proof in this case, this circumstance: Six years before the date of this occurrence, at the time when the girl was but approximately six and a half and * * * this defendant was approximately but nine and a half years of age, Mrs. Courtemanche ordered this defendant to get off those premises and to stay and never return. That will be testified to here before you. There is evidence in this case that the little girl came screaming to her mother from the upper floor of the garage on these premises where the defendant was, a short distance back of her, and cast herself into her mother's arms and told her mother certain things. Her mother walked up to Planagan and took him by the arm and told him, 'Planagan, don't ever come on these premises again. Don't you ever put your hand on any of my children,' and then reached up and twitched his ear. She said, 'Do you feel that? I don't know what I should do to you to make you understand, but if you ever come back here and touch one of my babies again I will cut that ear off. Now you get out and stay out.' From that moment on Planagan was unwanted on the place and knew it." Again, the prosecuting attorney told the jury: "* * * We will prove to you that death came upon this girl directly and unexpectedly without any attempt on her part to flee, at the hands of a person, who, in order to cause her death at that moment to protect himself from the results of something that he had done, and that the stab wounds that are described to you are not the result of sadistic tendencies of an insane person but the severity of the infliction of the blows due to terror at the time, and terror of the doer over the very seriousness of his act." In his closing argument to the jury, the district attorney stated: "* * * In that period of a year before last April, while Mrs. Courtemanche was at work, in that period of time, this defendant came there, and he must have had in his mind that Mrs. Courtemanche did not want him there. He knew and she knew why, but it is enough to know that she didn't want him there. He knew she didn't like him and I have every reason to infer, and I believe you are justified in the inference that when she said that during those occasions he remained around the premises and she was watching him she took the occasion to let him know that she was watching him and he was aware that she was watching him. * * * Let's consider that statement in the light of what we come back to know about this case, and I ask your indulgence, if you think I am taking too much of your time, because if you find this boy guilty, you are going to take quite a lot of his time. There is going to be quite a lot of time in that community, when the parents of girls whom he knows will not have to wonder if he is coming to their house if you find him guilty, and if you find him innocent there will be throughout all time down to the beginning of eternity itself, there will be in San Pedro the impressive body of the little girl who is dead in her blood and her girlhood, which was uncalled for, unjustified and remains unavenged."

At the very beginning of his statement, the prosecuting attorney warned the jury that anything he said should not be considered as evidence in the case; and at the end thereof stated that he had outlined the case "simply for the purpose of permitting you to see * * * the theory of the prosecution * * * not to have you consider as evidence what I have told you but to be able to sit in and piece the evidence bit by bit." Appellant's counsel at no time excepted to the remarks of the prosecuting attorney, either in his opening or in his closing argument to the jury.

[5, 6] It is the duty of counsel making a statement to state the facts fairly and to refrain from stating facts which he cannot or will not be permitted to prove, People v. Stoll, 143 Cal. 689, 693, 77 P. 818. An opening statement is supposed to be an outline of what the people intend to prove. The failure to do so, either on account of the rules of evidence or for any other reason, does not necessarily indicate prejudice. It is the substance and implication of a statement, or the effect of an act which determines what the law recognizes as prejudicial misconduct.

[7] Applying the foregoing rules of law, the prosecuting attorney did not commit prejudicial misconduct in his opening statement to the jury when he referred to the specific details of the childhood episode which occurred six years prior to the homicide and which, under the ruling of the trial court hereinbefore mentioned, he was not permitted to prove by the witness Courtemanche.

[8] As stated in 4 Cal.Jur.Ten Yr.Sup., 1943 Revision, p. 767: "The scope of comment by the prosecuting attorney extends to facts that have been established by cross-examination, as well as those that have been proved by direct examination. The permissible range of discussion of the merits of the case, both as to the law and the facts, is comprehensive. The attorney may discuss and argue questions of law, excuse or condemn the motives of actors, and advance any theory that finds support in the evidence. The credibility of witnesses may be assailed by him, if credibility has been impeached by evidence, by inconsistencies or incoherence of testimony, by the witness's manner of testifying, by the appearance of the witness while testifying, or by circumstances. Again, the prosecuting attorney may argue that the crime was committed in any manner that the evidence shows reasonably possible. He may denounce a theory of the defense, refer to things that have been seen by the jury while viewing the premises, speak of articles that have been exhibited to them, and comment respecting the instrument with which the crime was committed—although it has not been formally introduced in evidence. * * * In addressing the jury, the prosecuting attorney should restrict the scope of his statements to matters that are within the record. He should not attempt to evolve any theory or to introduce into the case any feature that is not fairly and reasonably justified by the evidence." (Citing numerous authorities.)

[9] It is only where the district attorney refers to matters not in evidence or expresses his own conclusions which are not founded upon evidence, or where he indulges in unwarranted attacks upon defendants or interferes with the orderly processes of the court in some way, that his alleged misconduct in argument to the jury may be construed to be reversible error. People v. McKenzie, 12 Cal.App.2d 614, 55 P.2d 1200.

None of the remarks of the prosecuting attorney to the jury herein comes within that category of prejudicial misconduct which would warrant a reversal of the judgment.

Although appellant does not raise the question of error in denying instructions requested, or of error committed in the giving of instructions, nevertheless, because of the remarks of the prosecuting attorney with respect to the childhood episode, hereinabove quoted, we think it proper to state that the following instruction was given by the trial court:

"You are the sole and exclusive judges of the weight of evidence and the credibility of witnesses, and it is your function to determine all questions of fact arising from the evidence in the case. It is the right of court and counsel to comment on the failure of defendant to explain or deny any evidence against him, and to comment on the evidence, the testimony and credibility of any witness; yet the jurors are the exclusive judges of all questions of fact submitted to them and of the credibility of witnesses.

"But while you are the sole and exclusive judges of the facts and of the weight of evidence, you are to judge of the facts upon the testimony and other evidence produced here in court. If any evidence has been admitted and afterwards stricken out, you must disregard entirely the matter so stricken out, and if any counsel has intimated by questions which the court has not permitted to be answered that certain things are, or are not true, you must disregard such questions and refrain from any inferences based upon them. If counsel, upon either side, have made any statements in your presence concerning the facts in the case, you must be careful not to regard such statements as evidence, and must look entirely to the proof in ascertaining what the facts are. If, however, counsel have stipulated or agreed to certain facts, you are to regard the facts so stipulated to as being conclusively proven. If either party has during the trial admitted any fact or facts material to the matters involved in this case, such admission is to be deemed by you as proven against the party making such admission."

[10] The trial court refused to give appellant's requested instruction:

"The District Attorney in his opening statement said that there would be evidence presented in this case that 'the little girl had come screaming to her mother from the upper floor of the garage on those premises where the defendant was, a short distance back of her, and cast herself into her mother's arms and told her mother certain things. Her mother walked up to Planagan and took him by the arm and told him, Planagan, 'Don't you ever come on these premises again. Don't you ever put your hand on any of my children' and then reached up and twitched his ear. She said, 'Do you feel that? I don't know what I should do to you to make you understand, but if you ever come back here and touch one of my babies again I will cut that ear off. Now, you get out and stay out". From that moment on Planagan was unwanted on the place and knew it."

"You are instructed that no evidence or testimony has been adduced to establish these facts which the District Attorney stated he would prove, and that there has been a failure of proof in this respect. For this reason you are instructed to entirely and absolutely disregard the statement of the District Attorney as to these facts, nor are you to draw any inference that these facts may be true."

It would have been improper to give the requested instruction in the form proposed, because the following direct evidence was introduced which tended to establish some of the facts which the prosecuting attorney stated he would prove:

"Q. (by Deputy District Attorney to Mrs. Courtemanche, the mother of the deceased child): I want to be sure that you answer just what is asked of you and no more and no less. Mrs. Courtemanche, on one occasion approximately 6 years before this date of April the 21st last did you talk with Jack Planagan at your own place? That question is to be answered yes or no. A. Yes.

"Q. Now, at that time in that talk did you say anything about whether or not Jack Planagan, this defendant, was to be or come upon those premises at any future time? Just answer yes or no. (Objection by defense counsel overruled) A. Yes.

"Q. By Mr. Veitch: Now, in that conversation what did you say to him? Did you tell him to return or tell him not to return, which of the two? (Objection by defense counsel overruled) A. Not to return.

"Q. By Mr. Veitch: After that talk did this defendant continue to return to your premises? A. No sir.

"Q. For about how long did he continuously remain away from your premises? A. I imagine at least 2 years. * * *

"Q. Well, after such period of time what did you observe of this defendant returning to your home or being around the premises? (Objection of defense counsel overruled) A. I noticed that he had grown up quite a bit.

"Q. By Mr. Veitch: No. What did you notice about him being around the premises, first? You say you did see him around the premises or upon the premises of your home? A. After the 2 years?

"Q. Yes. A. Yes sir.

"Q. Now, how frequently would it occur in that period of which you are now speaking that you saw Jack Planagan in or around your premises? A. Well, 3 or 4 times a week.

"Q. On those occasions at that time had you as yet gone to work? A. No sir.

"Q. Got yourself a job? A. No sir.

"Q. When did you first start in to go to work and get yourself a job? A. A year ago last April.

"Q. Well, how long did it continue that this Planagan boy would be around those premises as you say 2 or 3 times a week, up to about when? A. Well, when school started he wouldn't be there quite so often, just now and then, but not often.

"Q. Up to how long before the 21st of April last year was it that you saw Planagan now and then, perhaps 2 or 3 times a week, in or upon the premises? A. I can't give the definite number of times.

"Q. That is not quite what I intended to ask you either. Up to about how long ago was it that Jack Planagan continued to come or that you would from time to time see him upon your premises as you have said perhaps 2 or 3 times a week? Is that question clear to you? A. Yes, I believe it is.

"Q. Then answer it. (Objection of defense counsel overruled) * * * A. Well, I guess about a year ago.

"Q. By Mr. Veitch: Now, during this period of time when he was coming to the house perhaps 2 or 3 times a week, to the premises, did you say anything to him about being around the place on any of those occasions? (Objection of defense counsel overruled) A. There were times when I sent him home.

"Q. By Mr. Veitch: Well, how frequently would it transpire that you would send him home? (Objection of defense counsel overruled) * * * A. Well, 7 or 8 times.

"The Court: Mrs. Courtemanche, sometimes when the boy would come over there you would not send him home? A. Not always.

"Q. Sometimes you would let him play there with the children, wouldn't you? A. Yes sir, when I could watch them I would.

"Q. And other times you would get tired from having him around and say 'Go on home,' was that it. A. No sir, that was not the reason.

"The Court: All right, go ahead.

"Q. By Mr. Veitch: Now, about a year ago what happened in respect to Planagan coming around the place? Did you see him after that or not? A. Yes, I have seen him but not very often in the last year until quite recently.

"Q. Well, when you say quite recently you mean rather recently during the spring time of this year? A. Yes sir.

"Q. Did you see him during this year before the Easter vacation of school around your place. A. No, I don't believe I did.

"Q. Now, did you ever come home from your work and find Jack Planagan there with Doris and Pete? A. No, I didn't come home from work and find him there.

"Q. Did you ever come home in this period of several months, now, well, let's say before the time this terrible thing happened, during the year before then, did you ever come home from work anywhere and find him there? A. I suppose I may have. I can't remember of him being there in the evening but undoubtedly he was there when I wasn't home.

"Q. No, you don't understand my question. Did you ever come home from being somewhere at work or downtown during that year before April 21st and discover that this defendant was there with your children at the house? When I say discover, I mean see him there with your children at the house. A. No sir. * * *

"Q. During that whole period of six years to which you have just referred did you at any time invite or ask this defendant to be in or upon the premises, your home? (Objection of defense counsel overruled) * * * A. I only consented once to Planagan coming into my home.

"Q. When was that? A. He had some ice cream and my children begged me to let him come in so they could eat the ice cream and I said he could. * * *

"Q. By Mr. Veitch: Other than that one occasion of which you have spoken, did you ever invite or consent to the invitation of Jack Planagan into your home or upon your premises during that period of 6 years. A. No sir. * * *

"Q. By Mr. Veitch: During that period of 6 years of which you are speaking, did you ever request Jack Planagan to go home or to leave, at least, your premises? (Objection of defense counsel overruled) * *

A. I have on occasions called my children in to get rid of him. (Answer stricken upon motion of defense counsel) * * *

A. I never definitely told Jack Planagan to go home with the exception of once.

"Q. Was that the occasion about which you told us yesterday, 6 years ago? A. Yes sir.—no sir; then the night before she died I told him to go home.

"Q. That was the night before she died? A. Yes, and then on one other occasion 6 years ago."

[11] Appellant urges that "a showing of a mere opportunity to commit a crime is insufficient to justify a verdict of guilty." It is the law that evidence showing an opportunity to commit the crime does not justify a conviction apart from other circumstances, unless it excludes all reasonable opportunity for its commission by another. People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 328, 184 P. 389; People v. Tarbox, 115 Cal. 57, 63, 46 P. 896; People v. Silva, 48 Cal.App. 728, 737, 192 P. 330. Even though it were conceded that no one of the facts, hereinbefore summarized, standing alone, would be sufficient to uphold the verdict, nevertheless, when all the circumstances which the jury may have resolved from the evidence are considered together, it cannot be held on this appeal that they were not sufficient to warrant an inference of guilt.

[12] Appellant next calls attention to the rule that the circumstances relied upon to establish the guilt of one accused of crime must be consistent with that hypothesis and inconsistent with any other rational conclusion. In other words, where the incriminatory circumstances relied upon are equally compatible with innocence, a reviewing court will reverse a judgment of conviction, and a like application of that rule, to this case, it is claimed, would impel a reversal of the judgment.

The rule above announced, as pointed out in People v. Newland, 15 Cal.2d 678, 682, 104 P.2d 778, 780, quoting from People v. Perkins, 8 Cal.2d 502, 519, 66 P.2d 631, "is a rule of instruction for the jury, and is not the rule for the guidance of the court on review." The rule "does no more than to instruct the jury that, if a reasonable doubt is created in their minds for any reason, they must acquit the defendant. But, where the jury rejects the hypothesis pointing to innocence by its verdict, and there is evidence to support the implied finding of guilt as the more reasonable of the two hypotheses, this court is bound by the finding of the jury."

[13] In People v. Martinez, 20 Cal.App. 343, 344, 128 P. 952, 953, it is said: "Where the circumstances are such as to reasonably justify an inference of guilt, as found by the jury, the fact that an inference of innocence might likewise be reasonably drawn therefrom does not present a question of law for review by an appellate court any more than does a verdict based upon direct conflicting evidence; in neither case will the verdict be disturbed. We are not unmindful that the Supreme Court in People v. Staples, 149 Cal. 405, 86 P. 886, employs language seemingly inconsistent with this view, and upon which appellant claims that, if upon review this court is of the opinion that the circumstances are reasonably compatible with innocence, then, notwithstanding the fact that they reasonably justify the inference of guilt drawn therefrom by the jury, he is entitled to a reversal of the judgment. In reply to this we quote with approval the language used by Judge Chipman in People v. Muhly, 15 Cal.App. [416], 419, 114 P. [1017], 1018, where, in discussing the Staples case, he says: 'We do not understand that case to hold that, where the circumstances are such as to reasonably justify the inference of guilt, the case will be taken from the jury because an inference of innocence might also reasonably have been drawn. Between these two inferences the jury must choose, and it is only where the evidence obviously does not warrant the inference of guilt that the court will interfere. This must be so, or the weight of circumstantial evidence, and the inference to be drawn from it in almost every case, must finally be determined by the appellate court, thus making the court the arbiter of both law and fact.'"

In the instant case the circumstances established by the evidence reasonably justified the conclusion of the jury as expressed in their verdict.

Appellant next contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence over his objection People's Exhibit 21, a spring-bladed knife. Officer Hargett testified that in a conversation he had with appellant, the latter told him that he owned three knives, a pocket knife, a spring-back knife with a snap blade, and a hunting knife in a brown scabbard; that the regular knife and the spring-back knife were at home, but that he lost the hunting knife on Friday previous to the homicide. Appellant testified that he had three or four knives; that he bought a push-button spring knife about a year before but had it only a few months when he broke it and threw it away, and that he bought a hunting knife after that. On cross-examination, he testified that he had two spring-bladed knives, one he threw away and guessed that the other was at his home at the time of his arrest; and that the snap that held up the blade on the knife which was at home was broken. He was shown the spring-bladed knife and testified that the catch was broken and it did not lock; that he did not know whether the blade on this knife was as long as the blade on the hunting knife. The broken spring-back knife was then offered in evidence by the prosecution, to which the defense objected on the ground it was immaterial. The court overruled the objection stating that the direct examination of the appellant specifically referred to two knives which he had possessed.

[14, 15] Appellant argues that the error of the court in allowing this knife to be placed in evidence becomes more pronounced in view of the prosecuting attorney's argument to the jury, in which he stated: "And when that body received these awful wounds upon the head, I maintain that that evidence alone, 13-A and 13-B show us that as she sat there she got knife cuts; that knife that has a blade as big as this which perhaps Mr. Hurst—I want to show the size of the knife it would take to make those cuts. Those cuts are from three-quarters of an inch to better than an inch. It would take a blade as big as the one that is there in this Exhibit 21 to do that sort of work. It was the hunting knife of this defendant built to order for that purpose and carried by him upon him."

"Tools and instruments of crime found in the possession or under the control of the defendant soon after the commission of the offense may be offered in evidence whenever they constitute a link in the chain of circumstances which tend to connect him with the commission of the offense charged. But before they can be received in evidence, it must be shown that the crime charged was in fact committed, and that it was committed with the aid of instruments like those proposed to be shown in evidence, and that the defendant was in the vicinity at or about the time the offense was committed." 8 Cal.Jur. 144.

[16-18] Since the evidence showed that appellant had several knives and had broken some and lost others, particularly the hunting knife, but had a broken spring-bladed knife at his home, the admission of this latter knife in evidence was for the purpose of showing the jury the type and kind of knives possessed by appellant. The prosecuting attorney in his argument used the knife, People's Exhibit 21, in speaking of the cuts found in the body of the deceased, and that these cuts were made by a blade as large as the one in evidence. The admission of this knife was within the sound discretion of the trial court.

"Physical objects which form a part of, or serve to illustrate, the transaction or occurrence which is the subject of investigation may be formally introduced in evidence, and it rests in the discretion of the trial judge whether they may be carried from the bar by the jury on its retirement. As to its competency, demonstrative evidence is measured by all the qualifications prescribed by law, and it must always be relevant to the issue. * * * where it is competent, tends to throw light on, and has direct bearing upon, a material issue, it is admissible and is not to be excluded because of its other effects on the jury." Wharton's Criminal Evidence, 11th Ed., Vol. 2, page 1275.

[19,20] Appellant contends that the evidence produced at the trial herein is insufficient to support the verdict and the judgment. In determining this question, it is incumbent upon this court to keep in mind and be guided by the rule that after the finding of the jury has been approved by the trial court on a motion for a new trial it is conclusive on appeal, and an appellate court may disturb it only when it can be said as a matter of law that there was no sufficient and substantial evidence to support it. We must assume in favor of the decision of the jury the existence of every fact which the jury could reasonably have deduced from the evidence and then determine whether guilt is deducible therefrom. People v. Walsh, 50 Cal.App.2d 164, 169, 122 P.2d 671; People v. Hennessey, 201 Cal. 568, 258 P. 49; People v. Rose, 26

Cal.App.2d 513, 79 P.2d 737; People v. Tedesco, 1 Cal.2d 211, 34 P.2d 467.

[21] As stated by the Supreme Court in People v. Newland, 15 Cal.2d 678, 681, 104 P.2d 778, 779: "The rule applicable where there is evidence, circumstantial or otherwise, that a crime has been committed and that the defendant was the perpetrator thereof, has been many times reiterated by the reviewing courts of this state as follows: The court on appeal 'will not attempt to determine the weight of the evidence, but will decide only whether upon the face of the evidence it can be held that sufficient facts could not have been found by the jury to warrant the inference of guilt. For it is the function of the jury in the first instance, and of the trial court after verdict, to determine what facts are established by the evidence, and before the verdict of the jury, which has been approved by the trial court, can be set aside on appeal upon the ground of' insufficiency of the evidence, 'it must be made clearly to appear that upon no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached in the court below. The determination of a charge in a criminal case involves proof of two distinct propositions: First, that the offense charged was committed; and, second, that it was perpetrated by the person or persons accused thereof. * * * We must assume in favor of the verdict the existence of every fact which the jury could have reasonably deduced from the evidence, and then determine whether such facts are sufficient to support the verdict.' If the circumstances reasonably justify the verdict of the jury, the opinion of the reviewing court that those circumstances might also reasonably be reconciled with the innocence of the defendant will not warrant interference with the determination of the jury." (Citation of authorities.)

The record discloses that appellant was not 'wanted' at the Courtemanche home. Pete Courtemanche did not care to associate with him. Apparently the only member of the family that appellant was interested in was Doris. He visited her at her home in the absence of other members of the family. He did not think she should go out with other boys, because she was too young. He called for her under her bedroom window two nights before she was slain, and was told to go home by her mother. On the day before the homicide, appellant was in the living room of the Courtemanche home ruffling up Doris' hair in a playful mood, and was there when Marilyn Courtemanche came home from work. However, he left before Mrs. Courtemanche came home. On the day of the homicide, instead of going to the beach where Pete Courtemanche and Frank Cordero were spending the day, appellant went to see Doris. In looking through the window he saw the body on the floor near the divan in the living room. He entered the house, lifted the cover, saw it was a girl's body and left by the front door. He got on his bicycle and rode away, not toward his home but away from his home, then felt sick to his stomach and went home where he was met by his mother. He looked pale and ill and when his mother asked him what was wrong he told her he had hit a woman while riding on his bicycle, which he later admitted was a false story. He went to bed, took a nap for ten or fifteen minutes, drove to the dairy with his brother to get some milk, went to town and paid some bills for his mother, went to a schoolyard with his brother and played handball, returned home, his mother served dinner but he could not eat, went to a moving picture show with his brother, returned home and went to bed. During this time he disclosed to no one what he had seen in the Courtemanche home earlier in the day. He did not tell his father because he did not want to bother or worry him. He did not disclose what he had seen until the next morning when his father questioned him. The black leather jacket which he was wearing the day of the homicide had splatters of human blood on it and there was human blood on the right cuff which had saturated into the lining on the sleeve on the inside of the jacket. Inside the zipper pocket of the jacket were spots of human blood, as well as on appellant's trousers over the right side pocket and over the right rear pocket. When asked about the spatter stains on his jacket by forensic chemist Pinker, appellant said he had no explanation to make. Appellant told Mr. Pinker he knew there were blood stains on his jacket and when asked why he didn't wash the stains off, he replied: "Well, you can't wash blood off. Blood is blood." Appellant testified that he did not remember whether blood was dripping or running from the blanket covering the body; that he was not sure that the body he saw was that of Doris Courtemanche; that he guessed a murder had been committed; that he didn't remember how long a time elapsed from the time he saw Mrs. Worden until he walked out the front door of the Courtemanche house, whether it was as much as half an hour or not; that he did not tell Mrs. Worden what he had seen; that he saw Mrs. Nolton when he was leaving the Courtemanche house after his discovery of Doris' body; but that he made no outcry. It was conclusively established that Betty Jane Worden at 11:00 o'clock on the morning of April 21, 1943, saw Doris Courtemanche "out by that little white fence that is on the edge of the cliff"; that Mrs. Olson saw Doris walking her dog at 11:25 o'clock that morning about a block from the Courtemanche home; that Mrs. Worden saw appellant approaching the Courtemanche house at 11:30 o'clock, and that the dead body of Doris Courtemanche was discovered by her brother, Robert Courtemanche, at 12:28 o'clock that day; that Robert Courtemanche notified the police and that officer Gannon and Lieutenant Elliott arrived at the Courtemanche home at 12:35 or 12:40 o'clock.

[22] The evidence produced at the trial definitely placed appellant at the scene of the homicide, and, although mainly circumstantial, it was sufficient from which the jury could find appellant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty.

[23] While there is nothing in the record to indicate that the jury reached its verdict as the result of passion or prejudice and it is also clear that the black leather jacket was introduced in evidence without objection, nevertheless this court condemns the practice followed in this case of placing pieces of red cellophane upon the said jacket to mark the blood stains thereon which were not visible to the naked eye. It would appear that these stains or spatters might have been marked in some less conspicuous manner in obviate the gruesome appearance which this packet presented to the eyes of the jury, covered, as it was with these red markers which simulated the appearances of blood.

[24] In his closing brief appellant's counsel makes the statement that appellant "was subjected continuously and with shameful pertinacity to the unconstitutional inquisition of a group of husky adult men, as many as five in number at a time, so that the lad was unable to have any normal mental reaction", etc. The record does not disclose any foundation for this complaint. On the contrary, appellant testified that he was not afraid of any of these officers and that he did not remember any unkind act displayed toward him when he was being questioned by them during the period from April 22 to April 30, 1943.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record and the evidence being sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury, the judgment and order appealed from are, and each of them is, affirmed.

DORAN, J., concurs.

WHITE, Justice.

I dissent.

Concededly, this is a case wherein circumstantial evidence alone is relied upon to sustain the conviction. It is also conceded that no motive whatsoever was shown for the commission of the homicide by the defendant. In connection with the absence of motive, our Supreme Court, in the case of People v. Albertson, 23 Cal. 2d 550, 566, 145 P.2d 7, 15, uses this language:

"In considering the sufficiency of this evidence to prove the guilt of Albertson, it is pertinent to note the startling fact that no motive whatsoever is shown. * * *

"The absence of motive, it may be conceded, furnishes but one element for consideration by the jury in connection with the other circumstances in the case, and if proof of guilt is otherwise sufficient to overcome the presumption of innocence the defendant must stand convicted notwithstanding no motive has been shown. But, nevertheless, 'absence of motive tends to support the presumption of innocence' (People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 328, 184 P. 389, 394, or as stated in People v. Kelley, 208 Cal. 387, 390, 391, 281 P. 609, 610, a case relied upon by the prosecution. 'The absence of proof of motive is a fact to be reckoned on the side of innocence.'")

In this state of the record, I am impressed that any errors of law committed during the trial might well assume proportions which could have turned the scales in favor of the prosecution and militated prejudicially against the defendant's substantial rights. While the law makes no distinction between direct and circumstantial evidence in the degree of proof required for conviction and only demands that proof of guilt be established beyond a reasonable doubt by evidence of the one character or the other, or both, it is nevertheless, elementary law that the circumstances relied upon to establish the guilt of the accused must be consistent with that hypothesis and inconsistent with any other rational conclusion.

In his opening statement to the jury, the district attorney referred to an incident which had occurred some six years prior to the homicide and in connection with which the district attorney said: "There is evidence in this case that the little girl came screaming to her mother from the upper floor of the garage on these premises where the defendant was, a short distance back of her, and cast herself into her mother's arms and told her mother certain things". This matter is referred to at some length in the main opinion.

When during the trial, the district attorney sought to introduce evidence of the incident just mentioned, vigorous objection was made by the defendant. After discussion outside the presence of the jury, the court ruled that the prosecution could not introduce evidence of the incident in question other than as to what the mother of the deceased said to the defendant, admonishing him to remain away from the Courtemanche premises. In order to overcome any inferences the jury might draw from what the district attorney said in his opening statement, the defendant offered the following instruction, which was refused:

"The District Attorney in his opening statement said that there would be evidence presented in this case that 'the little girl had come screaming to her mother from the upper floor of the garage on those premises where the defendant was, a short distance back of her, and cast herself into her mother's arms and told her mother certain things. Her mother walked up to Planagan and took him by the arm and told him, Planagan, "Don't you ever come on these premises again. Don't you ever put your hand on any of my children" and then reached up and twitched his ear. She said "Do you feel that? I don't know what I should do to you to make you understand, but if you ever come back here and touch one of my babies again I will cut that ear off. Now, you get out and stay out"'. From that moment on Planagan was unwanted on the place and knew it."

"You are instructed that no evidence or testimony has been adduced to establish these facts which the District Attorney stated he would prove, and that there has been a failure of proof in this respect. For this reason you are instructed to entirely and absolutely disregard the statement of the District Attorney as to these facts, nor are you to draw any inference that these facts may be true."

This instruction should have been given. The prejudicial effect of what the district attorney said in his opening statement with reference to "The little girl had come screaming to her mother from the upper floor of the garage on those premises where the defendant was, a short distance back of her, and cast herself into her mother's arms and told her mother certain things" was intensified by the discussion attending the objection made by the defendant when it was sought, during the trial, to introduce testimony of the incident into evidence. While it is true the judge did give a certain instruction as set forth in the majority opinion and which is read to juries in practically all cases, it is my opinion it did not cover the prominent and necessary features of the instruction which was offered and refused.

The defendant also requested the trial court to instruct the jury that the defendant was of the age of fifteen years; that a boy of that age is not presumed or required by law to exercise the same "judgment, discretion, consideration or acumen" in his actions or reactions, conduct or statements, that would be exercised by a person of more mature age under the same circumstances but is only required to exercise that degree of judgment and discretion which would ordinarily or usually be exercised by a youth of the age of fifteen years acting under the same circumstances. The court refused to give this or any similar instruction.

I am impressed that the proffered instruction contains a correct statement of the law and that the jury should have been so advised. The refused instruction assumed much importance because the jury was required to consider, as a link in the chain of circumstantial evidence, the reactions, conduct and behavior of the minor defendant, when, according to his testimony, he discovered the lifeless body of the deceased. I am convinced that, in giving consideration to such evidence, the jury should have been admonished as to the law applicable thereto when the actor therein was of the more or less immature age of fifteen years.

I am further convinced that the court should have instructed the jury as requested by the defendant, that their personal opinions as to facts not proven cannot properly be resorted to as the basis for a verdict; that although, as men and women, they might believe that certain facts exist, nevertheless, as jurors, they could only act upon the evidence introduced at the trial, and upon that and that alone, their verdict should be based. While it is true that in a general instruction given in practically every criminal trial the court, in the course of such instruction, counselled the jury, "You are to be governed, therefore, solely by the evidence introduced in this trial and the law as given you by the court," it is my belief that, because of the nature of this case, the circumstantial character of the evidence introduced, and the absence of motive, the court should have specifically warned the jury to beware of acting upon anything except the evidence introduced at the trial and inferences legally deducible therefrom, in arriving at their verdict. In a case such as the instant one, where the evidence is entirely circumstantial, and the lack of motive tends to support the presumption of innocence, the court should meticulously guard against the possibility of resort being had by the jury to considerations other than the evidence introduced at the trial in arriving at their verdict.

It is also my opinion that prejudicial error resulted from the introduction of People's Exhibit 21, a spring-bladed knife, under the circumstances set forth in the majority opinion herein.

In his closing argument, the district attorney exhibited the knife to the jury and said: "It would take a blade as big as the one that is there in exhibit 21 to do that sort of work. It was the hunting knife of this defendant built to order for that purpose and carried by him, upon him." The error of admitting this knife as an exhibit lies in the fact that there was no evidence identifying the knife admitted into evidence with the crime under investigation. People v. Hill, 123 Cal. 571, 56 P. 443. Consequently, the jury could only conjecture that it, or one like it, was used by the defendant.

With reference to the manner in which the trial was conducted, the majority opinion, while holding that it cannot be said the jury arrived at its verdict as the result of passion or prejudice, nevertheless, in reference to the manner in which the defendant's black leather jacket was introduced into evidence, my associates have this to say: " * * * This court condemns the practice followed in this case of placing red cellophane upon the said jacket to mark the blood stains thereon which were not visible to the naked eye. It would appear that these stains or splatters might have been marked in some less conspicuous manner in order to obviate the gruesome appearance which the jacket presented to the eyes of the jury, covered, as it was, with these red markers which simulated the appearance of blood." Conduct of a trial which merits such vigorous condemnation does not impress me as being of that type of judicial investigation which the law contemplates and which seeks to arrive at the truth.

Guilty or innocent, appellant was entitled to have his case fairly tried according to the established rules of law. That unfair means may have resulted in doing justice to a defendant in a particular case, furnishes no valid argument for resorting to such means, because justice so attained is unjust and dangerous to the whole community. That respect for the law cannot be inspired by withholding the protection of the law, recognizes no exceptions. True, the acquittal of a guilty person is a miscarriage of justice, but we should not forget that the conviction of an innocent person through relaxation of those fundamental legal principles, with which we are here concerned, would be a tragedy.

With reference to section 4½ of article VI of the Constitution, it is not my understanding that the same is intended to mean that merely because the evidence may legally be able to stand up under the weight of the judgment, that is sufficient reason in all cases for refusing to set aside the judgment. People v. Davis, 210 Cal. 540, 556, 293 P. 32. As was said in People v. Wilson, 23 Cal.App. 513, 524, 138 P. 971, 975:

"The phrase 'miscarriage of justice' does not simply mean that a guilty man has escaped, or that an innocent man has been convicted. It is equally applicable to cases where the acquittal or the conviction has resulted from some form of trial in which the essential rights of the people or of the defendant were disregarded or denied. The right of the accused in a given case to a fair trial, conducted substantially according to law, is at the same time the right of all inhabitants of the country to protection against procedure which might at some time illegally deprive them of life or liberty. 'It is an essential part of justice that the question of guilt or innocence shall be determined by an orderly legal procedure, in which the substantial rights belonging to defendants shall be respected.' (Opinion written by Mr. Justice Sloss in People v. O'Bryan [165 Cal. 55], 130 P. 1042.)"

When a defendant is denied that fair and impartial trial guaranteed by law, such procedure amounts to a denial of due process of law. Powell v. State of Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 53 S.Ct. 55, 77 L.Ed. 158, 84 A.L.R. 527.

I am persuaded that it is not for this court to say whether we think that the defendant is guilty, and nothing herein said by me is to be taken as indicating any opinion one way or the other on the question of his actual guilt. It is, however, my judgment that, had the jury been instructed as heretofore set forth, and had the errors of law upon the admission into evidence of the knife not been committed, such instructions and the absence of such errors would have added a substantial item to the balance in defendant's favor, and who can say but what a different verdict might have been rendered. This I assert because of the fiendish, brutal, and depraved character of the murder with which we are here concerned. Appellant was charged with that murder. If guilty at all of this cruel and inhuman crime, he was guilty of first degree murder. Strictly speaking, there was no middle ground. However, the jury found appellant guilty of only second degree murder. Here, indeed, was a remarkable verdict. To me, the verdict rendered showed nothing if it did not indicate a doubt in the minds of the jurors as to the correctness of their solution of the problem submitted to them. Was such doubt engendered by the errors to which I have alluded? Who can say?

In my opinion, the judgment and the order denying a new trial should be reversed and the cause remanded for a retrial devoid of such errors and consequent prejudice.

KENDRICK v. KLEIN et al.

Civ. 7049.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Aug. 19, 1944.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 16, 1944.

Hearing Denied Oct. 16, 1944.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1)

In action to quiet title based on alleged adverse possession, whether defendants' construction and use of a shed on disputed property was sufficient to show that plaintiff's occupancy was not exclusive or whether maintenance of shed was with permission of plaintiff was for trier of facts.

2. Adverse possession ⇨47

The mere fact that record owner of disputed land entered and built a shed thereon to temporarily shelter a horse and store machinery was not, in itself, sufficient to interrupt adverse claimant's possession in the absence of evidence to show that entry was connected with right to enter.

3. Adverse possession ⇨94

The fact that disputed property may have been doubly assessed by public authorities both against record owner and adverse claimant could not serve to destroy claimant's adverse possession on theory that he did not pay all of the taxes assessed against property.

4. Adverse possession ⇨95

Where plaintiff, who claimed 1.72 acres of land by adverse possession, paid taxes assessed to portion of tract "lying north of the north bank" of certain creek, which description embraced some three acres, defendants could not contend that description of property assessed to plaintiff was insufficient to identify the land assessed with the land claimed by plaintiff because owing to changes in banks of creek the north bank could not be established.

5. Adverse possession ⇨40

Plaintiff's possession for five years prior to commencement of action was sufficient to sustain his title by adverse possession, the other elements necessary to establish title by prescription being shown, without the necessity of tacking his parents' prior possession.

6. Adverse possession ⇨114(1)

In action to quiet title to land claimed by plaintiff by adverse possession, the prior possession of plaintiff's parents, the use made by them of the land, their filing of a declaration of homestead and the execution of a deed by plaintiff's mother to plaintiff were evidence of open and notorious use and occupancy by plaintiff's parents and their claim of right to the area which together with evidence of plaintiff's possession for five years and payment of taxes for such time authorized judgment for plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Action by Michael W. Kendrick against Louis Klein and another to quiet title to land. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

James Snell, of Grass Valley, for appellants.

Frank G. Finnegan, of Nevada City (H. Ward Sheldon, of Nevada City, of counsel), for respondent.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff, Michael W. Kendrick, on September 24, 1942, filed this action seeking to quiet his title to a tract of land consisting of 1.72 acres, described by metes and bounds, and constituting a part of the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter (SE $\frac{1}{4}$ of NE $\frac{1}{4}$ of NE $\frac{1}{4}$) of Section 15, T. 16 N., R. 8 E., M. D. B. & M.

Defendants Louis Klein and Anton C. M. Larsen, answering plaintiff's complaint, denied plaintiff's ownership, and set up title in themselves.

The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and resulted in findings and a judgment in favor of plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was denied.

Plaintiff's claim of ownership is based upon adverse possession, and on this appeal it is contended by appellants that the findings of the trial court in favor of plaintiff are not sustained by the evidence; that there is no evidence proving or tending to prove that plaintiff's possession of the property was hostile to the true owners, that it was exclusive, that it was under claim of title or that plaintiff and his predecessors had paid all taxes levied or assessed against said lands or that no taxes were levied or assessed against said lands.

The property in controversy is located in the northern half of the SE $\frac{1}{4}$ of the NE $\frac{1}{4}$ of the NE $\frac{1}{4}$ of Section 15, T. 16 N., R. 8 E., M. D. B. & M. The evidence shows without conflict that as early as 1871 a farm which includes the disputed area was occupied by James Kendrick and Alice Kendrick, his wife, who were the father and mother of plaintiff, Michael W. Kendrick; that plaintiff was born on the property in 1871, and during his whole lifetime lived in the house of his parents, a portion of which house extends into the area in controversy; that the contested area was, during all of said time, enclosed by a substantial fence which was always kept in repair; and that the said area was each year cultivated for a garden. James Kendrick, during his lifetime, claimed the property as his own, and in July, 1892, he and his wife executed and recorded a declaration of homestead upon a tract which included the area in controversy, alleging that they resided on said premises and claimed them as a homestead, and that same were community property.

After the death of James Kendrick, his wife, Alice, and her son, plaintiff herein, continued to reside on the property, and on September 12, 1907, Alice Kendrick executed a deed of said premises to plaintiff, which deed was recorded on August 3, 1912. She died some eighteen or twenty years prior to the trial, and thereafter plaintiff continued to reside upon the land. Since 1915, at least, plaintiff has paid taxes assessed against the property each year, the tax bills describing certain land not in controversy but including the portion of the SE $\frac{1}{4}$ of the NE $\frac{1}{4}$ of the NE $\frac{1}{4}$ lying north of the north bank of Deer Creek. Deer Creek, as shown by the map in evidence, crosses the said SE $\frac{1}{4}$ of the NE $\frac{1}{4}$ of the NE $\frac{1}{4}$ from east to west near the center of same, and the disputed tract lies within the area described in the tax bills as aforesaid.

Plaintiff testified that he had claimed to own the property ever since his mother's death, that he had continuously resided thereon, that no one ever questioned his ownership or attempted to interfere with his possession; that for fifteen years or more he had maintained at each gate to his premises signs 12" x 24" in size, printed in large letters, reading: "Private Property, permission to pass over revocable at any time." Plaintiff's testimony was corroborated by his nephew, Eldon Kendrick, who testified that he had been familiar with the property since 1915, that it was then fenced, and that there had always been a garden on it and feed for cows. Thomas Coan, who had been familiar with the property for sixty-five years, said the fences were there over sixty years before the trial, and in the same position, and that the disputed area was always cultivated in the summer time.

Defendants, in support of their claim of title, introduced in evidence a notice of placer location made and recorded by three men named Gray, Clancy and Garver in 1885, covering, among other lands, the SE $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N $\frac{1}{4}$ of the NE $\frac{1}{4}$ of Section 15, T. 16 N., R. 8 E., M.D.B. & M., a deed by the above-named locators to E. S. Hawke on the same day that the location notice was recorded; a mineral certificate from the United States to Ellen S. Hawke, dated May 5, 1887, and recorded October 20, 1890; a deed from Ellen S. Hawke to James Hawke and Albert Hawke, dated April 27, 1891, and a deed by Albert Hawke to Louis Klein dated December 26, 1916, purporting to convey an undivided one-half interest in the property. However, they also introduced a decree of foreclosure of mortgage made and entered October 28, 1919, in favor of one Ora D. Larsen, which foreclosed all interest of James Hawke, Louis Klein, and others; a sheriff's certificate of sale of said property to Ora D. Larsen dated November 18, 1919, and a sheriff's deed to her dated January 14, 1921. A deed by Ora D. Larsen to Anton C. M. Larsen, dated February 26, 1941, was also filed.

Continuous occupation of the property by plaintiff and his parents before him is not denied by the defendants, nor is it denied that the portion in controversy was fenced and cultivated as testified by plaintiff. Defendants do not deny knowledge of the occupancy of the land by plaintiff and his parents before him, nor the fact that it was fenced and cultivated; and it is admitted by them that such occupancy was not disputed by them nor was rental or other compensation for use of the premises ever demanded. And as showing that plaintiff's possession was hostile there was testimony by plaintiff that at one time he had a dispute with James Hawke when the latter sought to pass over the land, at which time he hit Hawke over the head with a shovel, and thus deterred him from entering. Appellants contend, however, that the possession of plaintiff and his parents before him was not hostile to the true owners nor exclusive because, about 1915, the brother of defendant Klein built a rough board shed about 10 feet within plaintiff's fence, which shed was at one time used to stable a horse, and thereafter used to store tools which were being used in dredging operations on the land south of plaintiff's fence. Plaintiff stated that this shed was built without his knowledge, but that on discovering it he made objection and asked James Hawke why he had put it inside the fence; that Hawke said he wanted to store some machinery in it, which would be safer if inside the fence; that he (plaintiff) told Hawke that "it was all right, but we owned the ground." He also testified that he had objected to the use of the shed for a horse, whereupon the horse was moved across the creek.

[1,2] But appellants argue that plaintiff's occupancy was not exclusive, also that he did not pay all of the taxes because defendants also paid taxes assessed against the whole of the SE $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N.E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the NE $\frac{1}{4}$ of the section. Whether the construction and use of the shed was sufficient to show that plaintiff's occupancy was not exclusive or whether the maintenance of such shed was with the permission of plaintiff, was a question of fact for the trial court whose conclusion is binding upon an appellate court. The mere fact that the shed was built upon the disputed area many years prior to the trial and put to the use shown by the evidence was not, in itself, sufficient to interrupt plaintiff's possession. As stated in Volume I, Ruling Case Law, section 39, page 724, referring to the interruption of the possession of an adverse possessor: "The mere act of going upon the land is not enough. The owner must assert his claim to the land, or perform some act that would reinstate him in possession, before he can regain what he has lost. It is evident, therefore, that an entry by stealth, under circumstances going to show that he claimed no right to enter, or an entry for purposes other than those connected with a right to enter, would not break the continuity of the disseisor's possession."

In Smith v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 1 Cal.2d 272, 275, 34 P.2d 713, 714, the court said that to interrupt the adverse user the re-entry of the legal title holder must be open, notorious and under claim of right and must equal in dignity and character that required to initiate an adverse possession; citing Armstrong v. Payne, 188 Cal. 585, 597, 206 P. 638. No particular use of the shed appears to have been made during recent years, nor has anything of real value been stored therein, and there was testimony that boards had been pulled off its walls, and that it was so broken down that one could walk in without going through the door. No use of same by Ora D. Larsen during the time she held the legal title—from 1919 to 1941—was shown. The trial court may well have concluded that its use had been abandoned.

[3] As to appellants' argument that plaintiff did not pay all of the taxes assessed against the property because it was included within the description of an area upon which defendants also paid taxes, the fact that the property may have been doubly assessed by the public authorities cannot serve to destroy plaintiff's adverse possession. In Cavanaugh v. Jackson, 99 Cal. 672, 34 P. 509, the court said that where a claimant by adverse possession had the land assessed to him and paid the taxes levied thereon it was immaterial that it had also been assessed to and the taxes paid by others; that it was never intended by the lawmaking power that such claimant should pay taxes for any stated year more than once. Also see Owsley v. Matson, 156 Cal. 401, 406, 407, 104 P. 983; Cummings v. Laughlin, 173 Cal. 561, 565, 160 P. 833; Pereira Farms Corp. v. Simas, 69 Cal.App. 159, 163, 230 P. 976; Bell v. Germain, 12 Cal.App. 375, 378, 107 P. 630.

[4] Appellants make some contention that the description of the property assessed to plaintiff is insufficient to identify the land assessed, described as "That portion lying N. of the N. bank of Deer Creek in the SE $\frac{1}{4}$ of the NE $\frac{1}{4}$ of the NE $\frac{1}{4}$ ", with the land claimed by plaintiff; that owing to changes in the banks of Deer Creek due to dredging, etc., the north bank of that stream could not be and was not established. But the evidence shows that the land assessed to plaintiff north of the north bank of the stream amounted to 3 acres or more, while this action involves but 1.72 acres; also the map shows the relative position of Deer Creek, and shows that plaintiff's south line fence is well north of it; and the evidence shows that said fence has always been maintained in its present position. Changes in the bank of Deer Creek did not, then, affect the boundaries of plaintiff's land as claimed in this action, and as the trial court impliedly has held that such tract was included within the 3 acres upon which plaintiff paid taxes, the fact that plaintiff paid taxes upon the larger area of 3 or more acres cannot be held to establish as matter of law that he did not pay taxes assessed against the area claimed, which lies entirely within the portion of the 10 acre tract north of Deer Creek.

[5,6] Appellants also argue that plaintiff failed to show that his parents paid taxes upon the property, or that taxes were paid prior to 1915, and that the absence of such showing establishes that they did not acquire title by adverse possession, and that, therefore, their possession cannot be "tacked" to plaintiff's possession for the purpose of showing continuous adverse possession. We are unable to see that plaintiff sought to "tack" the possession of his parents to his own possession for such purpose. Plaintiff's possession for the five years prior to the commencement of the action was sufficient to sustain his title by adverse possession, the other elements necessary to establish his title by prescription being shown. The prior possession by his parents, the use made by them of the land, the filing of the homestead by the husband and wife, and the execution of the deed by Alice Kendrick to her son, go to show open and notorious use and occupancy by them, and their claim of right to the area. As stated in Park v. Powers, 2 Cal.2d 590, 594, 595, 42 P.2d 75, 77: "Until 1923 the possession of the Park family lacked one of the essential elements to ripen into title by adverse possession—payment of taxes. As this action was not filed until January 21, 1931, adverse possession, including payment of taxes, dating from 1923, is sufficient to establish title in plaintiffs. However, the facts pertaining to the prior occupation and possession are material, as the possession of plaintiff D. W. Park is a continuation of the occupation by other members of his family, and the character of his possession must be determined with reference to the circumstances under which the occupancy of his family began and was perpetuated. Akley v. Bassett, 189 Cal. 625, 643, 209 P. 576."

We think that the evidence is ample to support the conclusion that there was actual, open, notorious and uninterrupted occupancy and possession of the property in controversy by plaintiff's parents, and by him after their deaths; that such possession was under claim of title, that it was exclusive and hostile against the various holders of the record title, that the property was cultivated annually, that it was protected by a substantial enclosure, and that plaintiff paid taxes assessed against same continuously for a period much in excess of five years. The judgment of the trial court is therefore affirmed.

DYKZEUL et al. v. MANSUR,
Civ. 3338.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Aug. 21, 1944.

1. Waters and water courses ☞152(8)

Evidence supported finding that defendant acquired a prescriptive right to certain amount of water per month from plaintiffs' land for use on riparian land belonging to defendant and to an easement over plaintiffs' land for purpose of conveying water to defendant's land.

2. Waters and water courses ☞144½

A riparian proprietor may acquire a right by prescription to maintain a ditch or other means of diversion over land of another, and he may acquire prescriptive right to transport in that ditch that water to which he is entitled, both under his prescriptive right or as a riparian proprietor when such water is used for beneficial use on his riparian land.

3. Waters and water courses ☞130

An owner of land adjacent to a stream may acquire prescriptive title to waters therefrom in addition to his normal riparian rights.

4. Waters and water courses ☞152(11)

Where defendant had, for many years, taken not only such water as it acquired by prescription but also had taken some proportionate share from his riparian waters across plaintiffs' land, judgment was not erroneous because it gave defendant the right to take water off of plaintiffs' land in an undetermined amount to which he might be entitled as a riparian owner of land located below plaintiffs' land in addition to awarding a prescriptive right to a definite amount of water.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨152(8)

Evidence supported finding that defendant had previously, for 20 or more years, used water taken from plaintiffs' land pursuant to a prescriptive right in an amount in excess of 27 acre feet per year, so as to authorize an award of a prescriptive right to such amount.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨143

The quantity of water to which a person is entitled by prescription is not necessarily determined by capacity of ditch, but it is limited to the amount applied to a beneficial use, and such amount is a question of fact in each case.

7. Waters and water courses ⇨152(12)

On appeal from judgment in quiet title action, wherein defendant claimed a prescriptive right to take water from plaintiffs' land, fact that trial judge viewed the premises should be taken into consideration by reviewing court in reviewing the evidence in support of the findings.

Diego County. Upon taking possession of the land, plaintiffs learned that the defendant owned a tract of land of approximately 34 acres which, in part, bordered upon the southerly boundary line of the plaintiffs' tract. For many years a small stream of water has flowed across this 1100 acre tract and into the San Luis Rey River, the source of which arose in the mountains northeast of the rancho. It flowed diagonally southwesterly through the westerly corner of the 1100 acre tract, thence across a small portion of lot 3 of defendant's land and thence diagonally southwesterly across lot 2 of the same land. The stream of water crossing this property is fed to some extent by springs upon plaintiffs' land. After taking possession of the 1100 acres plaintiffs were informed by defendant that defendant owned, or at least claimed the water arising on or crossing the land just purchased by plaintiffs. This action followed.

In the answer filed, defendant admitted his claim to "an easement in and upon the land described" and alleged that because of an appropriation recorded in 1891 by one Mary Salmons he had the right to divert and take from plaintiffs' land 100 miners' inches of water under a four-inch pressure; that he had a prescriptive title to 100 miners' inches. He filed a cross-complaint setting up his claimed right thereto, as well as a right and easement to maintain upon plaintiffs' land, pipes and ditches for the diversion of water, and to divert water and transport it upon his land. He prayed that his said easements may be established.

The evidence discloses that for many years there had existed over and across plaintiffs' land, and on lot 3 of defendant's land, an open ditch through which water had been diverted from the stream above mentioned; that, originally, the ditch had been approximately a thousand feet in length from the southerly boundary line of plaintiffs' land, but that floods had washed out the ditch until, from 1937 on, the ditch was approximately 205 feet in length. The evidence also shows that from 1937 on the defendant had taken water from this stream on plaintiffs' land and conveyed it by means of this open ditch and two one-inch pipes located therein across plaintiffs' land onto his own land, where he used it for the purpose of domestic household uses, watering a few head of stock and some fowl, irrigating a Lindley & Higgins, of San Diego, for appellants.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

This is an ordinary action to quiet title wherein plaintiff alleged ownership of certain described real property and that defendant "claims some right, title, interest, estate or lien in or to the above described real property adverse to these plaintiffs * * *" Plaintiffs and appellants herein, a few months before this action was commenced, purchased, as joint tenants, a tract of land (approximately 1100 acres which originally was a part of the Rancho Pauma) lying in the northeasterly section of San vegetable garden, fruit trees, and also for the purpose of irrigating shrubbery, flowers and eucalyptus trees.

The court found and adjudicated that the defendant had, by adverse use, obtained an easement and the right to take off of plaintiffs' land, at the point where the 205-foot ditch intersected the stream bed, 27 acre feet of water per year in certain proportionate amounts each month of the year, and to convey the same by means of the open ditch and water pipe therein onto the defendant's land. The court then found that both the land of the plaintiffs and the land of the defendant were riparian to the stream of water; that in addition to the definite amount of water which the court found the defendant had actually acquired by prescription and put to a beneficial use on his land, he had also secured, by prescription, the right to divert and take through the open ditch and the water pipes therein, all of the water to which defendant might be entitled as a riparian owner on the stream below plaintiffs' land up to the capacity of the ditch, to be used for beneficial uses only. The findings then recite: "* * * the court herein making no finding as to the extent or amount thereof" (riparian rights) "* * * That it is stipulated and conceded by both parties and found by the court that the respective properties and the owners thereof are entitled to and possess their riparian rights in and to the waters of said unnamed creek except as said rights are modified by and are subject to the prior right and easement herein found to be possessed by defendant." The judgment then recites that "each have their riparian rights in and to the waters of said unnamed stream * * * subject only and as modified by and subordinate to the prior right and easement of the defendant * * * it being expressly provided that this decree is without prejudice to any further proceeding in the future which may be necessary to adjudicate or determine the exact proportionate amounts of said waters to which either of the parties hereto is entitled by reason of said riparian rights."

Appellants, on this appeal, claim first that the judgment is erroneous because it awards to defendant a prescriptive right to take water from plaintiffs' land and use it on riparian land belonging to defendant. Second, it is claimed that the judgment is erroneous because it not only awards a prescriptive right to a definite amount of water to be taken by defendant off of plaintiffs' land, but also gives the defendant the right to take water off of plaintiffs' land in an undetermined amount to which he might be entitled as a riparian owner of land located below the land of the plaintiffs. Third, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the court's conclusion as to the amount of water which the defendant is entitled to take from the stream of water on plaintiffs' land. Fourth, that the judgment is erroneous because it is uncertain as to the extent of the defendant's right, title, and interest in plaintiffs' land.

[1] The evidence in this case fully supports the finding that the defendant acquired a prescriptive right in and to the proportionate amount of water per month as described in the findings and judgment and to the easement in and over plaintiffs' land for the purpose of conveying water to defendant's lands. Defendant's predecessor in interest acquired defendant's property many years ago. In 1891, she recorded her notice of appropriation and in addition thereto, ever since that time, she and defendant have diverted and used, openly, continuously, notoriously, and adversely under a claim of right, at least "100 miners' inches of water, under a four-inch pressure" for a beneficial use and upon defendant's property.

[2,3] It is fundamental that a riparian proprietor may acquire the right by prescription to maintain a ditch or other means of diversion over the land of another, and he may acquire the prescriptive right to transport in that ditch that water to which he is entitled, both under his prescriptive right or as a riparian proprietor when such water is used for a beneficial use on his riparian land. Logan v. Guichard, 159 Cal. 592, 114 P. 989; Albaugh v. Mount Shasta Power Corporation, 9 Cal.2d 751, 73 P.2d 217. An owner of land adjacent to a stream may acquire prescriptive title to waters therefrom distinct from or even in addition to his normal riparian rights. Mount Shasta River Corp. v. McArthur, 109 Cal.App. 171, 292 P. 549; Oliver v. Robnett, 190 Cal. 51, 210 P. 408; Ward v. City of Monrovia, 16 Cal.2d 815, 108 P.2d 425; Morgan v. Walker, 217 Cal. 607, 20 P.2d 660; and Larsen v. Apollonio, 5 Cal.2d 440, 55 P.2d 196.

[4] It was conceded at the trial and the court found that both plaintiffs and defendant were riparian owners. There were other lower riparian owners. It is apparent from the pleadings and judgment that the trial court was not called upon nor did it endeavor to determine the extent of the riparian rights of the respective landowners. This question was specifically left in abeyance. It appears, therefore, that plaintiffs and defendant were endeavoring to determine just the nature and extent of the respective easements claimed by defendant in and over plaintiffs' land. Defendant had, for many years, taken not only such water as he had acquired by prescription but also had taken some proportionate share from his riparian waters from and across plaintiffs' land. The evidence indicates that this was the only accessible method or means of obtaining defendant's riparian waters from the stream. The trial court held that defendant's easement permitted this method of obtaining defendant's water acquired by prescription, the amount of which was definitely fixed by the court, "and any other waters up to the capacity of said ditch as he may be entitled to use from said stream by reason of the riparian rights appurtenant to the land owned by him, the court herein making no finding as to the extent or amount thereof." Under the pleadings and issues as thus framed, the trial court was authorized to and did sufficiently describe and fix the extent of the "defendant's right, title and interest in plaintiffs' land."

[5] The evidence fully supports the court's finding that defendant had previously, for a period of 20 or more years, used such water for a beneficial use, on his property, in an amount in excess of 27 acre feet per year; that the nature of the stream was such that in the dry seasons defendant's land required more water than was obtainable from it; that plaintiffs' land was arid and that plaintiffs' predecessors in interest had never used the waters therefrom to any extent; that in the rainy seasons more water ran through the creek than could be used by either plaintiffs or defendant.

[6, 7] In Stinson Canal & Irrigation Co. v. Lemoore Canal & Irrigation Co., 45 Cal. App. 241, 188 P. 77, it was held that in determining how much of the water in fact used on a given acreage is reasonably necessary for the purpose for which it is used, a court should be liberal with the appropriator to the extent, at least, that it should not deprive him of any portion of the amount of water that he has in fact used for the period necessary to gain title by prescription, unless it is clearly and satisfactorily made to appear that he used more than was reasonably necessary. There is no evidence in the instant case that defendant has taken more water out of the stream than he was able to put to a beneficial use upon the land which is riparian to the stream. It has been held that the quantity of water to which a person is entitled by prescription is not necessarily determined by the capacity of the ditch, but is limited to the amount applied to a beneficial use, and such amount is a question of fact in each case. Pabst v. Finmand, 190 Cal. 124, 211 P. 11; Witherill v. Brehm, 74 Cal. App. 286, 240 P. 529. Because of a conflict in the testimony, it became necessary for the trial judge to view the premises and ascertain for himself the kind and character of the use made by defendant of the property involved. As a result of the inspection and the testimony, the court found that the water was used beneficially on six acres of defendant's property and that he had a prescriptive right to use that amount of water reasonably necessary to properly supply the needs of that acreage. The fact that the judge viewed the premises should be taken into consideration by a reviewing court. McManus v. Otis, 61 Cal. App. 2d 432, 143 P. 2d 380. The trial court's determination on the issues here presented is not unreasonable. The judgment is sufficiently certain and will not be disturbed on appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Civ. 7053; Sac. 5649.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Aug. 14, 1944.

1. Appeal and error ⇐643(1)

Respondent's motion for augmentation of record on appeal by adding thereto an order of correction of court minutes would be denied, where parties had not yet filed their briefs and neither respondent's notice of motion nor appellant's opposition thereto, nor the arguments nor order itself threw light on whether such minutes would assist in determination of the appeal on its merits. Code Civ.Proc. § 953.

2. Appeal and error ⇐660(1)

On respondent's motion for augmentation of record on appeal by adding thereto order of correction of court minutes, District Court of Appeal could not pass on question raised by appellant's contention whether minutes as corrected were true statement of the proceedings, since, if there was error in record, application to correct was to be made to trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mono County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California, acting by and through the Department of Public Works, against Mary W. Gorman, formerly Mary W. Gotham, and others. From an adverse judgment, defendant June Knapp appeals. On plaintiff's motion for augmentation of the record on appeal.

Motion denied.

Benjamin Chipkin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lincoln V Johnson and Francis Carr, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

On December 13, 1943, appellant June Knapp filed in the Supreme Court an appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of respondent on January 18, 1943. The record on appeal consists of the clerk's transcript, and two reporter's transcripts of testimony given and proceedings had on September 14, 1942, and August 20, 1940, respectively.

After the filing of the appeal in the Supreme Court the cause was transferred to this court, and on February 5, 1944, appellant filed a notice of motion for an order for "Diminution of Record, Augmentation and Correction of the Record," requesting, among other things, that there be incorporated in the record on appeal what he designated as an "Order of Abatement" made on September 20, 1937, which order was alleged to have been omitted from the clerk's transcript. A copy of this purported order was attached to the notice of motion and reads as follows: "By the Court: The Order heretofore made setting this case for trial is vacated, and the case dropped from the Trial Calendar, to be set on motion."

A written "opposition" to appellant's motion was filed by respondent, verified by Lincoln V. Johnson, one of its attorneys, in which it was alleged "That the minute orders of September 27 [20], 1937 and August 20, 1940 are not material to the appeal, or any question to be determined upon the appeal," and that "Said minute orders have no possible relation to the judgment which is the subject of the appeal herein."

Hearing on appellant's motion was had on March 3, 1944, at which time the matter was argued by respective counsel. Counsel for appellant offered and was granted permission to file a copy of the minutes of the trial court dated August 20, 1940, but no copy of the minutes of September 20, 1937, was filed.

On April 6, 1944, respondent, by its counsel, Lincoln V. Johnson, filed herein a notice of motion for augmentation of the record on appeal by adding thereto what was designated as an "Order for Correction of Certain Court Minutes," said order purporting to have been made September 10, 1943, nunc pro tunc as of September 20, 1937, and reading as follows:

"Knapp vs. Watterson. No. 2620.

"Order for Correction of Certain Court Minutes

"It appearing from the Court's own knowledge that the Minutes of the Court as recorded in the Book of Minutes regularly kept are incorrect and incomplete in certain respects and in specified cases:

"It is ordered that said Minutes be corrected in detail, as follows:

"On page 181 of Book 7 of Minutes of Court under date of September 20th 1937 covering the session of Court convening at 1:30 P. M. of said date, the minutes of the Court are corrected and amended by adding to the said minute entry the following, which is to be inserted immediately preceding the words 'By the Court:' It appearing that the same issues are being litigated and still pending before the Supreme Court in the case of Watterson v. Knapp and that a determination of the pending case will determine the issues here presented.

"The Minutes are further amended by striking out the words 'By the Court' at the place appearing in said minutes and replacing the same words 'By the Court' immediately after the words 'further argument by counsel for and against abatement.'

"The Minutes of said date are further corrected as to the same date in the preceding entitled 'The People of the State of California, Plaintiff v. Mary W. Gorman, et al' to read as follows:

"Benjamin Chipkin, Esq., Attorney for June Knapp now states that inasmuch as abatement has been ordered in the case of June Knapp v. Thos Watterson for the same reasons there should be no further proceedings in this case until the determination of the pending litigation between those parties and he therefore moves that all proceedings herein be abated as the case just preceding

"By the Court: Motion granted and the case dropped from the Trial Calendar to be reset on motion.

"The foregoing corrections made by the Court to the end that the Minutes might correctly reflect the proceedings had.

"Dated September 10th, 1943 Nunc Pro Tem as of September 20th, 1937.

"Pat R. Parker
"Judge"

Respondent's notice of motion alleged that the motion would be made "on the ground that the augmentation of record on appeal is necessary in order to correctly and properly present the record of the proceedings in the lower court." The affidavit of Lincoln V. Johnson in support of his motion alleged that the requested augmentation of the record "is necessary for the reason that said order corrects the record of the proceedings of the lower court and shows the true proceedings therein had and taken and should be embodied in the record on appeal herein." No other reason why said order for correction of minutes should be made a part of the record on this appeal is alleged, nor is it pointed out how or for what reason its inclusion is necessary to a determination of the appeal on its merits, nor why, if the order of September 20, 1937, which appellant sought by her motion to have made a part of the record, was not material, the minutes of September 20, 1937, as amended September 10, 1943, are material. No proceedings prior to August 20, 1940, are incorporated in the reporter's transcripts on file, and the clerk's transcript contains no court minutes whatsoever prior to August 20, 1940.

Opposition to respondent's motion was made by appellant, it being asserted, among her other objections, that the amended minute order is not a true statement of the proceedings had on September 20, 1937, but that said minute order as originally made, and as hereinbefore set forth, is correct; and that the trial court had no authority to make such a change of its minutes, such change being a judicial one and not a correction of a clerical error.

Section 953 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "If it appear that there is any paper or record in the custody of the clerk of the trial court which was before the trial court but which is not included in the record on appeal, and an examination of such paper or record will assist in a determination of the appeal on its merits, the court in which the appeal is pending may, on motion of either party, or on its own motion, require the production of a certified copy of such paper or record, and the same shall thereupon be deemed a part of the record on appeal."

[1] We cannot refrain from stating that neither respondent's notice of motion nor appellant's opposition thereto, nor the arguments of respective counsel before this court, have served to throw light upon whether the minutes of the trial court of September 20, 1937, "will assist in a determination of the appeal on its merits"; and we are of the opinion that it is not incumbent upon us, at this stage of the proceeding, to examine the record on appeal in detail, or to anticipate, in advance of the filing of their briefs, what grounds for reversal or affirmation of the judgment counsel for the respective parties intend to urge when consideration of the appeal on its merits is reached. An examination of the nunc pro tunc order itself is insufficient to enlighten us; and, as above stated, counsel for respondent, when opposing the motion of appellant to augment the record by adding thereto the original minutes of September 20, 1937, alleged that same were not material to the appeal or to any question to be determined thereon, and that they had no possible relation to the judgment which is the subject of the appeal. It seems logical to infer that if the original minutes are immaterial, an order correcting them, made long after the entry of the judgment appealed from, is likewise immaterial.

[2] As for appellant's contention, in his opposition to respondent's motion, that the minutes of September 20, 1937, as corrected, are not a true statement of the proceedings had on that date, and that the trial court had no authority to make the changes appearing in the nunc pro tunc order, this court cannot on this motion determine what actually transpired on September 20, 1937, nor can it determine whether the trial court had authority to make the purported change in its minutes. If there is error in the record, application to correct it must be made to the court below. 2 Cal.Jur. 679. And, as was said in Stafford v. Geary, 213 Cal. 650, 652, 3 P.2d 10, 11: "If the order was an improper one, or was improvidently made, a matter upon which we express no opinion, it was for the appellant to start the legal machinery by which such an error, if any, might be rectified."

Respondent's motion is denied.

3. Disorderly conduct ☞9

Evidence that two members of Jehovah's Witnesses entered hotel and disturbed guests by persistent course of loud knocking at all rooms in succession, extending over a period of ten minutes, authorized finding that there was a disturbance of the peace, so as to authorize conviction under statute making it a misdemeanor for a person to maliciously and willfully disturb the peace or quiet of any neighborhood or person. 4. Disorderly conduct ☞9

Proof that defendants who were members of Jehovah's Witnesses insisted on going ahead and knocking loudly at all doors in hotel after manager had previously prohibited them from doing so was sufficient to enable jury to infer willfulness and malice on part of defendants, within statute making it a misdemeanor for a person to maliciously and willfully disturb the peace and quiet of any neighborhood, or person. SHAW, Presiding Judge.

The charge against defendants is that they wilfully and maliciously disturbed the peace and quiet of the complainant and other persons present by loud and unusual noise and by tumultuous and offensive conduct, in violation of section 415 of the Penal Code. It appears that the defendants are members and ordained ministers of a religious organization known as Jehovah's Witnesses, and that they went to a hotel known as the Daily Hotel, in the City of Los Angeles, taking with them a supply of pamphlets and other printed matter in which the religious tenets and views of their organization were set forth, for the purpose of talking with the guests of the hotel and distributing this printed matter to them. Their mode of operation was to go through the halls of the hotel, knocking on all the doors and if they had no answer placing a leaflet under the door, but if there was an answer getting the occupant of the room to the door, if possible, and then holding conversation with such occupant and endeavoring to get him or her to accept some of the printed matter which the defendants carried.

Defendants arrived at the hotel at about 9:30 a. m. on a Sunday morning. The hotel had three floors and they began on the second floor. After they had knocked at several doors the manager of the hotel attempted to get them to stop. The manager told them to leave, that there were many war workers there and people objected to being disturbed on their Sunday sleep and said, "You must leave because I can't have you waking my people." The defendants, who appear to have fortified themselves with information on various legal decisions in which their organization has been involved, said to this, "We have a right to knock on these doors and talk to people." Both the manager and the defendants did some loud talking on this subject. The manager then called police officers, who came and interviewed the manager, the hotel clerk, and defendants, listened to defendants' legal arguments and went away, saying they had no grounds for arresting defendants, as no offense had been committed in the presence of the officers, but for the hotel people to keep the peace and use whatever force was necessary. The defendants then resumed their knocking on the doors of the hotel rooms, and after the defendant Scheerer had first knocked at and then entered the door of one room the clerk, Aiken, forcibly pulled him out of it. This resulted in what was described by some witnesses as a commotion, with some loud talking. Defendant Vaughan then called the police again and when they arrived requested them to arrest Aiken for assaulting Scheerer. After some further discussion in the hotel lobby the officers took Aiken and the two defendants to the police station, without purporting to arrest any of them. Later Aiken swore to the complaint on which defendants have been convicted.

Witnesses produced by the people described the conduct of defendants in going through the hotel and knocking at the doors, and its effect on them as follows. Witness Pletz was the occupant of a room jointly with one Siess, also a witness, and had just returned from a church service. He and several others were engaged in a card game when defendant Scheerer "pounded" at the door, and when the inmates said, "Who is there?" he came in. He offered them some literature which they refused, and at this time he was pulled from the room by Aiken, as above stated. After this there was "a good deal of loud talking, excessively loud" in the halls, but the witness did not say who did it. He said that, although his door was closed, he had heard pounding on the doors going on for about ten minutes before his door was reached, and that it was loud. The witness Siess gave testimony similar to that of Pletz. Both witnesses said they were disturbed by the pounding and the intrusion into their room.

Miss Kindred, a roomer, testified that she worked at nights and was asleep when she was awakened by "rather a loud knock, more of a pound than anything else" on her door; that she turned over and went back to sleep and in a few moments heard another knock or pound, got up to see who was there and found defendant Vaughan at her door. Defendant offered the witness some literature, which was refused. The witness said she was sleepy and tired and did not want to be disturbed. Defendant Vaughan "kept talking and I closed the door in her face." The witness no more than got back in bed than she heard pounding on the doors in the next room, and about that time "began to get mad right" and later complained to the manager. She also heard, just after this incident, loud talking outside of her room but could not tell who did it except that the man across from her said, "Get out of here and stay out."

Guy Powell, another lodger, testified that he worked nights, that he was in bed at 9:35 a. m., that there was a knock at his door, he got up and went to the door and there found defendant Vaughan. She spoke about her religious views, came in and put some literature on his dresser. He told her he had been working all night and had been sleeping and was tired and had no time to talk to her. "She made a statement about I was in the bed and the bed was afire and I was the kind of man who didn't know it was on fire and she wanted to wake me up." She kept on standing in the doorway and would not leave until the witness made several requests. All this disturbed his peace and quiet, he said.

Charles Kramer was in bed when he was disturbed by talking outside, heard the manager ask some one to leave, and went out to see what it was. He found the manager telling the defendants to leave and defendant Vaughan said, "No, the Lord had sent her there and she was going to see the people." The witness Roberts saw defendant Scheerer knock at a door at the opposite end of the hall from that where the witness was, but did not hear him. The witness Bengoshea was awakened by loud talking during the time the defendants were in the hotel but did not know who was talking.

The hotel manager, Mrs. Reynolds, testified that on the occasion in question she saw and conversed with defendants on the second floor and that by that time there was quite a commotion on the third floor—apparently among the guests. We have already stated the substance of her conversation with defendants. The manager also testified that defendant Vaughan had come there twice before, the last time being about six weeks before the incident involved in the charge, and had then engaged in the same process of knocking on doors. The manager then told her she must not do this, that they had a rule requiring all visitors to come to the office and ask for persons they wanted to see, that they had sleepers and she must not wake people, but defendant insisted that the Lord sent her there and she had a right to knock at the doors without the manager's consent and would do so. The hotel clerk, Aiken, also testified regarding this conversation and said that in it defendant Vaughan was told that many of the guests were day sleepers who worked at night, and "we wanted her to leave and stop disturbing them."

The defendant Scheerer was not present at the previous conversations between the manager and defendant Vaughan. He testified, however, that when he went with her to the hotel he knew she had been there before and had been requested to stay out of there, and that he went with her at her request. It is apparent from the record that they were acting in concert in the matter of their visitation of the hotel, and each is criminally responsible for the acts of the other in that behalf.

[1] The defendants gave testimony which conflicts with the evidence above recited in some respects, but of course we cannot review the credibility of the witnesses on appeal and must accept as true the evidence which tends most strongly to support the verdict.

The defendants contend that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of conviction and that the court erred in refusing certain instructions requested by them; also, that the statute under which they were charged is—at least as applied to their activities above mentioned—unconstitutional and void.

The statute in question, section 415 Penal Code, so far as it is involved here, reads as follows: "Every person who maliciously and willfully disturbs the peace or quiet of any neighborhood or person, by loud or unusual noise, or by tumultuous or offensive conduct, * * * is guilty of a misdemeanor * * *."

[2] Defendants contend that a disturbance of the peace is not punishable under this part of the section unless it is a disturbance of the public peace, citing in support on this claim People v. Anderson (1931) 117 Cal.App.Supp. 763, 767, 1 P.2d 64, decided by this court. Section 416 of the Penal Code, which was under consideration there, relates to "disturbing the public peace" and the quoted words were held to be the equivalent of "breach of the peace", which imports a disturbance of public peace or tranquility. In referring to the disturbance of the peace during our discussion we omitted the word "public", but in view of the words of the statutory provision we were construing, which had already been quoted, no significance should be given to this omission. While a reference was made to Section 415 and it was said to add little to the phrase appearing in section 416, that statement was made with reference to the facts of that case, where the disturbance was undoubtedly public, and is not a decision that a disturbance of the peace, in order to violate section 415, must extend to the public peace. The language of section 415 is to the contrary, for the word "public" does not appear in it, although its use in section 416 indicates that the legislature was acquainted with it and used it where the legislative intent so required. The part of section 415 above quoted prohibits a disturbance, by the specified means, of the peace of "any neighborhood or person", and we see no reason for reading into it any limitation not stated. There are some decisions by the lower New York courts which, on a statute no more explicit than ours on this point, hold that the disturbance must be public, but we are not disposed to follow them.

Defendants also contend that in order to violate section 415 the disturbance must occur in a public place, that the interior of the hotel where the acts proved were done by them is not of that character and that therefore their requested instruction No. 5 to that effect should have been given, and their guilt was not shown. Apparently this contention is a sort of corollary of the preceding one, the theory being that the public peace cannot be disturbed unless the disturbance occurs in a public place. Having rejected the foundation of this argument, we need not pass upon the reasonableness of such a conclusion from it, but again point out that section 415 contains no such limitation of its scope.

[3] The testimony is sufficient to support the jury's finding that there was a disturbance of the peace. Perhaps the hotel could be regarded as a neighborhood, but whether this be so or not, the peace of several persons there was disturbed. Two of them, who were night workers, were awakened from their sleep by defendant Vaughan knocking at their doors and when they stated the situation and their desire to sleep she would not go away, but kept on talking to them until one shut the door in her face and the other made several requests that she leave. One of these witnesses testified that the knock was loud. Another witness testified to loud pounding on the doors in the hotel going on for a period of ten minutes, which he could hear through his closed door, and the other evidence reveals defendants as the pounders. The group of card players were disturbed, not only by the pounding on their own and other doors, but by the uninvited intrusion of defendant Scheerer into their room. While the disturbances shown were not of the violent nature which would be classed as tumultuous conduct, there were acts which could reasonably be classed as offensive conduct (see People v. Beifuss (1937) 22 Cal.App.2d Supp. 755, 67 P.2d 411), that is, the indiscriminate knocking on doors, the intrusion of defendant

Scheerer into a private room and the persistence of defendant Vaughan in talking to persons who said they desired to sleep and asked her to leave. It was also shown that the disturbance was caused by loud noises, and while perhaps ordinary knocking at a hotel room door might not be considered unusual, a persistent course of loud knocking at all the rooms in succession, extending over a period of ten minutes, could well be so regarded by the jury.

Defendants argue that the loud talking shown by the evidence was done, at least in part, by the manager and the clerk and they are not responsible for it. Perhaps this is a result of defendants' conduct that they ought reasonably to have anticipated, but we need not so hold, for their previous acts are sufficient to support the verdict.

[4] There is a sufficient showing that the disturbances were wilful and malicious to satisfy the requirement of section 415 that they be so done. Both of these terms are defined by section 7 of the Penal Code. The stronger word is "maliciously", which imports "a wish to vex, annoy, or injure another person, or an intent to do a wrongful act, established either by proof or presumption of law." A presumption of law applicable here is declared by section 1963, subd. 3, C.C.P., "That a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary act." Here the defendant Vaughan had been previously informed that many of the guests of the hotel were day sleepers and must not be awakened, that she must not knock on the doors or go to them, but the rule of the hotel was that those desiring to see guests must come to the desk and ask for them. Similar statements, though not in so much detail, were made to both defendants on the Sunday in question. But relying on what they regarded as their legal rights, they insisted on going ahead and knocking on all doors loudly. The ordinary consequences of this would be to awaken the sleepers of whose presence they had been informed, to disturb their peace, and to vex and annoy them. This is sufficient, under the above-cited statutory provisions, to enable the jury to infer wilfulness and malice.

Defendants contend that they have a constitutional right to go into the halls of such a hotel as is here involved and knock on the doors of the rooms for the purpose of preaching the gospel and distributing religious literature to the tenants and that the operator of such hotel cannot lawfully exclude them. We doubt whether this claimed right is determinative of the case, for even if defendants' presence in the hotel was a proper exercise of such right, we are aware of no decision that freedom of speech, press and religion carries with it a freedom to disturb the peace of others in the manner shown here. We find no such holding in Cantwell v. State of Connecticut (1940) 310 U.S. 296, 60 S.Ct. 900, 84 L.Ed. 1213, 128 A.L.R. 1352, or in Martin v. Struthers (1943) 319 U.S. 141, 63 S.Ct. 862, 882, 87 L.Ed. 1313, on which defendants rely.

[5, 6] But if the right of defendants to enter within the hotel is material, we think they did not have such right, in face of the hotel management's order excluding them. The Fourteenth Amendment, on which the defendants base their claims, applies only to action by or under color of the authority of the state; it does not run against the action of private individuals, whether hotel proprietors or others, not purporting to be an exercise of the power of the state. (Iowa-Des Moines Nat. Bk. v. Bennett (1931) 284 U.S. 239, 245, 52 S.Ct. 133, 76 L.Ed. 265, 272; Swank v. Patterson (1943), 3 Cir., 139 F.2d 145, 146; Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Garrott (1919) 42 Cal.App. 152, 154, 183 P. 470.) From the evidence the place in question appears to be an ordinary hotel, or at least a lodging house. Its character in this respect is not necessarily altered by the fact that many or the majority of its guests are not transients and that some of them occupy their rooms on a monthly basis. (Fox v. Windemere Hotel Apart. Co. (1916) 30 Cal.App. 162, 157 P. 820; Magee v. Pacific Improvement Co. (1893) 98 Cal. 678, 681, 33 P. 772, 35 Am.St.Rep. 199.) The guests of such a place are not tenants and have no interest in the realty; they are mere licensees and the control of the rooms, halls and lobbies remains in the proprietor. (Fox v. Windemere Hotel Apart. Co., supra; Roberts v. Casey (1939) 36 Cal.App.2d Supp. 767, 771, 93 P.2d 654; Edwards v. City of L. A. (1941) 48 Cal.App.2d 62, 67, 119 P.2d 370.) Since the proprietor, rather than the guests, has the control of the place and its lobbies and halls, he may exclude persons such as defendants therefrom, or make rules regarding their admission. In Goldstein v. Healy (1921) 187 Cal. 206, 201 P. 462, it is held that the guests of a hotel may invite others to visit them, as of right, and that such invitees are lawfully in the hotel and entitled to the exercise of due care for their safety by the innkeeper; but there the court also held this right of the guest to be subject to reasonable regulation by the management. Here there was such a regulation, which the defendants violated; moreover, they had not been invited by any guest to enter and hence this rule is not applicable to the case. In support of their argument on this matter defendants rely mainly on Commonwealth v. Richardson (1943) 313 Mass. 632, 48 N.E. 2d 678, 146 A.L.R. 648, and Martin v. Struthers, supra, (1943) 319 U.S. 141, 63 S.Ct. 862, 882, 87 L.Ed. 1313. In the Massachusetts case a statute referring to the person having "lawful control" of premises was involved and the court held that by reason of the construction and arrangement of the lobbies and halls of the apartment house there in question the tenants had control thereof and the landlord did not. The place in question here had no housekeeping facilities for its guests; as far as appears they occupied single rooms, not suites or apartments; there were no means by which they could control entrance to the lobby or halls and it was clearly not an apartment house. The Massachusetts case is not applicable to it. Martin v. Struthers dealt with governmental action and is not applicable to the conduct of hotel keepers, but it recognizes the right of those in control of private property to exclude therefrom persons on errands like that of defendants.

[7] Defendants attack this statute on the ground that it is fatally uncertain and sets up no ascertainable standard of guilt. We think it is not vulnerable to this attack. (People v. Beifuss, supra, (1937) 22 Cal. App.2d Supp. 755, 758, 67 P.2d 411; People v. Smith (1939) 36 Cal.App.2d Supp. 748, 752, 92 P.2d 1039; Smulson v. Board of Dental Examiners (1941) 47 Cal.App.2d 584, 587, 118 P.2d 483.)

[8] Defendants' further attack on the statute is not against its terms in general but on the ground that its enforcement against them infringes on the rights guaranteed them by the Fourteenth Amendment. We have already sufficiently discussed this matter. We are satisfied that the guarantee of freedom of speech, press and religion does not entitle any person to go into a hotel or lodging house, over the objection of the proprietors, and there disturb the peace of the guests, in the manner shown by this record.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.
